A psychological trait of the Japanese themselves is responsible for his unique, almost miraculous sway over the people dating from the very moment of his arrival in Japan in 1945. Feudalism is still a recent thing in Japan and exerts a strong influence on the people. In feudal times the Japanese were mostly divided into clans. In their centuries of clan wars, when one feudal chief lost to another, the defeated clan unquestioningly transferred its allegiance to the victorious lord. It became an ingrained tradition.

Projected into modern times, it explains, in the opinion of Americans familiar with Japan why the Japanese docilely submitted to the American invasion even when Japan still had a huge army under arms. Japan had lost the war and their modern clan ruler, the Emperor, acknowledge it, thereby simply transferring rule to the victor, General MacArthur, and that, in turn, explains why the supreme commander has carried out the occupation for 6½ years without a single revolt or violent incident.

The pattern of peaceful occupation has now been well set and it may not be disrupted. But neither General Ridgway nor any other possible replacement for General MacArthur will ever command the veneration and adulation that has come from the Japanese.

That is why the Japanese masses were stunned and frightened by his dismissal; why Japanese newspapers came out that first day with extras carrying editorials in black.

What the Japanese fear now is that the change may mean that the United States in removing General MacArthur has decided to abandon Asia completely to communism. As long as General MacArthur was there they—the Filipinos, the free Chinese on Formosa, the guerrilla forces on the China mainland, and the people of Southeast Asia—were certain that he stood as the symbol of our determination to keep them out of Communist clutches.

As one observer put it, General MacArthur in himself was worth 10 divisions to the peace of mind of those in the path of spreading communism.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under the permission heretofore granted me by unanimous consent of the House, I include the following telegram received by my office today:

BROOKLYN, N. Y., April 13, 1951.
Representative JOHN J. ROONEY,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Please wire collect your position on Truman-MacArthur controversy to be used for publication.

HAROLD N. HARRIS,
Brooklyn Eagle.

In reply I sent the following telegram:

APRIL 13, 1951.

HAROLD N. HARRIS,
Brooklyn Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.:

In response your wire please be advised that as far as I am concerned President Truman, as Commander in Chief, has the constitutional right and power to dismiss or remove from office General MacArthur or any military commander for insubordination or any other reason. In a democracy it is absolutely essential that military men be controlled by authority of their civilian superiors. Should the day arrive when such authority is flaunted or ignored it would be the beginning of the abrogation of our freedom and democratic way of life and ultimate destruction of the ideals and principles we have nurtured and cherished. I feel that we must not yield in the slightest to the Chinese Communists. I also feel that Congress should insist upon General MacArthur's immediate testimony before the proper committee on the past and present military and political situation in the Far East.

Please use in toto rather than quote parts of this wire.

Congressman JOHN J. ROONEY.

General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, this morning there appeared in the Washington Post an editorial and three articles by prominent columnists concerning the dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur. I ask that these articles be made a part of our RECORD:

[From the Washington Post of April 13, 1951]

NOW IT COMES OUT

One important point to digest in respect of the removal of General MacArthur is that it will make no difference in the operations in Korea. For all practical purposes Lt. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway, the new supreme commander, has been making the decisions since his appointment to head the Eighth Army last December. To him belongs the credit, as put by one officer quoted by Christopher Rand in the New York Herald Tribune writing from the battlefield, for getting the Army "turned around in the right direction" after the retreat last fall. It was he who infused new spirit and master-minded the solidly based advances which have been taking place.

What has been suspected, but never before mentioned in so many words, is the growing antipathy that existed between MacArthur and Ridgway. A good soldier, General Ridgway never complained. But, according to Mr. Rand, correspondents observed many indications of jealousy on the part of General MacArthur, including a seeming effort to play down Ridgway's successes, brief dramatic appearances of MacArthur at the front apparently designed to attract publicity, and a double censorship in Tokyo which reportedly was more political than military. General Ridgway, in Mr. Rand's words, "is a well-disciplined man who has kept his peace under slights from General MacArthur's headquarters that have caused widespread talk (in Korea). There is no question that he will be strictly amenable to Washington and will refrain from influencing policy by independent statements."

There is every reason to believe that relationships now will be vastly different. General Ridgway and the new Eighth Army commander, Lt. Gen. James A. Van Fleet, are technicians, as well as men of moderation and understanding. Moreover, there will be mutual confidence and similarity of purpose between the Pentagon and the field command. Divided command, in short, is at an end, and we now ought to get some teamwork.

STORM OVER MACARTHUR

(By Marquis Childs)

TRUMAN'S CRITICS

Where and when the storm now sweeping over Washington will end no one can predict. Not in a long time has there been anything like it. The telegraph boys are carrying bushel baskets of wires to practically every office in the Senate and House and almost without exception they oppose President Truman's action in removing General MacArthur from his command.

The talk of impeachment was inevitable. Partly it is political in origin. But in the thousands of wires pouring into the Capital it reflects a long pent-up fury and frustration.

Those who use the word glibly do not realize that impeachment is a solemn constitutional procedure rarely evoked. Only the House of Representatives can vote on the impeachment of a President.

When an impeachment has been voted against a President, the trial is held before the Senate, with the Chief Justice presiding. Conviction is on a vote of two-thirds of those present. The language of the Constitution provides impeachment for "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." The Supreme Court has never interpreted that language.

When President Truman first came into the White House, he talked about the trials of one of his predecessors. That was Andrew Johnson, who succeeded to the office on the assassination of Lincoln and thereby inherited the tribulations that come in the wake of a great war. Johnson is the only President in our history to be impeached. By a margin of one vote the Senate failed to vote that impeachment.

It seems most unlikely that anything so drastic will occur in this instance. Yet in the inflamed state of opinion, with all the confusions and conflicts, doubts and uncertainties that beset the American people, one must add that anything can happen.

In the present violent reaction there is plainly a current of unreason. Truman is the symbol on which long-stored-up wrath is being poured out. And that wrath probably traces back in part to the tensions under which we have been living in recent months.

Some who are so passionately for MacArthur seem to be for him in the belief that if he were only given his own way, he would find a magical means to end the war and bring peace to the Pacific. This does not, of course, conform to the facts. The MacArthur policy would certainly have expanded the Pacific war.

Whether it would have meant the start of a third world war is another matter. The British were convinced that Soviet Russia would honor its treaty of mutual assistance with Communist China and come in if American planes attacked the Chinese mainland. MacArthur believed that this danger was negligible.

Whether the storm goes to the point of action against Truman, and the Democratic Party still has at least nominal majorities in both Houses of Congress, its violence will not soon subside. Quite apart from popular feeling, powerful engines of publicity are behind MacArthur. They will work night and day. MacArthur's return to America for the first time in nearly 15 years, his appearance before Congress, the drama in his every word and gesture, all this will keep it going.

Behind MacArthur is the whole of the so-called China lobby. It has large resources of money, including the support of a half dozen Chinese in this country, most of the members of the Soong family, who are reported to have vast sums in banks in Switzerland, the Argentine, Holland and the United States.

It is certainly too early to say what the political consequences of the President's action will be. He is a stubborn man. The very force of the reaction might persuade him to reverse a decision not to run for office again if, as many believe, he has made such a decision.

One thing does seem fairly clear. Even though they may not be able to get at the President himself, his critics and attackers in Congress can take revenge on his policies. And it is here, in my opinion, that there is the possibility for tragedy transcending any man's personal fortunes.

This violent quarrel can mean a further paralysis of Government at a time when it is vital to rearm and through rearming to unify the coalition of western nations. If we can't have our way in the Far East, the extremists may say in effect to the President, then you will not get your way in Europe. Obstructionism under our system of divided powers can do a lot, when there is no really responsible control in Congress, as between Republicans and Democrats.

Already the evidence of it has been ample in this Congress. If it now goes on to impede vital measures, we shall have paid a terrible price for our divisions.

THE WASHINGTON MERRY-GO-ROUND

(By Drew Pearson)

MAC ARTHUR EVENTS DISCLOSED

It was not until about 11:15 Tuesday night that President Truman actually decided to issue his 1 a. m. statement firing General MacArthur.

The decision to make this momentous step had already been taken, but the timing was set for Friday, not Tuesday midnight. And the reason for the sudden nocturnal press announcement was a telephone call from Secretary of the Army Pace in Tokyo tipping off Truman that MacArthur planned to jump the gun and get out his own statement first.

The President was still smarting from an incident around March 24 when MacArthur had jumped the gun on him, so naturally he was leery. He had sent MacArthur a policy statement for his perusal and personal reaction—a policy which the White House planned to announce as a peace feeler to China. But MacArthur, without notifying Washington, issued the statement himself.

So when Secretary Pace called from Tokyo Tuesday night intimating that MacArthur might rush into print again, the President called Secretary of State Acheson and Deputy Under Secretary Dean Rusk to the White House where they prepared the MacArthur press release.

Prior to that, late on Monday afternoon the Joint Chiefs of Staff held a highly secret session at which there was unanimous sentiment that MacArthur must go.

Gen. Omar Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and a most mild-mannered man, was hottest under the collar against MacArthur. He complained to colleagues that MacArthur's constant sounding off about war with China was undercutting our whole defense plan in Europe and making General Eisenhower's work three times as difficult.

Admiral Forrest Sherman, Chief of Naval Operations, and reported by some as favoring MacArthur's strategy against China, actually threw his weight behind Bradley. Though MacArthur's tactics included a naval operation against China, Admiral Sherman argued that we can't afford to get involved in war with China, and that if you go into China just a little bit—as in bombing bases—you have to be ready to go in all the way.

Gen. Hoyt Vandenberg of the Air Forces and Gen. Joe Collins, Army Chief of Staff, concurred.

Only military man who dragged his feet on MacArthur's ouster was Secretary of Defense Marshall, who has known MacArthur a long time, is 70 years old against MacArthur's 71, and who was in France as a World War I captain when MacArthur was a brigadier general.

One highly significant exchange of information made between the Pentagon and Lt. Gen. Matthew Ridgway in Tokyo was a cable from Ridgway stating that no matter what happened, his troops could hold out for 60 days. Regardless of what was thrown at him, Ridgway informed the Joint Chiefs of Staff, he could hold for 2 months.

This cable was in reply to White House fears that following MacArthur's removal, there might be a Chinese attack and a series of American defeats for which Truman, having removed the supreme commander, would get the blame.

HUMBLE HARRY

President Truman's usual peppery remarks have not been in evidence during the MacArthur controversy—not even to his personal advisers. The nearest he came to pepper was at last week's Cabinet meeting, just after former Speaker JOE MARTIN released the MacArthur letter.

"It's time to show the MacArthur's, the Time-Life people and the Scripps-Howard newspapers who is running American foreign policy," he observed tartly.

Day after MacArthur was relieved, however, Truman received a call from former Congressman Maury Maverick of Texas, who congratulated him.

"What you have done will make sure that my grandchildren will be free and that civilian Government will continue in the United States," Maverick said.

The President was neither cocky nor apologetic. He looked a little sad, as if he had made a terrifically hard decision and knew that a terrible storm was going to break over his head.

"Thank you, Maury," he replied. And he wept just a little. "I do my best. I have to follow the Constitution."

Truman went on to tell how hard he had tried to cooperate with MacArthur, how he had flown across the Pacific to meet him on Wake Island.

"You will never know how hard I tried," he said.

General MacArthur's grand strategy for China has never been spelled out in detail to the public but it has been argued back and forth repeatedly with Army Chief of Staff Gen. Joe Collins and Adm. Forest Sherman during their trips to Tokyo. Here is what it boils down to:

1. A mighty United States air strike against Chinese bases in Manchuria where Chinese reserves do their regrouping; also against the Mukden arsenal which sends arms to Korea.

2. A United States air and sea bombardment of the China coast. This would include United States battleship bombardments of China's big coastal cities, such as Shanghai and Tientsin.

3. Chiang Kai-shek's troops to be armed by the United States and landed on the Chinese mainland in a major invasion.

4. Simultaneously an all-out United Nations attack in Korea, with additional troops sent from the United States.

MATTER OF FACT

(By Stewart Alsop)

TRUMAN AND MAC ARTHUR

Either President Truman or General MacArthur had to be fired—and a general cannot fire his Commander in Chief. It is really as simple as that. The fact that MacArthur not only violently opposed the administration's policy, but continued to say so in an endless stream of pronouncements, made a show-down sooner or later inevitable, as MacArthur himself probably recognized. The only real surprise is that Truman decided to dismiss MacArthur immediately, rather than taking the easier way of waiting for the signing of the Japanese peace treaty.

The reasons he did so are inherent in his character and outlook. For one thing, Truman is extraordinarily sensitive where his powers as President are concerned, perhaps in part because he knows that he became President by sheer happenchance.

For another thing, there is Truman's absolutely rigid code, deriving in part from his days as a machine politician, which demands a relationship of unquestioning political loyalty, given and returned, between "the boss" and his subordinates.

With Truman cast in the role of boss and MacArthur in the role of subordinate, this relationship was bound sooner or later to break down. The breaking point came with MacArthur's statement of March 25, which challenged Truman's Presidential authority, and with the Martin letter, which in Truman's eyes was the equivalent of trading with the Republican enemy.

From beginning to end, then, the decision was Truman's, and Truman's alone. In the battle of the titans which is now in prospect, this should be borne in mind. Already MacArthur's dismissal is being described as a triumph for Secretary of State Dean Acheson, and for the views which Acheson is supposed to represent. This is inaccurate on both counts. Acheson was, of course, consulted, but he played no decisive part. He was not even present at the White House meeting on Tuesday afternoon, attended among others, by Chairman of the Joint Chiefs Omar Bradley and Presidential Adviser Averell Harriman, when the President finally decided to act.

Moreover, it is odd but true that after the Chinese intervention in Korea, Acheson was the strongest proponent of precisely the course MacArthur now advocates, including bombing the Chinese mainland and using Nationalist troops. He was only dissuaded when it became clear that this course would wreck the Anglo-American alliance, the keystone of American foreign policy.

In fact, the strongest pressure for dismissing MacArthur came, not from the State Department, but from the Pentagon, Secretary of Defense Marshall, Under Secretary Robert Lovett, and all four Joint Chiefs, whose directives MacArthur had consistently disregarded, unanimously favored the move. But the final decision was Truman's and it is Truman who must now play David to MacArthur's Goliath in the great struggle, with its enormous implications for American domestic politics and world strategy, which will now certainly ensue.

This is written on the day of MacArthur's dismissal, and the future is even less clear than usual. But it does seem certain that the MacArthur issue will divide the Congress on fairly strict party lines. As of this writing, the Democratic strategy is to go along with the Wherry resolution inviting MacArthur to address a joint session, but to arrange a joint meeting of the Senate Foreign Affairs and Armed Services Committees beforehand, at which MacArthur can be asked some very pertinent questions. Meanwhile, Truman is expected to take the offensive to explain his constitutional and other reasons for dismissing MacArthur.

As for the Republicans, the Taft-Wherry wing of the party clearly sees MacArthur as the ideal rallying point for an all-out attack on Truman and through Truman, on American foreign policy. The results are likely to depend very largely on what actually happens in Korea. For if the American forces suffer a shattering reversal in the expected Communist offensive (as is all too possible, for reasons which will be discussed in a forthcoming report) MacArthur will seem to be triumphantly vindicated. The demand for the bombing of the Manchurian bases will then become almost irresistible, and Truman, who has resisted this demand, will appear as the architect of disaster. It may be that MacArthur himself has been fully aware of this possibility.

Bombing the Chinese mainland might be the prelude to a third world war. But whatever happens, one thing is clear. The basic issue which has now been posed is whether or not the main American effort, in peace or war, should be diverted from Europe to Asia. MacArthur himself has repeatedly posed this issue, most recently in his astonishing reported statement that Formosa is more important to the defense of the United States than France. This familiar problem is the real issue, behind all the drama and uproar, and it is as crucial an issue as this country faces. If the United States is not to be left without an ally in th world other than Chiang Kai-shek, it can be decided in the end, as it has been decided before, in only one way.

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. BEALL. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the RECORD, a petition signed by a number of residents of the Takoma Park area of Maryland, a part of the Sixth Congressional District:

Whereas this Nation is confronted with ever-increasing domestic perils and world crises which threaten our continued existence as a free and independent people; and

Whereas President Harry S. Truman and Secretary of State Dean Acheson have been dominated and controlled in their foreign policies by other countries all to the detriment of the best interests of our country and to the jeopardy of its safety; and

Whereas President Harry S. Truman and Secretary Acheson at the behest of the United Nations have involved this country in a costly and destructive Asiatic war without the approval of Congress or the consent of the American people; and

Whereas Gen. Douglas MacArthur, whose high prestige throughout the entire Orient is universally recognized, has been engaged in an epochal work of reconstruction in Japan and has by brilliant leadership achieved remarkable military successes in Korea; and

Whereas in his capacity of Commander in Chief of the Allied Forces, he has very properly, as a matter of military strategy and patriotic duty, called attention to the necessary steps that must be taken to win the war and prevent our forces from being overwhelmed and eventually defeated and destroyed by the increasing hordes of Red China armed and supported by communistic Russia; and

Whereas the President of the United States has summarily dismissed Gen. Douglas MacArthur from his command—an act which will go down in history as a base appeasement of North Korea, Red China, and Soviet Russia and a craven surrender of the security and best interests of South Korea, Japan, Nationalist China, and these United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the undersigned, That the Congress of the United States be called upon thoroughly to investigate the above-described conditions and particularly the dismissal of General MacArthur and to demand the resignation and impeachment of any and all persons responsible for the incompetent, unpatriotic and war-breeding foreign policy of the Truman-Acheson administration; and

Resolved, That the original copy of these resolutions be sent to Congressman J. GLENN

The Real Story of Sampson Will Be Shocker

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. R. WALTER RIEHLMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. RIEHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial:

THE REAL STORY OF SAMPSON WILL BE SHOCKER

(By Alexander F. Jones)

The real story of the Sampson Air Base rehabilitation, and of the waste and irregularities involved, has not been told as yet.

But it will be told as soon as the congressional subcommittee digests the findings resulting from its brief trip to Sampson. The committee, composed of Representative JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, Republican of Pennsylvania, and L. GARY CLEMENTE, Democrat of New York, knew what it wanted before it arrived and, therefore, spent a minimum of time examining plumbers and other workmen on the amount of their overtime.

What the committee really wanted to know was how the contract for the work was let in the first place and this inquiry was very much on the q. t.

Here is what they found out:

The bids for this job were opened on December 24, last, and the low bid of $2,677,000 won the contract for the Five Boro-Malan Co., of New York City.

The low bid was $700,000 under the next lowest and $4,000,000 under the bid of one well-known construction firm which had sent a crew of estimators to Sampson before making its bid. Executives of this firm stated that the work of rehabilitating Sampson could not possibly be done for $2,677,000.

The Five Boro-Malan Co. started work at Sampson on January 3.

On that very day the company received a letter from the district Army engineer stating the initial phase of the work would have to be completed in 30 instead of 90 days and to accomplish this the job was being placed on a cost-plus basis. The sky was the limit, the original contract did not mean anything, and the gate was wide open on costs.

And on the day before, January 2, the Five Boro-Malan Co. was incorporated under the State of New York laws at Albany, with an issue of 250 shares of stock, no par value.

It is small wonder that the congressional committee is very, very interested.

Here is a New York City company, which did not exist as a corporate entity in this State when it bid on the contract—and was granted it—being given a spare no expense carte blanche on the day it started work. The contract on which it got the job on a ridiculously low estimate did not mean a thing.

The Congressmen were particularly interested in the matter of what happened at Sampson between January 3 and February 23.

For on February 23 two other construction companies were added to the Sampson project and a new contract, including Five Boro-Malan, was let for $18,000,000.

A neat little jump from $2,677,000.

It was from January 3 to February 23, when the Five Boro-Malan Co. was operating exclusively, that the incidents of extreme overtime, dumping of usable lumber and other materials, occurred.

A very pretty picture.

For the Army engineers to contend that their sole interest in the Sampson project is and has been, to complete a rush job is so much eye-wash.

The Army Engineering Corps knows every construction firm of importance in this country. It knows all about awarding contracts. That is why it sends bright boys to the Harvard School of Business Administration.

We hope the committee, and its counsel, go to the very bottom of this matter. It is only one example of many in this country where the armed services have wasted uncounted millions of dollars by neglect, unbelievable stupidity, and worse—and we mean worse.

The United States Navy got out of Sampson so fast after World War II that bread dough was not even taken out of ovens. The water was not even shut off and pipes froze and burst. No provision was made for watchmen and millions of dollars in property was lost in vandalism.

We hope we live long enough to see a new kind of parade on Pennsylvania Avenue in Washington.

In the reviewing stand in Lafayette Park across from the White House would be the President of the United States, his Cabinet, the high command, and all officers connected with disbursement in the armed services, and the entire Government, and all Members of Congress.

The marching divisions, keeping step from gutter to gutter, would be the taxpayers.

There would be division after division of men and women who pay up to $100 annually in Federal taxes.

It would take about 20 minutes for them to pass the stand with their banners: "It took all of us to pay for your neglect at Sampson."

Then would come the divisions in a higher bracket bearing the banner: "It took all of us to pay for your bad RFC loans."

And so on—hour after hour—division after division—until the "big brass" in the reviewing stands collapsed.

Such a parade is long overdue.

The vast sums that Washington throws around have lost all significance in terms of money.

But translate them into terms of people and the Government would learn—or relearn—that it takes the sacrifices of thousands, yes, of millions—to pay the cost of a single blind, stupid mistake—like the neglect at Sampson.

Manpower Ceiling

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I do not agree this is the time to place a limit on the size of the Military Establishment we are building for national defense. I am not aware that there is a ceiling on the number of men being kept under arms by our enemies, or any limit on the number of threats they can direct at us. Nor am I aware that there is a ceiling on the number of Americans who might be killed by any enemy attack on the United States; though there is good reason to fear that a ceiling on the size of our Defense Establishment would invite such an attack.

A ceiling on the manpower we would muster for our defense is not so much a ceiling on strength as it is a reduction to weakness. It is like telling a basketball player he must make no more than 10 goals in any game, or a halfback that he must never run more than 20 yards.

When I spoke last Wednesday, I deplored the complacency of Americans in assuming that because there is no danger today, though there was danger yesterday, there will be no danger tomorrow. The patriotism of Americans in meeting an immediate emergency has always been great; but our unwillingness to face realistically an undefined future is equally characteristic. If we impose a ceiling on the Military Establishment we are reluctantly about to raise we expose ourselves even further to the charge of complacency. A limited defense against unlimited aggression can scarcely prove more profitable than no defense at all. If we place a ceiling on our Military Establishment, are we not telling our enemies to exceed that ceiling, and their victory over us is assured.

In searching for an explanation as to why intelligent men, sincere men, and good Americans all should yield to the lure of such complacency, I begin to wonder if communism has not already won a victory. Limited aggression in Korea—therefore limited mobilization here. But meanwhile, behind the heavy blackness of the iron curtain, and deep in the remoteness of Eurasia, communism mobilizes its own unlimited manpower.

How trusting we are, but how gullible. How peace loving we are, and how misguided. How honest we are, and how foolish. Has Russia told us how many men she has under arms, or what ceiling she means to place on her own mobilization? Has Russia made a bargain that if we raise an army of only three and a half million men, she will raise an army of only 4,000,000. And has she promised that with only this half million advantage over us, she will not attack us? It is possible that we could be defeated, even if her advantage were less.

Russia makes no promises that she intends to keep, and does not keep those she has made. Why should we therefore, make promises to her? We promise to raise a military force of only three and a half million men. Why not more consistently promise not to fight if attacked, or to surrender promptly at the first act of aggression? Ceiling on manpower, indeed. Since when has our democracy consented to enjoy only limited freedom, or limited democracy?

Mr. Speaker, there was a time, in another, but not less critical, period in our history when Americans were not so faint-hearted. The response one American made to the threat of aggression was to assert, "Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute." And with those millions to support it, our democracy endured.

Today the faint-hearted among us would paraphrase that cry: "Three and a half million for defense—and tell us what you exact in tribute."

Surely, surely, we are not so faint-hearted, or as yet so defeated, that we are ready to make such a bargain.

The amendment to place a ceiling on military manpower in this critical period should be defeated.

Ours Not To Reason Why?—MacArthur or Gag Rule Tyranny

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the MacArthur dismissal, one of the most historic decisions of our times, represents the most flagrant effort on the part of the national administration to curb freedom of expression in the past generation. General MacArthur has been far more than a military officer. He has been our administrator in full charge of Japan. To an extent unrealized in our own country, he has been running the Japanese Government, its economy, its social institutions, and its educational structure. By dismissing MacArthur, Truman has not only silenced a general, but has also checked the entire course of our far-eastern policy development.

These elements are sufficiently destructive in themselves, but the further implication of the gag is equally shocking. Mr. Truman and his advisers have apparently decided that the rule for Americans henceforth must be "Ours Not To Reason Why, Ours But To Do and Die." If we are not to be permitted to speak freely and to analyze the reasons for our decisions, the age of American freedom is past. American generals have historically asserted the right to think and to speak up. On the urgent immediate question, most Americans share the common belief that MacArthur knows more about the Far East than the President and his entire far-eastern department put together. If we are dismissing people, there may be good reason to think the wrong fellow was dismissed.

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DONALD L. O'TOOLE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, today I received the following telegram:

Hon. DONALD L. O'TOOLE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Please wire collect your position on Truman-MacArthur controversy to be used for publication.

HAROLD N. HARRIS,
The Brooklyn Eagle.

In response to the telegram from the Brooklyn Eagle, I sent the following reply:

Mr. HAROLD N. HARRIS,
The Brooklyn Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.:

As a Member of the House of Representatives the Constitution does not provide me with any official right to question the President's actions in the MacArthur case. Article II section 2 of the Constitution names the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces. Under this article he has the right to name or remove with or without cause any of his military subordinates. It is not incumbent upon the President to furnish any explanation regarding the removal of any subordinate. Since this is a constitutional government with the Congress having definite constitutional limitations you may rest assured that there will not be any action on the part of Congress other than the utterance of words that will be ineffective. The President's decision is final.

Congressman DONALD L. O'TOOLE.

Autobiography of Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH W. GWINN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. GWINN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include this very excellent sermon by the pastor of my church in Bronxville, N. Y., the Reverend Dr. Lowell Russell Ditzen:

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF FREEDOM

(By the Reverend Lowell R. Ditzen, D. D., Bronxville, N. Y.)

Text: "The truth shall make you free"—(John 8:32).

Today, in the turbulent forum of world opinion, freedom is on trial.

Communism blatantly labels it "a vestigial remain of bourgeois ideology," and cries for its destruction.

Totalitarianism, in a hundred guises, adroitly points out its weaknesses and urges that its banners be forsaken.

Materialism puts out its choicest wares and affirms that all of man's hungers can be filled by its products.

Against all these, the apostles of freedom sometimes find their listeners few, their advocates all too often silent.

It is little wonder that many, once possessed by the dream of freedom, now waver before the loud evangelists for "order" or "security."

For how can an idea argue with substance? With what weapons can David overcome Goliath when the strength of David is of the spirit and the strength of Goliath is of the forge? How can the delicate steel of eternity and righteousness win an immediate round against the bludgeons of noise and prejudice?

If the present defense and future course of freedom depended alone on outward trends that seem to dominate our modern life, the way of freedom would seem clouded indeed.

But there is yet another hall of judgment, another court of opinion, where the voice of freedom cannot be stilled. That court and throne of power is in the soul of every man.

There: where deep calls unto deep; where truth will have its say even though error appears to govern; where the still small voice of right will be heard though the words of half-truth and ignorance reverberate in the ears; there, in the soul of man, freedom speaks.

And it says:

"I am called by the name of Freedom.

"My origin is in the unknown beginning before the worlds were brought into being. Ere the fires and mists of nothingness swirled and cleared to reveal stars and sun and the majesty of the firmament, I was. Before the beginning of time I lived in the heart of God.

"When that Eternal Spirit molded a figure from the dust and breathed into it the warmth of existence, the glory of hope and the balances of reason, I, Freedom, was imparted, too—a pure spark from the soul of perfection—into the life of man.

"As God watched His last and crowning creation walk into his new world, He mused:

" 'He must travel twixt darkness and the light, between heaven and hell, between good and evil. He will falter. He will fall. The dreamless dust from whence he came will seek to claim him again.

" 'Yet on the altars of his soul I have lit the fires of truth, of love, of faith, and of freedom. If he will but walk by these lights, he will triumph. The dust will loose its hold, and I shall claim him as my own.' "

"Of my beginning this is all I know. But knowing this, I know that I live, as strong as hunger, as compelling as love, as sure as death, at the inmost core of man's being.

"There are those who have not so understood. Some have sought to stifle me in their own soul and to destroy me in the lives of others. Club and spear, arrow and battering ram, the rack and the stake, musket and cannon, tank and bomb, have been vainly used to destroy me. They have tried but to no avail—for I yet remain. Like embers still glowing deep within the ashes of a forgotten fire, so I still live, even in the soul of those who profess to hate me and seek to destroy me.

"Many have been the sufferers, many have been the broken bodies that have borne the fury and the anguish of the world's ignorance on my behalf. Sad, mangled bodies there have been—from which some men have turned, saying, 'it's over now. This one no longer will give us his idle talk of freedom. Yes, this one is dead.'

"But it is not over, for I yet live.

"Socrates drank his hemlock. It is right to say that his breath ceased. His body was put away. His words were no longer to be heard by the ears of men. Yet the yearning to think without restraint and to speak openly, to be free in mind and soul and voice—that part of me that lived in him lives on. That, the hemlock could not claim.

"On Golgotha's dark brow the nails pierced deep. The spear added its final assurance that life was done. Even the noble lips themselves had whispered, 'It is finished.' But it was not finished. The spirit of Jesus lives on to fan the delicate flames of liberty and of longing for freedom, into a consuming fire. A power it is, that spirit of Christ—a power to set men free—free from error, free from sin, free from death.

"Time would fail me to tell of all who suffered for freedom's sake, who were stoned, who were burned, who set out on pathless oceans, through unknown forests, seeking a place where they might live as freemen. Many were lost. But their longing for freedom was not lost.

"This I know, that as God's Spirit lives, and men remain men, I too shall live.

"You ask me what I am?

"I am longing and hope. I am dreams. I am faith. I am incorruption growing in the soil of corruption.

"When voices are raised saying, 'These poor shall not perish; this injustice must be righted,' it is my voice that speaks. When opportunities are enlarged, when privileges are increased, when shackles are broken, when burdens are lifted, there am I. And when the Cross is raised to comfort and redeem the children of men, again it is I who am the deed and the doer, the act and the actor.

"Some have cried 'Down with tyranny,' 'Give me liberty or give me death.' These are my words. Though they are spoken by men it is the ageless singing of my song that is sung.

"What am I?

"I am tears that weep over oppression. I am the curses that damn the injustice of the slums, I am the sadness that mourns untimely death. I am the struggle against dark selfishness which blights another's hopes. I am the patient minds that seek the paths of cooperation toward the best good for all mankind in the councils of statecraft. I am the heart of every righteous act. I am the voice that pleads of fairness, for justice, for tolerance and consideration of man for man. I am the painstaking observation that weighs the balances in the halls of justice. I am the hand that clothes a naked body, that heals a wound, that gives a cup of water to the thirsty. I am the sweat that comes in work to clean a filthy street. I am the plan and the sharing which enables children with bloated stomachs and spindly legs to sit at a farmer's table and romp in a green meadow. I am the precious memories of saints and scientists, the poets and philosophers in whom my light became a beacon.

"This is what I am. I am the spirit that creates a song, a church, a letter, an oration, a hospital, a book, a laboratory, a constitution, a college, in which there is a seeking to unshackle the mind, to soothe pain, to send God's children onto higher paths of peace and plenty.

"My enemies—who are they?

"The tyrant? Yes; the tyrant, whether he sits on a throne or at the head of a family table, he is my enemy.

"The greedy? Yes; wherever the wild horse of personal desire runs without control to injure or trample another, there is my enemy. More surely my enemy is that ignorance which permits the spirit of avarice to dominate the concern of man for his fellow men.

"The careless who sell their birthright as freemen for a mess of pottage, no matter to what label they succumb, whether it be 'peace,' or 'security,' or 'safety'—for these I weep. They are the foolish and deluded ones who learn their gold has purchased a false idol, when the price has been their liberty. They are enemies to the best within themselves—and so, enemies of mine.

"It is not alone tyrants or the lustful or the indifferent against whom I am opposed—but caution, which holds back from a venturesome act for freedom's sake; fear that stays the hand which should strike with courage; silence which dumbs the lips that should cry boldly in times of decision—these, too, are my enemies.

"Of them you should be aware. They lurk in the depths of each man's being, ready to blot out the light of independence and the flashes of truth that lift life from the jungle and spur man upward toward the life of God.

"But though such enemies be on the field—I will not be destroyed. They may claim a battle; but the final victory is yet to be decided.

"You would know of my future?

"How can I reply but to say that you will be the one to answer. My tomorrow will be determined by your today.

"If I may make a plea, it is that you, who are the sons of men and the sons of God, will not allow my betrayal within yourselves or in the world without. Should you deny me, you deny the best within your heart and mind. Your act is treacherous to God.

"I am freedom, the breath of eternity, seeking through you to bring true life into the world. It is you, the man and the woman of today, who, for good or for ill, will add to my chronicle that shall be read tomorrow.

"Will the future generations be shackled by the grim forces of ignorance and arrogance? Will they curse the Esaus of this day who would exchange their free birthright for a mess of pottage? Must they regird themselves to rewin inalienable rights and privileges at the cost of blood and death?

"Or standing on a higher plateau of peace and prosperity shall they face their future with hope and look back on their past with gladness?

"That future, be it for the good or the ill of freedom, is yours to determine now.

"Be adequate. Be strong. Be free!"

The Draft Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN V. BEAMER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. BEAMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to make the statement that my vote of nay on Senate bill 1 was an expression of no confidence in the President of the United States to whom this measure extends further authority.

1951 Amendments to the Universal Military Training and Service Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, on April 6, 1951, in my debate in favor of this bill, on pages 3435–3436 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I said:

I do wish to now mention a couple of subjects and ideas that I mentioned in the Armed Services Committee, and I do it with a great deal of feeling that they are important to consider under this universal military training proposal. I think this House should be reminded of the fact that if and when this UMT program is set up it is set up for the youth of our Nation between 18½ and 19 years of age, the "tender" young men of our Nation, so-called, the youngest in our military call. On pages 36 and 37 of the committee hearings there is quoted there a discussion between myself and General Marshall. Then later in the report, a discussion between myself and Mrs. Rosenberg and General Hershey dealing with the matter of the morals and welfare of these young men in the UMT.

I wish to say, as one Member of Congress, I shall expect the commission, when it is set up, and if no commission is set up, I expect any bill passed by this Congress to contain adequate provisions to protect, as far as they can be, the morals and the welfare of the young men who go into this national training corps. I think it is high time that we in this Congress declare ourselves that we are not afraid to speak clearly and firmly on the proposition that the conditions and circumstances surrounding the training of boys and young men must be to the uttermost for their protection and their strength, rather than for their weakness and the destruction of their character and their morals. Such protection against commercialized vice of all kinds is a must.

Since my remarks of April 6 referred to, some have asked me to call attention for the RECORD in this debate today the discussion on this question of vice surrounding the camps as it occurred in the Armed Services Committee of which I am a member.

Here it is verbatim, to wit:

Mr. DOYLE. May I ask one more question, Mr. Chairman?

Some of us, General, have had sons that have served in the last war and aren't with us today, can't be, and some of them went in at very tender ages.

Have you yet directed or has anyone under you yet directed that there be any established policy to see to it that the conditions surrounding the camps and in the camps, referring to the use of liquor, referring to prostitution and other problems that arise out of mass military effort, are such as to make it as positive as possible that the boys, whose parents are desirous that their boys come out of their military service without their morals having been unnecessarily destroyed are provided with adequate recreation and athletic and sports facilities and other programs for the men and women in all the armed services?

Secretary MARSHALL. Well, frankly, sir, I have not, up to the present moment, gone into that particular aspect of the matter. I am quite certain——

Mr. DOYLE. Don't you think it is necessary——

Secretary MARSHALL. May I finish my answer?

Mr. DOYLE. Yes.

Secretary MARSHALL. Because I said up to the present moment I haven't done it, but that doesn't mean I am not going to do it. And I also feel assured that it is being done, because we learned that out of the last war and it presents a great many difficulties.

Mr. DOYLE. Well, I——

Secretary MARSHALL. And it is very important to us from several standpoints. It is important to morale of the Army and it is vital to the support of the civil population.

Mr. DOYLE. I hope we are promptly advised that it has been done.

Secretary MARSHALL. I will have that brought before your committee in detail.

Mr. DOYLE. One more statement, General. In reading the objectives of this bill and its proposed amendments to the Selective Service Act of 1948, I recognize that, of course, the military service is but temporary in the experience of American boys at present and I hope it will always be temporary, consistent with the best interests of our national defense.

In other words, one of the fears that many of my people have is that our Nation may unnecessarily become militarized. Therefore, may I ask you this, as I read this bill: Will it be inconsistent with this bill in the form of amendments to have a statement also included in the policy that it is the policy of Congress that these boys who are called into service get this training, in scientific research and development and health and education and military training, and return to civilian life as soon as possible, consistent with our national defense interests?

Secretary MARSHALL. Offhand, I wouldn't see any objection to that, but I would like to have a little bit more time to consider it.

Mr. DOYLE. Isn't that one of the objectives of our Nation?

Secretary MARSHALL. It is, and I must address myself to one phase of what you have just said as to militarizing our people. Anybody who watched the demobilization of our armies never got that idea, because the minute the emergency ceases everybody goes home and our great complication is to keep a few on guard until the next phase.

I think that was the case after the Civil War. It certainly was the case in 1919. And it was—well, as an understatement, it was quite the case in 1945. I remember I had to come up here and explain to as many as 600 Members of Congress once or twice something about the demobilization, when the Army was dissolving literally in my lap. I couldn't find the Army one day to the next. I don't think you can change the American boy. He doesn't change very readily into a military automaton.

Our great problem is to get him into the military system to the extent that it is necessary. I think one of the failures of our planning in the War Department in the last war was we hadn't given the same amount of attention to how we were going to affect the state of mind of the soldier and the people as the demobilization period came up. As a matter of fact, the Lord blessed us and war came to an end so suddenly that we were caught off center. We are now in the midst of tremendous effort. But every indication that we have is that you can't enforce a military feeling on our people unless there is an immediate objective before them that all can recognize is of vast importance to the country.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Chairman, I make this statement in closing so the general will understand the import of my question.

I am very vigorously in support of an adequate armed military strength, but I do wish to emphasize that that to me should only be according to our present need and that always the objective of the military is to return those boys to civilian life in the utmost good health and the utmost good character and the utmost strength to protect our Nation.

Secretary MARSHALL. That certainly would be our desire.

I am very happy, therefore, that Mr. COLE, the distinguished Armed Services Committee member from New York, offered his amendment. The record shows I offered a similar amendment in committee which was not adopted. This amendment offered by Mr. COLE is better, I believe, than the one I offered.

"Our Strength Is Being Used To Prevent War, Not To Wage It; the Young Men in Uniform Are Standing Between the American People and Destruction; We Are Proud of Every One of Them"—Dr. John R. Steelman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise briefly to address the House, then to extend my remarks and include in the RECORD of today's proceedings a script of the thirtieth Battle Report, Washington—the National Broadcasting Co. television program presented each Sunday afternoon.

On the occasion of the broadcast of this particular teledocumentary, Dr. John R. Steelman, the assistant to the President, was with President Truman in Key West, Fla., and made his talk from there. The presentation was made by way of film recording and on this occasion Dr. Steelman brought to the television audience Hon. George Allen, United States Ambassador to Yugoslavia; the internationally famous authority on the Arctic and Arctic flying, Col. Bernt Balchen, a man to whom the area of the North Pole is almost as familiar as the dome of the Nation's Capitol is to the Members of this House. Colonel Balchen is now the United States Air Force's expert on Arctic aviation. His talk is something that will long be remembered by those who heard him discuss the Arctic center of the globe on this notable television broadcast.

On the program also was Maj. William W. Wright, one of the first United States marines returned to this country from Korea under the new rotation program, and as he told of his return, one can live and sense the glorious feeling experienced in having been one of the thousand marines homeward bound on the U. S. S. Breckinridge, sailing into the Golden Gate on this unforgettable voyage. Last but not least on the program were some of the greatest pictures ever filmed and presented on any television screen. They were taken by the Jones Brothers, the twin photographers of NBC, and made particularly for the Battle Report, Washington program. As historical documents, they will forever constitute one of the most complete records of this day and time ever recorded.

I am happy to announce that what was presented was a small part of the wonderful picture footage taken by the Jones boys and scheduled for reproduction on Battle Report, Washington.

What follows is but a few lines of an epic word picture painted by Lou Hazam of the story in Yugoslavia—commenting on the photo news as exhibited on the screen. This word-picture by Hazam constitutes one of the best pieces of script writing ever presented on the television screen:

The story of Yugoslavia is written in the faces of its people, 16,000,000 of them, who are making history by insisting on being themselves. Principally Croats, Serbs, Slovenes, they occupy a mountainous country, big as New York and Pennsylvania put together, a country of six republics and several different languages. Let us read what is written in their faces by what the camera finds behind them, stopping first for a brief visit with our Ambassador to Yugoslavia, George Allen, who makes this special statement for you who watch Battle Report.

Mr. Speaker, thus on another Sunday, the National Broadcasting Co. and Dr. John R. Steelman have brought to the American people a report on several most interesting subjects—made by men who by virtue of both experience and training are highly qualified to address themselves to the subjects selected for discussion.

The thirtieth Battle Report, Washington, as produced by Ted Ayers, was as follows:

BATTLE REPORT, WASHINGTON, MARCH 18, 1951

Mr. DAVID BRINKLEY. Once again Seoul falls to UN troops, battling Korea's spring thaw as well as the enemy. And once again NBC television turns its cameras on the Nation's capital for your weekly Battle Report.

Washington, one eye on the Big Four deadlock in Paris, the other on Korea—Korea where our forces, slowed by rain, are now within 20 miles or less of the controversial thirty-eighth parallel.

Today on Battle Report the famous Arctic flier, Col. Bernt Balchen, who knows the top of the world like you know your own back yard; Marine Maj. William W. Wright, one of the first home from Korea under the new rotation plan; and the third of NBC's exclusive teledocumentaries on Europe, Battle Report, Yugoslavia. But first, by way of film from Key West, Fla., where he is with President Truman—the assistant to the President, Dr. John R. Steelman.

Dr. JOHN R. STEELMAN. Like many others in Government, I frequently receive letters from parents who complain because their sons are selected for military service. Today I have been thinking about those letters. I can understand why they were written. I have sincere and deep sympathy, not only for the parents, but also for the sons whose careers are interrupted.

There is no doubt in my mind that parents everywhere in the world dislike the idea of their sons being called into the armed services. That includes the parents behind the iron curtain as well as those in the free world.

But, just so long as tyrants seek to dominate the world, we in the United States have no alternative but to build up our military strength. That is the only language the tyrants understand. If we were weak they would trample over us without mercy; destroy every material thing we own and make us slaves of a cruel and autocratic state. We have seen with our own eyes the tragic fate which has overtaken weak nations.

We have chosen to build up our armed strength so no one will dare attack us. Our strength is being used to prevent war, not to wage it. The young men in uniform are standing between us and destruction.

All over the world today, representatives of our Government are working tirelessly to prevent war. That is their primary task. Some are engaged in efforts to build a more prosperous world for less fortunate persons. These are the men and women working on fight against the Nazis. It is not for us to say that the Yugoslavians cannot be overcome. One thing, however, seems certain—anyone who undertakes to challenge this nation with arms will pay dearly for the offense.

Mr. BRINKLEY. If we would defend ourselves and the free world, one place we must be prepared to dig our fox holes is in the arctic snow. Since the potential enemy is closest to us over these north polar regions, here we must learn to live and fight. Under simulated combat conditions—as shown in these pictures—American troops and specially designed equipment are now being tested against the rigors of some of the bitterest climate on earth.

To our next guest, even the North Pole is no stranger. Norwegian-born, and once with its air force, he is now an American citizen. In the last war, he built the Army base on Greenland; later served with the Eighth Air Force and OSS in Scandinavia. Until January, he commanded the Tenth Rescue Squadron in Alaska. For an appraisal of the strategic arctic from a man who knows what he's talking about—here is the Air Force's arctic expert—Col. Bernt Balchen.

Col. BERNT BALCHEN. The old Mercator projection map of the world with its inhabited areas about in the center of the map, topped off at either end with the desolate, unproductive polar areas, is not applicable any more for our geographical conception of our world. It is also interesting to note that the large industrial and commercial centers—which in time of war would become the prime targets for the strategic air forces of the countries involved in an armed conflict—practically all are situated between latitudes 35° and 50° north.

Long range traffic between the commercial centers, or, if war should come, long range strategic missions between North America and possible targets in Soviet, will naturally take the shortest route—the great circle track.

The vertex of these air lanes all converge toward the North Pole and into the Arctic regions. Up till now we have had two large areas of our globe that have not been the place for large military strategic operations. These are the Arctic and the Antarctic regions. Having been considered of little or no commercial or strategic value and the logistical problems too difficult to tackle with the knowledge up till now.

As far as the Arctic regions are concerned, this is a thing of the past. The Arctic regions are located in the center of the big industrial and strategic target areas of our globe. One can say with justification that the Arctic from being one of our coldest areas has turned to become one of the "hot spots" of today and tomorrow.

This attracted attention is partly due to recent discoveries of natural resources, but overwhelmingly from its new increased military strategic importance.

In any future conflict, it is reasonable to assume that the arctic and subarctic regions might be the areas from which some of the first, and maybe decisive, aerial attacks would be initiated.

Three of our inhabited continents—North America, Europe, and Asia—meet at the ice-covered beaches of the Arctic Ocean, and the extreme northern parts of these continents are the arctic land areas.

The shortest routes—the great circle tracks—between a number of industrial centers and military bases in North America and the Soviet, particularly points in the Ural and Siberian industrial complexes, are all passing through the arctic regions and some of them nearly across the geographical North Pole.

This strategic problem is very convenient for the Air Forces' strategic bombing of industrial targets with modern types of high-efficiency projectiles. Wiping out the war production potential of an enemy should greatly reduce our loss and costs of any future war.

Our latest types of aircraft are well capable of performing these missions.

The low temperatures that would be encountered on these flights across the Arctic regions are no more severe than encountered in daily operations at high altitudes anywhere else on the globe.

On the whole, flights across the polar regions have no major problems with our electronic aids to polar navigation. High aircraft and engine efficiency and high pro-efficiency level of flight crews make this type of operations practically daily routine flights.

On a military mission across the polar regions, most of the track would be inside the Arctic Circle and, also, likely most of it over the Arctic Ocean. With the exception of the southern parts of the Arctic regions, it is very unlikely that any opposition in the form of antiaircraft, radar, and defensive fighters should be encountered. The unlikelihood of not encountering opposition on about two-thirds of the trip would give the crews a better opportunity to concentrate on navigation and flight problems. To quote Gen. H. H. Arnold: "If a world war III should come, the strategic center will be the North Pole."

To quote General Spaatz: "Across the Arctic, any industrial target (country) is within the reach of our Air Force. The United States is similarly exposed. We are really all open across the Arctic."

It is obvious, from the previous, that as we improve the range of our bombers or, looking at the peaceful aspect of the picture, the commercial long-range nonstop operations, for instance between the west coast of the States and India, the Near East or the east coast of the United States and China, would all cross the Arctic regions, and some of them very close to the pole.

With the progress of aviation, military or civil, ground installations all over the Arctic land areas are needed for efficient and safe conduct of these operations. A complete network of weather, radar stations, also some emergency landing fields, would be required. These installations would provide a permanent bulwark in the defense line of our continent.

Mr. BRINKLEY. The memory of our retreat to Hugnam will live long in many minds. Cold, snow, and sleet seemed to join with the enemy in one unholy conspiracy to bring death to those who dared to try to make it. The same tough conditions were faced by others all throughout the winter in Korea. Many men, there since the first day of the North Korean invasion in June, battled on without relief as the Communist tide poured down on the heels of the North wind.

Recently, the U. S. S. Breckinridge sailed into the Golden Gate of California with many who tasted this unforgettable experience * * * the first Marines brought home under the Armed Forces new rotation plan. To tell you who were chosen to come, and how * * * as well as how it feels to be home again, here is one of the passengers on the Breckinridge—Maj. William W. Wright.

Maj. W. W. WRIGHT. Just a little over a week ago, I was one of a group of a thousand Marines listening to the cheers of thousands as we rode down Market Street in San Francisco. We were the first Marines to return to the States as a result of the recently-established Marine Corps' rotation plan. It was a mighty satisfying thing—that reception accorded us in San Francisco. Passing under the Golden Gate bridge is always a satisfying experience, but this time there was more to greet us than that beautiful piece of engineering.

When our ship, the U. S. S. Breckinridge, arrived in Frisco, each of us was given one of these cards which reads, "With pride and gratitude, San Francisco welcomes you, a fighting marine, home from the battlefront of Korea." Thousands of San Franciscoans turned out to lend proof to that message of welcome. There was the band and welcoming committee at the dock, the motorcade through ticker-tape and cheers, and later, numerous parties and receptions, all adding up to a mighty warm welcome—a far cry from the cold of Korea. This rotation plan was evidence to those of us who were aboard the Breckinridge was selected for rotation because of three things. The first group was selected for their long period of combat duty. Another group was selected because they had been awarded two Purple Hearts—evidence that they had been twice wounded in action. The third group, of which I was a member, was what the corpsmen called, cold weather cases—victims of the rugged winter weather which brought on an unprecedented number of cases of frostbite and respiratory troubles. * * * That Korean weather will long be a subject of discussion among military personnel. We learned a lot from it. As the officer in charge of keeping a battalion of the Seventh Marines supplied, I know first-hand of our attempts to meet the Korean winter head-on. Even before I was evacuated late in November, each marine in my outfit had been properly equipped with the latest available cold weather clothing. But in spite of our years of experimentation, and in spite of our extensive preparations for winter fighting in Korea, mother nature proved a pretty tough enemy to lick. * * * I know that reports circulated here in the States to the effect that, at one time, our Marines in North Korea were fighting in below-zero temperatures while still clad only in their summer uniforms. It is difficult to understand just how such rumors got started. * * * When the First Marine Division headed for Korea from California, we took with us complete supplies of cold weather clothing, and we had them on hand when the weather turned cold. Of course, at times, enemy action made the supply problem difficult, and some of the marines were temporarily without their winter gear. But by the time things really got rough, every marine in Korea was equipped with the best winter clothing we had developed up to that time. Right now, the lessons we have learned in Korea are being evaluated, and new winter clothing is constantly being developed. But a wonderful way to keep warm, I discovered, is to make that most welcome incoming trip through the Golden Gate.

Mr. BRINKLEY. And so—until we turn our cameras on the Nation again the week after next for another telecdocumentary—this, then, against the background of Battle-front Korea, is David Brinkley putting a period on your thirtieth battle report, Washington.

United States Lacks Aim in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. OSTERTAG

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. OSTERTAG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to insert the following column of comment by Hanson W. Baldwin, the so-called point 4 program. Others are in daily contact with the officials of foreign governments. Still others are busy telling the story of our country and making it clear to all that we want peace.

Back of all these men and women is our strength. Our ability to produce the material things of life is one asset. Our unselfish willingness to help others is winning new friends for us every day. Our armed might—these young men in uniform—are the bulwark behind which we can keep working to build a world of peace and prosperity.

We are proud of every one of them.

Mr. BRINKLEY. This is the armed border of Yugoslavia—Yugoslavia which faced the Soviet giant, once its brother, and cried aloud to the world its declaration of independence. This is the border that touches four Soviet satellites—Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Albania—and Italy and Austria in the north, Greece on the south. This is Communist Yugoslavia where the impossible has happened, affecting the whole balance of power in Europe. Rebellious Yugoslavia, which only last week handed the governments of the west this tough-talking, 481-page white book, formally challenging Russia with applying threatening pressure against her. It is from this Yugoslavia that our cameramen, the Jones brothers, send us their third NBC exclusive documentary report on Europe. We invite you now to see this country, as no American camera has been permitted to show it in recent years through Battle Report, Yugoslavia.

The story of Yugoslavia is written in the faces of its people, 16,000,000 of them, who are making history by insisting on being themselves. Principally Croats, Serbs, Slovenes, they occupy a mountainous country, big as New York and Pennsylvania put together—a country of six republics and several different languages. Let us read what is written in their faces by what the camera finds behind them, stopping first for a brief visit with our Ambassador to Yugoslavia, George Allen, who makes this special statement for you who watch Battle Report.

Hon. GEORGE ALLEN. Good afternoon. Yugoslavia is the only eastern European country from which this program will be able to report to the American people. And that fact alone is significant. Although Yugoslavia is a communistic country, this report comes from a country where, fortunately, the heavy iron curtain of the Cominform has been lifted, and it comes from a country that fiercely determines to defend itself against aggression. Yugoslavia is in the Balkans, and that term conjures up pictures today more than ever before of the powder keg. Today, Yugoslavia's existence is threatened by Russia's satellite troops—troops which we know are far in excess of treaty limitation. These troops stand ready on Yugoslavia's frontier. Guns are poised, the powder is dry; the only remaining question is whether the masters of the Kremlin will give the orders for the fingers to touch the triggers.

Mr. BRINKLEY. This is the heart of the embattled Yugoslavia of which Ambassador Allen speaks—Belgrade, Yugoslavia's Moscow, much destroyed by the war. Work on a new Belgrade ceased when the break with Russia came in order to concentrate workers on defense projects.

For industrial goods Yugoslavia, always predominantly agricultural, has been trying to build new industries. This machine-tool factory, outside Belgrade, was shipped down from Germany in toto after the war and given to Yugoslavia as its share of reparations from the Nazis. It employs 4,000 workers on day and night shifts to provide the nation with the machines they'll need to make their own goods.

Coal is needed to power this rush to industrialize—coal essential to fueling Yugoslavia's defense. And, along with coal, wood—making these two items of vital importance in Yugoslavia today. This coal mine, near Zagreb, about 300 miles north of Belgrade, is practically closed and deserted owing to a breakdown of irreplaceable machinery, illustrating how Yugoslavia is further hampered in tapping its right mineral resources. by being equipment-poor. Thus one vicious circle: Machines needed to produce power to produce machines.

The faces of these people whose government is seeking to industrialize are the faces of farmers, men and women who know only the plow, peasants who form the backbone of the country. Russian propaganda leveled at Tito charges that individual peasant farming still predominates in Yugoslavia, and the land is not yet completely nationalized. But Tito, who knows his fate is bound closely to the peasant, proceeds cautiously here.

Tito, like Stalin, also has a plan designed to streamline agriculture.

On farms like this one, while this still looks primitive, the idea is to introduce modern equipment and farming methods to land that often never before felt an iron plow. But pressure to socialize a large segment of the farm population and land has lapsed in the past year, so that today only about one-fourth of Yugoslavia's farmland has come under some form of cooperative, collective state management.

More faces—the faces of Yugoslavia's children, much like children anywhere in whose hands will lie the future of Communist Yugoslavia in the new, untraveled road it has cut out for itself.

With schools like this elementary school in Belgrade, Yugoslavia struggles to meet its youth's educational needs. At the same time it wrestles with the country's economic problems. This school, one of the best, handles 3,000 pupils—pupils from whom must come the future experts now so scarce and so necessary to Yugoslavia's economy, scientific development, and public life. Schooling is compulsory up to high school.

The state, too, in this communized land, has bold programs for the health of its citizens. This modern hospital in Belgrade renders free service to those who cannot pay. Typhoid, malaria, and TB take a high toll in a country that has only 4,000 doctors and needs 16,000.

And these faces? These are the faces of the people's rulers. As the Jones boys put it, "Lots of stuff in Yugoslavia was restricted and the weather was lousy for outdoor shooting, so we tried to concentrate on the political and government angle to show just how this Communist-type government runs."

See this for yourself in scenes never filmed by westerners before through the Jones brothers' cameras.

Yugoslavia's Government is modeled after the Soviet Union. However, the Communist workers' council such as you see meeting here is typically a Yugoslav Communist experiment. The idea—to give to men and women who run the machines in industry and operate the farms the responsibility for management and production.

The basic unit of local government is the people's committee. Every village and every few miles of city area has one. They function in the conspicuous shadow of Tito's giant-size portrait, now no longer inevitably flanked by Father Stalin's.

And now another NBC exclusive. You are looking at scenes no western cameramen have ever been permitted to shoot before. You are in the inner sanctum of the Federal Council—the House of Representatives of Yugoslavia's Congress. Here meet 405 delegates from the 6 republics, roughly analogous to our States, that go to make up the country.

And here are the heads of the Government, the 15 principal ministers—the men who actually do the ruling.

Speaking, Edward Kardelj, former school teacher, now Vice Prime Minister and Foreign Minister, intellectual and political architect of the state. He is called by many Tito's probable successor.

And finally the man whose daring has challenged the Soviet and astonished the world, the man whose determination that his country shall be master of its own fate and shape its destiny to something more than a Soviet satellite makes him, as someone said, the greatest single threat to world communism—Josip-Broz, commonly called Tito, really seven Titos—(1) marshal of the Yugoslav Army and its commander in chief; (2) Minister of National Defense; (3) secretary general of the Yugoslav Communist Party; (4) chairman of the party's central committee; (5) leader of the Yugoslav Politboro; (6) chief of the people's front; and (7) Prime Minister of the Federal People's Republic of Yugoslavia. Of this Tito, Ambassador Allen reports to us.

Hon. GEORGE ALLEN. Probably no single person on Joseph Stalin's purge list has as high a price on his head as Marshal Tito. Stalin would relish his liquidation with a deeper personal satisfaction than anybody else. Stalin has not yet ordered his satellite troops to march, and from this we may gain a very good lesson. That lesson is that determination and a sound military defense are very persuasive arguments these days in favor of peace.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Determined to help those standing up to Russia's ambitions to overrun the world, United States ships are now carrying to Yugoslavia cargoes of needed supplies such as no longer reach her from Russia and her satellites. In addition to sending food, we have loaned Yugoslavia $55,000,000.

We are also exporting information about the United States of America—truthful information about our country to counteract the previous untruthful propaganda about us. In Belgrade's America House American books, magazines, newspapers, phonograph records are finding an eager audience among young and, yes, among old.

But where American democracy is truly making friends and influencing people is through American observers who travel about the country to see if our food is really reaching the people.

Following one such observer with their cameras, the Jones brothers saw him warmly greeted in one of Yugoslavia's rural communities.

He is assisted by an interpreter. The Yugoslav Government provides gas for the jeep.

Here, the exchange of a cigarette—valued highly in an austerity-stricken country—does more for international understanding than a million treaties.

An American hand put in a Yugoslav hand and shaken in warm parting, speaks what is in our heart—America's desire to live in good will and friendship with all the world's peoples.

And who is to say this man and this jeep—America—is not helping peace to prevail?

And now, to close this third NBC Battle Report, Europe, back to our Ambassador to Yugoslavia, George Allen.

Hon. GEORGE ALLEN. One might expect, in the face of the mounting threat, to find the people of Yugoslavia worried and jittery, but the fact is that, while they are naturally concerned about the future, they are by no means jittery. Yugoslavians are a very realistic people, and today we find them quietly courageous and astonishingly determined. Those of us who are able to observe the situation here close at hand are convinced that insofar as the Yugoslavians are concerned, there is no danger at all of a Munich-type settlement here. The Yugoslavians will fight, no matter who the attacker might be nor in what form the attack comes. And the way the Yugoslavians can fight was demonstrated with deadly earnestness during their more than 50 years of service to the public schools of this State.

Many years ago Joe an 'Lanta Pummill selected a quiet wooded plot near Eminence, long known to them, as the site for their dream home. Nine years ago they built a livable, modern house near the crest of a hill, beneath tall, sturdy trees and beside a friendly spring that gurgles around the clock. The house was built for gracious living and it was chinked with pleasant memories. Joe liked to show each convenience to old friends who dropped in, and he was hurt if the guest departed too soon. Complete with birdhouses, fish pool, and winding drives, they called it JoLanta Springs.

There can't be much of Joe in the Salem cemetery. He was too eager, too enthusiastic, to restless in life to remain inactive long. Possibly Joe is walking hill trails with discouraged Ozark boys and girls, offering an encouraging pat on the shoulder. He must be moving through hundreds of schoolrooms, where teachers are unconsciously following his retreating shadow. Could is be that Joe is ringing in a group of heavenly cherubs to a classroom they had to leave suddenly when they were called up? We don't mean to be sacrilegious but, knowing Joe, we can't help wondering.

We never learned what words they cut on his marker, but we are carrying around in our memory a line for Joe. Direct and sincere—as was his life. It goes like this:

Joe Pummill—Teacher—Mission Accomplished.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. ROSS ADAIR

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein a part of a radio presentation delivered by Stella Terrill Mann on Christmas Day, 1950. The address follows:

GOD OR GOVERNMENT?

We come again to celebrating the traditional birthday of the Prince of Peace in a world at war. But there is hope. For never before in the history of man have there been so many people determined to make the world a better place for all men as there are today.

We are on the threshold of the possibilities of the blessings of the atomic age. To use atomic energy only for atomic bombs is about as intelligent as it would be to use electricity only for the electric chair. Our scientists and industrialists say all the other problems for a world of abundance, leisure and culture beyond belief have already been solved except the human relations problems. How to get each man to treat all men as brothers, how to get each man to use the creative spirit of God within him, and not hand over this privilege and responsibility to some one else, is the problem. That is all that stands between our threat of an atomic war today and an atomic age of peace and plenty tomorrow.

It all comes down to one question: Shall we the people look to God or to Government for a better world?

The people want peace. History shows us that governments which have total control of their citizens soon run them into debt and misery. It cannot be otherwise. For men who would control the lives of others are blinded by their own greed, egotism, and arrogance. They do not see that the methods which create abundance work only under freedom. To hide their failures they demand more powers, more taxes, build war machines, wage wars of aggression to steal what they failed to produce, the while promising a better world and permanent peace. It happened to Germany twice in our day, to Italy, to Japan, and is now happening to Russia. Surely not one American mother wants a war in Korea. Yet our Government, without ever declaring war, has taken us into war in Korea. I am sure the Russian people do not want war. It is the Russian Government that wants war.

We must conclude government cannot keep peace. For peace we must look to people, who look to God. For the individual who looks to God for help lives at peace with himself and has good will toward his fellowmen.

We the people want food, necessities, conveniences, and even the luxuries of life for all men. America has the highest standard of living in the world. This is not due to superior resources, land area, or manpower. Russia has more natural resources, the British Empire has more land; China, with one-fourth of the earth's population, has more manpower. America's wealth is the result of our peculiar form of government which always has until the last 20 years or so, left each man alone to find God and to work out his destiny with his own abilities, unhampered. Our motto was, "That governs best which governs least." Under it this country flourished.

America's free religion, science, art, literature, and industry produced abundance. The individual's freedom to criticize, investigate, fail, try again, improve, work as long as he cared to, produced as much as he desired, with a reasonable hope of extra reward for extra effort, is what made America prosperous.

This free Nation under God produced great men and brought genius to us from around the world, here to work freely. Individuals earned fortunes, set up industrial laboratories, built and endowed universities and experiment stations. These institutions perfected know-how that produced an economy of plenty. As for good, free men, asking questions of God, nature, learned to produce 10 bushels, a hundred bushels of wheat or corn where only a few bushels grew before.

But now, in our day, with this Nation under Government regulations we see men paid not to produce, food animals destroyed, food plowed under, burned, to keep up Government fixed, Government controlled, Government forced high prices. The Government's blue potato scandal cost the American people $500,000,000. Government's paper plans for a better world destroyed the increase God had given. Little men, presuming to know more than God, flung back God's plan for plenty in favor of their own human wisdom. Meanwhile, millions go hungry. Such crimes against nature will not go unpunished. We shall all suffer for it; those who committed the crime and we, the people—who permitted it.

Communist Russia, the world's supreme example of a totally governed people, is violently anti-God, believes only in government—in men, as means of a better world. Russia rants that the Western Powers are "materialistic." This makes a strong appeal to many idealists who do not think it through. For the fact remains that the total benefit to be derived from Russia's better world plan is a wholly materialistic one—more bread for more people. But she promises it only at the expense of all else. She demands that the individual give up his mental, physical, spiritual, social freedom. He is forced to become both liar and coward. He must deny God, himself and his brother man. He is robbed of life if his party superiors deem it necessary in order that the government plans might go through.

The Russian Government is breeding poverty and stagnation by cutting off plenty and growth at the fountainhead, the creative spirit which God planted in every man. Russia's leaders do not see that the purpose of life is not merely more bread but more of total livingness. Man does not live by bread alone, but by giving free outlet to all those qualities and abilities which make of him not only a man, but an individual man, different from all other men. When a free man works with God for his own benefit he develops himself by working without limitation, fear, or hate. When he succeeds, all the world benefits.

The evidence is all around us: Government cannot produce a higher standard of living. Government has no productive power. Government has only force of law, police powers, backed up by punishment, the ultimate of which is death. Unlimited production results only from unlimited thinking, unlimited effort, unlimited love of individuals who believe man is unlimited when he works under freedom and justice. For that, we must look to people who look to God.

To look to God for help is an old American custom. All of America's greatest men including Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln looked to God for help. America was settled by people who wanted less of government and more of God. Our republican form of government came out of the Bible. Benjamin Franklin reminded the disagreeing framers of our Constitution they needed guidance of God and moved that they have prayer every morning before the business session opened. His motion carried and from that day, the work went on smoothly.

George Washington Carver tells us he walked in the woods and fields asking questions of God. He said, "Anything will give up its secrets if you love it enough." The totalitarian government controlled experiment conceived in hate, born of fear, has neither time nor inclination for loving investigation.

Henry Ford did not look to government but to God for a personal fortune and a better world. He once said he kept a Bible in every room so he could always have one at hand wherever he sat down. We are not surprised to learn the announced purpose of the $238,000,000 Ford Foundation, largest in the world, is to help create a better world by studying problems of human relations and finding a way to end war.

The Christians are only one group of Americans who believe in looking to God for help. Desiring a better world for all men these Christians have as individuals sent billions of dollars around the world for schools, churches, hospitals, food, clothing, shelter. They have put the Bible into 150 languages and 50 nations.

Everywhere the people who believe in God are trying to stop governments, mere men, from taking away rights and liberties of individuals. If governments succeed in further controls, civilization will go backward. We shall have war. Since it is a self-evident truth that all men are created equal, no

UNITED STATES LACKS AIM IN KOREA—NO EARLY END SEEN TO LIMITED WAR—AMERICAN PEOPLE BECOME MORE IMPATIENT

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

The controversy over General of the Army Douglas MacArthur has had at least one beneficial result; it has served to dramatize and define one of the basic problems we now face in the Orient—how to end the Korean War.

This problem is bound to become more acute as the weeks pass, as the American toll of casualties becomes bigger and bigger, and as no clear end to the fighting appears. Americans are an impatient people, as Lieut. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway, General MacArthur's successor, has noted. They can take casualties when there is a clear and stated objective, but if no such objective is apparent their national impatience is certain to manifest itself.

Yet it is clear that, as of today, we have no clear-cut objective in Korea; there does not appear to be any quick political or military end in sight to the fighting; we have the bull by the tail and don't know how to let go.

The normal objective of military operations is to destroy the enemy's armed forces, or, as the Air Force would prefer to put it, to destroy the enemy nation's will and capacity to resist. Under present conditions neither is possible in Korea.

LIMITED WAR BEING FOUGHT

We are fighting a limited war there—a war limited geographically by the Yalu River on the Manchurian frontier and limited, in the amount of force we are willing to commit, approximately by the dimensions of the present army. We have had, since mid-January, our period of greatest success, as measured by our casualties as compared to the enemy's. Yet the United States alone has been suffering battle casualties in this period at the rate of about 1,200 weekly.

Our total battle casualties—now approximately 60,000 killed, wounded, prisoners, and missing since the Korean War started—probably would be swollen to considerably more than 100,000, if accidental casualties such as motor accidents and plane crashes, frostbite, disease, etc., were included. One hundred thousand total casualties in 9 months of war is a sizable price to pay for a limited conflict in which no decision against the two major aggressors in the Orient—Communist Russia and Communist China—is possible.

There is, moreover, no proof whatsoever that our objective since January 15, defined as "homicidal and not geographical," is really paying off in terms of weakening Communist China. It is certain that Red China is a nation under strain; it is probable that Peiping's preoccupation with the Korean fighting has diverted its attention from more vulnerable areas of possible Communist aggression in Asia.

RED CHINA NOW STRONGER

But a case can be made that Communist China is militarily stronger today than it was when it intervened in Korea last October. It has mobilized more manpower; Russian material aid has been increased and the Chinese Communist air force certainly is much stronger.

The administration, Britain and other of our United Nations allies have expressed the hope, which seems fatuous against our background of experience to date in Korea, that the enemy may be willing to negotiate and to end the Korean campaign.

It is entirely conceivable that Peiping and Moscow may indeed interpret the MacArthur removal as an invitation to negotiate, although it seems unlikely that any such attempt will be made until the enemy offensive, generally expected in two or three weeks, has shot its bolt, and perhaps has driven us back south of the thirty-eighth parallel.

ROTATION SYSTEM STARTS

But even if the enemy achieves no decisive success in any new blows he may launch against us, any negotiations the Communists are willing to undertake will almost certainly be based on the old familiar formula, a place for Communist China in the United Nations and the surrender of Formosa to Peiping. If we accept such terms they can mean only an oriental Munich; not a prevention of general war, but merely a postponement of it, and at terms that will be extremely disadvantageous to us. Negotiations, therefore, do not appear hopeful at present.

Yet despite, or perhaps because of, the fact that no end is in sight in Korea, and in the face of an impending enemy offensive, the Army has started a rotation system for our soldiers there. The system will in a few weeks take 500 experienced and battle-hardened men a day away from the Eighth Army. In other words, the Eighth Army will be losing shortly the equivalent of virtually a division a month in trained fighting men, and these men will be replaced by green replacements from the States.

The men in Korea need rest, but the rotation system is still based on the faulty individual replacement basis that caused so much harm in World War II. It will mean, if it is carried out, the virtual disruption of some of our combat units in Korea, just as the point system tore apart our Army after the end of World War II.

It is clear, too, as spring and the season of intensified fighting comes in Korea that the United States and othe United Nations powers that are fighting in Korea are deeply divided not only about Korea and what the course of action should be there, but about far-eastern policy in general.

General MacArthur's sudden replacement, therefore, is certain to dramatize the need for some definite answers to pressing questions.

Are we getting anywhere in Korea, or are we becoming more deeply mired in a strategic morass?

How can the Korean War be ended?

What should our foreign policy be in Asia?

These questions—and their answers—are the key to the great debate that took flame Wednesday when the American "proconsul" in Tokyo ended his military career.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an article from the March 1951 issue of Missouri Schools by Forrest E. Wolverton, editor of the publication. The article, entitled "Mission Accomplished," is a worthy and merited tribute to a master teacher, a valuable citizen, a noble character, and an appreciative friend.

MISSION ACCOMPLISHED

Down in Shannon County they closed the schoolhouse door on Joe Pummill for the last time. There were flowers and music and the Word.

It happened May 13, but the editor only recently learned of his passing. We had missed him around the department offices. We missed his broad, tall form, strong as the sturdy oaks that grew from his planting at JoLanta Springs. But most of all we missed the bright, sincere smile, warm as reflected sunshine from the southern slope of his native hills. It was a good smile. It had to be, because he kept it going through 45 years of school teaching.

Joe would be amused and a little embarrassed if he thought anyone was calling him a master teacher. Yet, in the editor's book he is so listed. Not because he was a scholar, as his long time membership in Phi Delta Kappa attested. Not because of his technical skill, which his professional degrees established. Important as these things are, they are not enough to make the teacher a master. Joe opened little minds, tightly closed by ignorance and superstition. He fanned faint sparks of ambition into sturdy flames of success. He handled spirited youngsters with a tight rein, but in the manner that the driver of thoroughbreds encourages and coaxes rather than restrains. He could "light a shuck" beneath the indolent, and love them none-the-less. He infected his pupils with his own joy in learning, and he shared his rich storehouse of knowledge with thousands of boys and girls. Joe listened when famous educators explained new systems of pedagogy, but it was he who went back home and directed the learning of the young.

Joe could put on a pair of scuffed shoes and strike out across fields and woods with some Ozark boy or girl, bent on a mission to convince Pop and Mom that high school wasn't "foolishment" for a "purt-nigh grown man or woman." He did. No one will ever know just how many bright boys and girls Joe found in dark hill cabins where environment was slowly stifling real talent, undiscovered and uncultivated. Nor can anyone know how many hours he spent sitting in hickory-bark chairs, around stone fireplaces, explaining to a suspicious parent just how high-school training could be the golden key that unlocks the door to success for talented youngsters. No one can really know, but in 45 years of trying there would have to be many. The editor can think offhand of a dozen successful professional people who owe their start to Joe's gentle pushing.

Joe's experience ran the gamut of positions in the teaching field. He was both a teacher and a State supervisor of rural schools; he was a high-school teacher, superintendent, and State supervisor of high schools. He was a statistician in the Jefferson City office of the State department of education, and he taught classes in college. He taught the children; he taught the children's teachers, then he went out and supervised these teachers on the job. He worked 19 years in one position; 25 years teaching with his wife, Atlanta. That's about all there is for a teacher to do.

The editor recalls that Joe was uncomfortable when he had to ask for special approval of substandard teachers. He was most professionally minded. Neither could Joe follow the easy philosophy of expediency. Rather than sign reports that he knew were inaccurate, he would prefer to give up his position. He did.

Joe loved life and knew how to enjoy it. Atlanta says that she cannot recall a day when he did not say it was great to be alive and he was so fortunate. He was almost never ill. His interests, avocationally, were many and varied. Old-timers recall that around the Ozark hard-ball loop Joe was a whiz. He supported school athletics with interest—but honesty. Active in church work and other community affairs, he was closing the annual drive for funds for the cancer society when the last bell rang for him. He liked to recognize individual worth when he found it. Among the papers in his desk administrators discovered a fine tribute to a long-time coworker, Mrs. Ida Seaman, of Eminence, who recently closed man should look to men for peace and progress, but to God. We cannot trust our welfare to human egotism, frailty, or lack of wisdom that ends in secret agreements and acts that we, the people, will have to pay for in taxes, freedom, and lives.

What we must have is a people's peace. When we get that all else will follow naturally. But we must first have peace before we can go forward, one world, under God. We can get that peace only by turning to God. For when we look to God we unify ourselves with the Creative Spirit of the universe. We work then with the Mind that created the world and man; with the Love that is mindful of man. He who made the ear, can He not hear? When we look to God we do not want to control or exploit our neighbor. Instead, we want to give him the greatest possible amount of freedom. When we look to God we free ourselves. When we look to government for help we enslave ourselves; we sell our birthright of freedom for a temporary mess of pottage. All over the world the people are awakening to this fact.

You and I, individuals, can put an end to Government dictatorships that lead to war, poverty, and misery. The individual who works with God cannot fail. Gandhi, one individual, whipped the British Empire with love and peaceful resistance. His faith moved mountains of opposition. He, an individual, opened the way for India's freedom.

If one man will today make up his mind that he will get behind the Russian iron curtain and tell the truth about freedom and America to the Russian people, it will be done. When he gets there, he will find God and the people waiting to welcome him. For one man and truth is mightier than the whole Russian Government and its lies. For good is not accomplished by "might nor by power but by my spirit, saith Jehovah."

God or government? How long shall we halt between two decisions? Let us this day begin a one-person campaign for a people's peace through love and prayer. Let each of us set aside 5 minutes of every day to pray for individual and world peace. Presently we shall see it go national, then world-wide, covering every minute of the 24 hours. We shall get peace, then a better world for all men. I have set 3 o'clock every afternoon as my time to turn to God. Will you join me, my friend?

Show-Down on Water

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, this editorial from the Los Angeles Times of April 11, 1951, clearly points out the danger that confronts western reclamation in the fantastic central Arizona project bill now pending in the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee:

THIS IS THE SHOW-DOWN ON WATER

This is the supreme moment in southern California's long struggle over the water of the Colorado River.

In Washington this week the final decisive events are shaping in the United States Senate and House of Representatives. At issue is the so-called $738,000,000 central Arizona project, around which revolves the entire great controversy over use of Colorado River water.

No longer can southern Californians shut their eyes to the danger that confronts them.

DECISION IMMINENT

The decision probably is to be made in the next few days.

And Arizona definitely is sweeping toward a political offensive of unprecedented ferocity, entirely unmindful of legal, moral, or financial considerations. The plain truth is that the apathy of California may result in a permanent crippling of the future of this State, unless there is an immediate awakening.

In its simplest terms the whole question has resolved itself into a startling combination of fanatical zeal on one side and sleepy indifference on the other. Arizonians have joined in a holy crusade to put over their objective. Most Californians don't even know what it is all about and are too bored to find out.

The awakening for residents of this area and, indeed, for the taxpayers of the whole United States is going to be cruel and bitter, indeed, if Arizona succeeds in its aims.

The central Arizona project is easily explained.

It is an attempt, by political pressure, to force through Congress a scheme so far-fetched and fabulously costly that many people literally have been unable to grasp its preposterousness.

ARIZONA'S PROPOSAL

Arizona is asking, in a bill known as S. 75, that more than 1,000,000 acre-feet (325,000,000,000 gallons) a year be diverted from the Colorado River at Parker Dam, be raised 1,000 feet by pump lift and be run through hundreds of miles of canals to the central Arizona section around Phoenix. The area is to be benefited consists of about 500,000 acres.

The Interior Department has estimated that the interest charges on the project would toal more than $2,000,000,000.

It admittedly is impossible for the relatively small population of central Arizona to pay the costs. These would have to be borne by the taxpayers of the United States.

Thus the project is not reclamation in the always-accepted sense that an area needing water contracts for it and pays back the costs in 40 or 50 years. Instead, it is straight subsidy out of the United States Treasury.

California always has paid her way in water projects, such as the Metropolitan Water District Aqueduct from the Colorado River.

Why should Arizonans be supported from the United States Treasury when Californians and all other westerners stand on their own feet and pay their bills in a regular business way?

This matter involves no question of the right to the water itself. Arizona may or may not have a legally sound claim to the 1,250,000 acre-feet of water in controversy. Only the Supreme Court can decide that issue.

But, regardless of whether Arizona or California owns the water, the present question is solely one of the attempt to provide for its use at a cost of more than $2,000,000,000.

And here is where Arizona's sheer political effrontery comes in.

Democratic Senator HAYDEN is chairman of the Rules Committee, Democratic Senator MCFARLAND is floor leader, They carry tremendous power.

JUSTICE FOR CALIFORNIA

California, on the other hand, has only justice and right on her side. Her contracts are threatened without benefit of a court decision; her water future is jeopardized by sheer political steam rolling. Her only recourse is to acquaint Senators and Representatives from other States with the truth and the financial facts.

It should be a powerful argument in New York or Pennsylvania or Illinois or Texas to know that the residents of those States and all the other States are going to have to pay more than $2,000,000,000 to support Arizona.

Of course Arizona needs the water. It is hard hit by drought. So is California. But the rules of common sense and fair play still have to prevail in both States.

Legally established contracts must be fulfilled. Normal standards of reclamation and business must be met.

California asks no more and will accept no less.

But the immediate political threat must be met in Congress with every weapon of truth and reason that can be mustered. The fight still can be won, if Californians will awake.

A Sorry Day in Infamy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. ROSS ADAIR
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein a part of an editorial which appeared in the Fort Wayne News-Sentinel under date of April 11, 1951, and my response thereto:

A SORRY DAY IN INFAMY

President Truman has capped a career already replete with blunders with the most tragic blunder of them all in firing General MacArthur from his far-eastern commands.

Never was the tragedy of a small-minded county politician sitting at the head of the greatest Nation on earth more apparent. Never has executive infamy reached such a low. Never has it so endangered the future of the world.

The Pendergast machine product is showing his real colors as never before. President Truman should be impeached. The sooner Congress gets on with it the better.

To that end, the News-Sentinel today has wired Indiana's Senators and Representatives as follows:

"In the light of the shockingly tragic discharge of Gen. Douglas MacArthur, we urge the immediate impeachment of President Truman and Secretary of State Acheson. The honor of the United States before the anti-communistic world demands no less a step."

It is characteristic of the crudeness of a Chief Executive who would like to go around punching people's noses that General MacArthur, with 50 years of long and distinguished service as a soldier, received his first dismissal notice over the Armed Forces radio newscast.

Could it be that General MacArthur, by making forthright statements on the Asiatic situation of which he is an acknowledged authority, was deliberately forcing an intolerable situation to a head? Knowing the personal risks involved, did he invite recall or reprimand for the larger purpose of bringing the issue into clearer focus?

Whether so intending, General MacArthur, statesman, world policeman, and military leader, has brought this about, with backhanded cooperation from an inane President.

General MacArthur's recall is a great loss to Japan where he was revered as statesman and soldier. It will render an already explosive situation even more explosive. It will be hailed in the Kremlin as a great victory for the cause of communism. Mac-

Arthur has long been a symbol of the anti-Communist forces.

MacArthur's dismissal means that Dean Acheson is still in the saddle. Indeed the sickly conciliatory order of recall might well have been composed by the Secretary of State.

Japan is now understandably shaken in its confidence of the United States whose weak and vacillating position is evidenced by the Communist infiltration, if not open attack. Japan now becomes an inviting target for Communist infiltration, if not upon attack. The fine relationship between our country and Japan, built, by General MacArthur's genius as an occupying commander, has been imperiled by one mad stroke of the Truman pen.

General MacArthur is the victim of too many rear seat drivers. The mixed command in which he found himself was intolerable from the first. Unhappily he was expected to reconcile the American way with the UN way, an impossible task.

General MacArthur's stature gains in his dismissal. The American people are with him.

A Harry Truman firing a Douglas MacArthur, in the perspective of time, will approximate the effect of a Pekinese snapping at a St. Bernard.

STATEMENT OF CONGRESSMAN E. ROSS ADAIR, APRIL 12, 1951, ON PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S DISMISSAL OF GENERAL MACARTHUR

This is indeed a dark day in American history.

The President's peremptory dismissal of General MacArthur is deplorable. It has thoroughly aroused the American people. Their denunciation of our irresponsible and incompetent leadership is bitter. Many have urged impeachment proceedings.

All wonder what his next foolish step will be to jeopardize further our Nation's security.

Truman's impetuous demonstration of authority as Commander in Chief in removing General MacArthur amounts to capitulation to the demands of the Chinese Communists and the British Socialists in the Far East. Asia is in danger of being turned over to the aggressors. It could mean that we have sacrificed in vain the blood of 60,000 American soldiers to Truman-Acheson diplomacy. The sell-out to the Communists which was begun at Yalta and Tehran has now taken its next logical step.

General MacArthur guided our military forces to victory in the Pacific in World War II. He carried out the high ideals of our Nation in establishing the peace in Japan. After the President brashly plunged us into the Korean war, he relied upon MacArthur to lead the United Nations against the Communist aggressors. Now, he brusquely casts that trusted leader aside because he dared tell the truth about our blunders in Asia.

I have consistently attacked the foreign policies of this administration as being contrary to the best interests of our country. After this tragic demonstration, I am more than ever opposed to permitting the destiny of America to continue in the hands of diplomats of the Acheson-Hiss stripe.

Even though the President has dismissed General MacArthur from his post, that shall not stop our demands for a reversal of our foreign policy. To make this possible we must have the support of some members of the Democratic Party which is in control of Congress.

For the good of our Nation and in order to prevent further assumption of powers by the President, this must be done.

The battle to save our country and protect the freedom-loving nations of the world from aggressive totalitarianism must be won here. Continued irresponsible leadership can lose it.

Farm Price Controls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CLARK W. THOMPSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the Congress will soon be faced with the necessity for extending price and wage controls beyond their present expiration date of June 30, 1951. One of the questions sure to come up is what to do about fixing price ceilings on agricultural commodities. Some will want to continue the present policy of not allowing these ceilings to be placed below parity; others will want to do away with this restriction.

A teacher of vocational agriculture in my district has written me on the general subject of farm income, expenses, and profits. His letter presents the point of view of the small farmer, and he cites figures on the production of hogs, beef, and eggs, to substantiate his statement. I think the letter is worthy of consideration by all Members of Congress, and I take pleasure in inserting it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

DEAR SIR: There is much talk today about regulating farm prices. As a teacher of vocational agriculture I have an opportunity to see the farmers' cost of production from many angles. I also find it hard to teach at the present time because of price uncertainties. The veterans that I teach seem to be wondering if their efforts toward expansion and becoming established on the farm may lead to failure.

I realize that it is next to impossible to see the farmer's situation all the way from Washington and to get the best qualified men to work on farm price controls. As the veterans and I see it price controls could do much more harm than good. It is hard to believe that price controls will work on anything but finished products.

The class and I have endeavored to work up the basic commodities in our community in order to give you a clearer picture of what we farmers are up against. I find that many farmers do not realize what their cost of production is, and as a result produce that commodity at a loss. As a result the market price is lowered still more. Maybe our education program for farmers has failed to get results, or maybe the educators aren't going about the job the right way. What a farmer needs to know is what it is costing him per pound, dozen, bushel, or hundredweight to produce that certain commodity. This information is difficult to find written in farmer language, or even in teacher language.

The enclosed figures have been figured on the high side instead of the low side. The average farmer would not make that much profit on the particular commodity. Cotton and beef cattle have not been figured due to such a great variation in production per acre. As for cotton it will cost the farmer between 20 and 30 cents per pound to produce a pound of cotton. If a farmer clears $35 per acre he is doing good. Beef cattle is the rich man's enterprise. The large cattleman is where he is today because he inherited the money or business, he is an oil man, or he has been in the business many years and has seen many hard times. The veterans that I teach aren't in this class. They are struggling trying to get established.

It is hoped that this bit of information will help you see the picture as we farmers see it. As long as there is no shortage of food and basic items why control prices? If necessary we can send you the middle man's mark-up on farm commodities. I am sure that you realize this though.

Yours truly,

Hog production

[Feeding 200 head of hogs to 225 pounds market weight]

Expenses:
Cost of feeder pigs $7 each	$1,400

Profit per hog	6.05
Profit per day	6.72

Beef production

[Feeding 50 head of beef steers, starting weight 250 pounds, for 120 days]

Expenses:
Cost of steers (250 pounds each)	$4,375
Cost of feed:
Concentrates, 1,440 pounds at $4.75 per hundred	3,420

Sale of old birds, $1 each	400.00
Total income	2,733.20
Net loss not including labor or gasoline	92.80

To make a profit today on eggs, the egg average per hen must be at least 200 eggs. Many egg producers don't get that many eggs.

McCarthyism Is Good for Achesonitis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN
OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, it was just about a year ago that the administration was in the white heat of perhaps its greatest effort in moving heaven and earth to prevent the exposure of the Soviet dictated Tehran-Yalta-Potsdam line it had been following in far-eastern policy for several years that finally resulted in the loss of China to the free world.

Against an avalanche of opposition, Senator JOSEPH MCCARTHY, of Wisconsin, pressed for an investigation which, of course, the Tydings committee never really conducted.

Following is speech of Alfred Kohlberg given April 3, 1951, at the Lost Battalion Hall, Queens, New York City, which I wish to include in my remarks:

MCCARTHYISM AND KOREA

(By Alfred Kohlberg)

Recently, before a panel of the American Civil Liberties Union in Washington, Senator LEHMAN said:

"The black evil of McCarthyism has captured the imagination of the American people."

That's the most encouraging statement I've heard out of Senator LEHMAN since way back when he backslid from Wall Street and landed way down in the New Deal.

What is McCarthyism?

Very simply put, it consists of exposing disloyalty, dishonesty, and actual treason in Government, and demanding something be done about it, now, before it's too late.

McCarthyism is a very old American custom. It is an age-old American determination to get rid of traitors and grafters and disloyal servants.

You all remember the fall of France to Hitler, in just 6 weeks of June and July of 1940. You remember how it became known that a Nazi fifth column and a Communist fifth column, working together under the Hitler-Stalin pact, had undermined the French Army and Air Force. Even the Minister for Air was suspected of being a member of the Communist conspiracy. The French cried: "Nous sommes trahui" (We are betrayed.) But it was too late.

France had had a McCarthy. His name was de Kerillis. But they would not listen.

You all remember how Czechoslovakia was seized from within in 2 days of 1948. After it was over, Foreign Minister Fierlinger and other high officials revealed that they had been secret Communists all the time. Czechoslovakia fell for lack of a McCarthy in time.

When suspicion pointed to Gen. George Washington's close friend and favorite officer, Gen. Benedict Arnold, he said nothing about "red herrings" or "not turning his back," but had him watched and broke up the conspiracy. Just a little early-American McCarthyism.

During World War I President Woodrow Wilson said:

"We do not need less criticism in time of war, but more. Honesty and competence need no shield of secrecy."

Let me repeat that: "Honesty and competence"—and, I might add, loyalty to one's country—"need no shield of secrecy." Sounds just like JOE MCCARTHY; doesn't it?

Shortly after Wilson's death, during the moral let-down with which we seem to indulge ourselves after each war, two Democratic Senators charged corruption in the Teapot Dome leases. Anticipating Democratic President Truman and Attorney General McGrath, 26 years later, Republican Attorney General Dougherty called it a "red herring" and refused to open the files. But Republican President Coolidge, in the American tradition, fired the Attorney General and opened the files. As a result his Secretary of the Interior and several others went to jail. McCarthyism triumphed.

We badly needed some good old American McCarthyism when the Reds and pinkoes in the State Department were making the deals at Moscow, and Tehran, and Quebec, and Yalta, and Potsdam, that sold out Poland and Yugoslavia and all Eastern Europe, and China, too.

We suffered from lack of some active McCarthyism when Alger Hiss was put in charge of organizing the UN and being its first Secretary General, and when he sat behind President Roosevelt's chair at Yalta. Also when he was Dean Acheson's right-hand man in firing the anti-Reds out of the State Department in 1944 and 1945, as testified to under oath by Assistant Secretary of State Adolf Berle.

There should have been a little sample of McCarthyism back in 1942, when Under Secretary of War Robert P. Patterson cleared Nathan Gregory Silvermaster for access to top secrets, over the objections of Major General Strong, head of Army Intelligence.

And, when General Eisenhower ordered General Patton to stop 30 miles from Prague, and General Keating 30 miles from Berlin, so the slowpoke Russians could have both prizes. And then ordered our troops to draw back from Jachimov in Czechoslovakia, and from Thuringia and Saxony, in Germany.

Only later we began to learn that the Erzegebirge area lies in Jachimov and Thuringia and Saxony. And it's from the Erzegebirge that Russia is now getting its uranium. Maybe when the atom bombs fall, we'll realize just how sad it was that JOE MCCARTHY was flying in the Marine Air Force in the Pacific at that time, instead of raising hell in Washington.

We needed a MCCARTHY when Lauchlin Currie, secretary to President Truman, countermanded the order from the Joint Chiefs of Staff to General Eisenhower, to send surrendered German arms and ammunition to Chiang Kai-shek. It was all destroyed, instead.

And, MCCARTHY was still in the Pacific when somebody ordered destruction of all the Chinese lend-lease ammunition at the end of the war. The Army admits the destruction, but we don't know who ordered it.

When Henry Wallace went to China in 1944 with three famous pro-Reds, Owen Lattimore, John Carter Vincent, and John Hazard, he secretly reported to President Roosevelt, but his secret reports were omitted from the famous China white paper. Senator HERBERT O'CONOR, of Maryland, got one of them from Mr. Wallace, and made it public. It's refrain was "Chiang must go." O'CONOR having accomplished that much, we now turn to MCCARTHY to find the Guru behind Henry Wallace that time.

That mention of John Carter Vincent, brings to mind his recent demotion from Minister to Switzerland, to be Consul-General in the dirty little North African town of Tangier. The Washington scuttle-butt on this strange proceeding is that Vincent was caught leaking secret information to the Soviets; that prosecution was demanded by Gen. Bedell Smith, but that the State Department prevailed on him to be satisfied with Vincent's demotion. Then General Smith is supposed to have come into possession of a letter from Secretary Acheson to Vincent saying he had done all he could to protect him, but this demotion was the best he could do. I don't know whether this story is true, or not. If Americans are to have any faith at all in their State Department, and if Vincent and Acheson are to be cleared, nothing but the most thorough McCarthyism, and exposure of all pertinent facts, can bring that about.

Going back to China, who planned the Marshall mission to make Chiang take the commies into his government? Maybe, considering how many Communists we have in ours, it all seemed perfectly fair to General Marshall at the time.

And, who wrote the Truman message of December 15, 1945, saying: "No aid to China unless the Communists are taken in." And, who induced General Marshall to put an airtight embargo on all arms and ammunition to Chiang Kai-shek all during 1946, 1947, and 1948—the crucial years? General Marshall, referring to the embargo, is reported to have said: "As Chief of Staff, I armed over 30 Chinese divisions. By a stroke of the pen I have disarmed them."

And, who, just last year, put the ORO, the Operations Research Office of the Department of the Army, under the School of International Studies of John Hopkins University? The ORO is the super-secret research outfit that evaluates the effectiveness of weapons and has first access to all super-secret weapon developments. And, guess who is head of that Hopkins School of International Studies—none other than Owen Lattimore. That was only last year. You seem to have missed out on that one, Senator. Maybe, you cannot cover the whole waterfront. Maybe, we badly need more JOE MCCARTHYS.

I could go on with instances like this all evening, but I'm supposed to talk about China and Korea.

Korea is only a little peninsula that hangs down from Manchuria, which is a part of China. And the story of China cries aloud for some McCarthyism, and also more MacArthurism.

At the end of World War II, America counted 108,000 dead and 350,000 wounded in the Pacific. But we were unconditionally victorious, and the victory was ours, alone. The British and Anzacs had only token forces. The Russians came in only for the last 5 days, to grab what they could. The Chinese fought for 8 years, and suffered fantastic losses, but theirs was mainly a holding action.

The victory was ours. And every one of the billion people of Asia understood it perfectly, even if the American State Department didn't.

Shortly after VJ-day our supreme commander forwarded a report to the War Department, evaluating the armed forces in China. He reported the Chinese Communists had between 125,000 and 250,000 guerrilla troops, badly armed. Under his command were 4,000,000 Chinese regulars, and the American-Chinese Air Force.

He proposed that, with Chinese Government agreement, America guarantee the personal safety of the Communist leaders, and their right to participate as a legal political party in free elections under American supervision, after peace was restored. For this, they were to lay down their arms. If the Communists refused to agree, he proposed that he surround and disarm them by force. Dozens of officials of the Army, Air Force, Navy, Marines, and OSS saw that report. Our commander's proposal was exactly in accordance with the Atlantic Charter and the four freedoms, for which we claimed to be fighting.

Decision on this report was postponed. The next month, Ambassador Pat Hurley returned, and resigned, for reasons never made public.

General Marshall was appointed, and on December 11 sat down with Dean Acheson to write out the instructions President Truman was to give him. According to the general's testimony, the rough draft was sent over to this same John Carter Vincent to be polished up. The instructions were the exact opposite of the Supreme Commander's recommendations. They demanded practical control of the Government of China by the Communists, without an election, and while they kept their army.

Right there, a good dose of McCarthyism was needed to find out who overruled the plan to prevent a civil war in China. Was he the same man who now has turned that Chinese civil war that didn't need to happen into a Chinese-American war? And, is he the same man who now ties General MacArthur's hand, so that he may not bomb Manchuria, and so he may not use the troops of Chiang Kai-shek, either in Korea or to establish a second front in China, and who orders the Seventh Fleet to protect the coast of Red China so the oil and cotton and steel and copper and tools and ammunition may flow in to kill our sons in Korea? Just last week, the new commander of the Seventh Fleet, Vice Adm. Harold M. Martin, stated that it was his duty to protect the coast of Red China.

Ever since that December 11, 1945, President Truman, Dean Acheson, and General Marshall have been jointly and separately in complete control of our China policy. The blame, or the credit, for everything from the civil war that didn't need to happen in China to the 60,000 American casualties in the present United Nations civil war in Korea is entirely theirs.

If, like the French, we are not some day to cry out when it is too late, "We are betrayed," then we must have scores of Joe McCarthys in the Senate and a George Washington, or Woodrow Wilson, or Cal Coolidge in the White House to open up the files. We, the people, are the rulers of America. Who are these hired servants who say we may not check on the way they are running and have run our affairs?

We need a million little McCarthys, like you and me, to demand a clean-up that's long overdue, to dig out the facts, to exonerate the innocent, to convict the Soviet agents, and to fire their dupes. Senator, is this a private fight, or can we all get in it, too?

You all know that sometimes in the fall you hear the scurrying of little feet in the walls and attic and find signs of mice in the garret. You may not see any mice to point at, but you know they are there, and you set the traps or call in the exterminators.

The sign of mice or rats are apparent all over our national structure. Due to congressional pressure, a couple of the rats named by Whittaker Chambers and Elizabeth Bentley were finally convicted, 11 years too late. But more than 30 others named by Chambers and Bentley have not even been arrested and are going about their regular business. And their regular business is bad business for us.

Just one illustration of what they put over is Gen. Omar Bradley's statement of no aid to Chiang Kai-shek. He says if we arm Chiang's forces and land them on the beaches they'll go right over to the Communists. Here is General Bradley, a good American, with no personal knowledge of China, being hoodwinked into a complete Communist-line statement. The facts are simple, and his own Intelligence Department must have them, but somebody is keeping them from him.

The facts are that all but a few thousand local volunteers of Chiang's 700,000 troops on Formosa are mainland boys. They fought their way, short of arms, and practically without ammunition, to coastal ports in 1949, when the Nationalists were overwhelmed. I saw some of these men being landed when I was in Formosa in July 1949. Wounded, sick, defeated, in rags, they had fought their way out. Yet, somebody makes General Bradley believe that they would go over to the Communists now. Because of this theory, we won't let any anti-Communist Chinese fight on our side. It looks like a very exclusive war out there—for Americans only.

While we wait and do nothing, the rats are double-crossing our sons fighting in Korea; they are double-crossing the only native anti-Communist armed force in all East Asia—the 700,000 men and 2,000,000 guerrillas of Chiang Kai-shek. And they are preparing a slow-appeasement deal in the UN, while they tie General MacArthur's hands behind him, and now gag him besides.

It's high time to set plenty of traps and also to call in that famous firm of rat exterminators, the Messrs. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY and company.

Who Is Responsible for Our Far-Eastern Policy?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the question has been properly raised as to who is actually responsible for our far-eastern policy. Time and again it has been apparent that some of our supposed allies have shown a desire to appease Red China. In many instances it has gone beyond appeasement and taken on the aspect of actual help. Recognition of Red China by Great Britain, the shipment of strategic material, even the sending of jet engines to Russia, and many other acts of similar character by nations members of the United Nations have made our war in Korea more difficult, is undisputed. Thus, the question naturally arises to what extent has foreign influence brought about a willingness upon the part of our administration to participate in the appeasement policy toward Red China.

Two editorials appearing today in the News, Washington, D. C., shed some light on this important question I include them as a part of my remarks in accordance with the unanimous consent granted to me. They read as follows:

LONDON-MADE POLICIES

Two basic issues were involved in the controversy which led to President Truman's dismissal of General MacArthur:

1. The restrictions which compelled the general to conduct a war of limited operations against Red China.

2. The relative importance of Asia in the conflict with communism.

Lt. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway is a thoroughly capable officer. But his Korean command wears the same handcuffs that chafed General MacArthur.

The President is gambling on the assumption that peace can be achieved by letting the Chinese Reds off with an easy war. The politicians in Washington, London, and New Delhi are to have their inning before further consideration is given to the question of pushing the war to a successful military conclusion.

Meanwhile, Mr. Truman is risking fearful odds in not reinforcing our troops to meet the enemy's spring offensive, if pending peace proposals fail. A bad guess could lead to a military catastrophe. Adequate insurance should be taken so that our forces are not caught in a trap.

The issue between General MacArthur and the State Department on our policy in Asia involves the security of the United States in a much larger field.

In making the original decision to resist the Red attack in South Korea, President Truman apparently intended to extend the Atlantic Pact doctrine to the Pacific area by drawing a line against Communist aggression everywhere. The United Nations supported that position when it adopted military sanctions against the invading Communists.

The British Foreign Office, however, persuaded the State Department to scrap that policy in favor of one of appeasement the moment Red China entered the war.

Britain traditionally has regarded Asia as a field for commercial exploitation, and has relatively little concern for the welfare of the Asiatic peoples. Against that background it is understandable why an impoverished Britain, now governed by a Pacifist-Socialist regime, should adopt a one-ocean defense program in the search for a cheap and limited security. But how can any American statesman or military leader defend such a strategic concept for a country which has both Pacific and Atlantic coasts?

General MacArthur raised this question again and again without getting a satisfactory answer.

Three years ago, Secretary of State Acheson dismissed the idea of a Pacific defense pact as "premature." Since that time the State Department has accepted the Downing Street thesis that Europe should have first priority in all measures adopted to contain communism, despite the fact that it was in Asia where we first became involved in World War II. And despite the fact that we are now engaged in a shooting war in Asia.

Britain has lost most of her great Indian Empire, so today is willing to trade Formosa to the Reds in the hope of buying immunity for her crown colony at Hong Kong. In General MacArthur's view—and who knows the Pacific area better?—Formosa is as important to us as France when American security is considered. The Japanese used Formosa as the springboard for their attack on the Philippines, and Formosa could serve the same purpose for the Reds. American policy should not be made in London on this matter.

In the present discussion of a Japanese peace settlement, the British want to impose restrictions upon Japanese shipping, because the two countries are competitors in that field. Again, however, American interests are in the other direction, for we are underwriting the Japanese economy until it can become self-sustaining.

These considerations would suggest that the British attitude toward General MacArthur was not due solely to differences of opinion with respect to the Korean War.

And now who is left to speak up for American interests?

THEY KNOW THEIR STUFF

It is interesting that the State Department saw fit to inform the Indian Embassy in Washington of General MacArthur's dismissal a full hour before the news was released to the American public.

Mme. Pandit, India's Ambassador to this country, disclosed that—not without a note of pride. She told a radio interviewer that the news was conveyed to me at midnight. Americans could wait.

The anti-MacArthur State Department knew, of course, that Socialist Prime Minister Nehru's India would be delighted with the advance tip.

Nehru's country has been consistently on the side of Red China, whose forces are fighting the MacArthur-led American troops in Korea. India looks upon General MacArthur as the bogeyman of western imperialism. And only the other day Nehru, out of his vast knowledge of such matters, said it was a mistake to let military commanders make policy statements. Meaning, General MacArthur ought to be kicked out.

We wonder whether the busy little beavers of the State Department were equally prompt in phoning the Free China Embassy. It's doubtful. There wouldn't be any chance of mutual congratulations in that quarter.

Correcting an Injustice to Fred Searls, Jr.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. RICHARDS
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Speaker, recently Representative ENGLE, a member of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, criticized Mr. Fred Searls, Jr., in connection with his services as assistant to Mr. Charles E. Wilson, Director of Defense Mobilization.

As Mr. Searls was never given the opportunity to be heard by the committee, I am including in my remarks copy of letter directed by Mr. Searls to the Honorable JOHN R. MURDOCK, chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and a letter from Gov. James F. Byrnes, of South Carolina, former War Mobilization Director, under whom Mr. Searls served. It appears to me that an injustice has been done a man who has served his country unselfishly, patriotically and well, and I want the record to show it. The letters follow:

NEWMONT MINING CORP.,
New York, N. Y., April 6, 1951.

Hon. JOHN R. MURDOCK,
Chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Current daily papers of New York and Washington have carried statements that Representative ENGLE of your committee has called for my resignation or at least attributed my recent resignation as Assistant to the Director of Defense Mobilization to improper conduct in my position. I understand that it is charged that I have used my position to benefit the Newmont Mining Corp. of which I am president, while opposing proposed subsidies under the Defense Act to other mining companies or individuals.

Inasmuch as your committee had requested me to testify today in respect to those matters, I had expected to use the opportunity to refute such charges and to defend my views. Since you have now canceled the hearing, and left me no opportunity to defend myself, I am using this letter as a means of doing so and respectfully request that you make it a part of the permanent public record of the committee.

At the request of Mr. Wilson and General Clay, who is a friend of mine from the last war, I entered the service of the Office of Defense Mobilization on December 27, 1950.

Prior to entering the service, I advised Mr. Wilson and General Clay that the only possible reason I could think of for not complying with their request, was that I understood that the Magma Copper Co., in which Newmont owned at that time and still owns a share interest of about 22 percent, had been requested by the Defense Minerals Administration to equip its San Manuel property; and that a negotiation was being had, with which, however, I had had no contact or connection. I also explained that I had never been an officer or director of Magma Copper Co. Mr. Wilson and General Clay stated they could see no objection to my aiding them in the capacity of an adviser on materials. I have had no contact of any kind with such negotiations in Washington, New York, or elsewhere.

General Clay further explained that I would probably not have any direct responsibility or connection with the negotiations for expanding domestic mineral production, anyway, because under the set-up and regulations, these matters would be in the hands of DMA, unless some dispute arose or some question requiring Mr. Wilson's attention was brought up. I have had no connection or even discussion regarding the various projects for expansion of domestic mineral production, except to deliver to Mr. Boyd and Mr. Larson—on one occasion—an expression of anxiety on the part of Mr. Wilson that the aluminum expansion contracts were not proceeding fast enough.

I have, as a result of experience in the last war, been opposed to subsidies being paid to marginal mines and undeveloped prospects during the periods of full employment, believing that the desired end is not accomplished by these measures. My testimony before the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, which has apparently been made available to Mr. ENGLE, sets forth the loss in total nonferrous production which occurred during the last period of subsidies.

The desired end could be very much better accomplished by minor changes in the tax laws to permit "expensing" of exploration development by mining companies, and in the case of small mines and small deposits, to permit an easy write-off of losses incurred by owners or participants in development when efforts to develop and operate incur losses. In this connection the recommendations of the American Mining Congress should be given serious consideration.

While in Washington I wrote a letter to Mr. Harrison, of the DPA, and discussed with Mr. Boyd, of the DMA, these ideas. Neither of them agreed with me to the point of believing that subsidies to domestic marginal mines and prospects could be avoided. Whereupon I dropped the matter, except that I also tried to explain my position in this respect to the Senate Committee on Internal and Insular Affairs on February 13.

I resigned from the Office of Defense Mobilization because the business of my company required my constant presence. My resignation was before, and not because of, the criticism of your committee.

I have cleared the above statements with Gen. Lucius D. Clay, who authorizes me to state that he will confirm them to the committee if requested.

Mr. ENGLE is also quoted as having lifted out of its context a sentence in my testimony before the Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee to the effect that "any type of subsidy for the mining industry is objectionable." I think it is. I also think all controls are objectionable. But that does not mean that we do not have to have some forms of both in wartime. The testimony as a whole, however (cf. pp. 258, 279 et seq. of the record), recognizes that the Government must accord some sort of financial aid to concerns who are required to alter normal plans and procedure in favor of expedited expansion of facilities and production required to meet wartime needs.

What I fear, and am on record as opposing, is the sudden revival and reopening during a period of short labor supply, of hundreds of marginal mines and prospects. Such projects are too likely to be affected by the fact that "The squeaky wheel gets the grease," with the inevitable result that the more marginal the mine, the bigger the subsidy and the smaller the production. With a fairly constant mine labor supply, there could be a serious drop in production, as bad or worse than in 1944 to 1946.

In conclusion, permit me to ask that you give me the break of believing that I have at all times endeavored to give the Government, honestly and sincerely, the benefit (or detriment if that is the opinion of the committee) of my views on the subject under discussion. I yield to no one in my desire and in the somewhat successful efforts of my company to increase mineral production. We are all Americans and we are in trouble. Congressional committees should not be so ready to impugn the integrity of experienced and willing contributors to the defense effort as to make it impossible to attract them.

I believe that the country's interest will be best served if the Congress will pass a law which will lay down the procedure to be followed, rather than to leave it permissive, and subject to debate amongst the interested agencies. I would like to persuade the committee to go the tax change route, but I pledge myself and our company to follow, as we always have, the legislation that is finally passed.

I append my record of Government service.

Sincerely yours,

FRED SEARLS, Jr.

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Columbia, April 11, 1951.

Hon. JAMES P. RICHARDS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR DICK: Fred Searls, Jr., president of Newmont Mining Corp., served in my office during the war while I was Director of War Mobilization.

He is one of the finest characters I have ever known. He served as my representative with the representatives of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and in many other capacities. When I became Secretary of State, he again helped me in my efforts to negotiate for bases in foreign countries.

Recently, Representative ENGLE, a member of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs criticized Mr. Searls in connection with his service as assistant to Charles E. Wilson. Searls has written to Chairman MURDOCK a letter, copy of which is enclosed. Because a meeting at which Searls was to testify was canceled and he has had no opportunity to defend himself against the criticism of Congressman ENGLE, he has requested me to have some friend in the House insert this letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I should appreciate it if you would do this.

My experience with Searls causes me to say that I will vouch for the truthfulness of any statement he makes in this or in any other communication. Furthermore, I know that while serving various agencies during World War II, he frequently advocated policies he believed advantageous to the Government when it was against his financial interest. He is one man who always places the interest of his country above his personal interest.

With best wishes to you.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES F. BYRNES.

Universal Military Training

OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, there have been so many Members who were seeking recognition, among them many who had not heretofore had an opportunity to express themselves in regard to the provisions of the bill under consideration, and since my position on this legislation is so well known that I have yielded to my colleagues who have just come to the Congress.

However, Mr. Speaker, I might reiterate, just for the record at this time that, since I have been a Member of Congress I have consistently worked for the building up of the national defense of our country, and especially have I supported universal military training.

Universal military training was a part of the original bill when introduced, and I am sorry to say that while I do not agree to the "watered down" provisions of the bill under the amendments presented, this provision is better than no provision at all for universal military training.

Mr. Speaker, it will be recalled that when legislation was reported out of the Armed Services Committee some years ago I was the only member who introduced discharge petitions to force the Rules Committee to report out these bills for consideration by the Congress.

It will be recalled that I introduced a discharge petition on the bill by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS], as also I introduced a discharge petition on the legislation on the bill by the distinguished Member from New Jersey [Mr. TOWE].

Unfortunately, neither of the bills above referred to were ever dislodged from the Rules Committee.

Mr. Speaker, with full respect for the members of the Rules Committee, I feel that they were sincere in their position; however, I feel that a great mistake was made which is borne out by the situation which we face today.

Communist Daily Worker Cheers the Firing of MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, Wednesday, April 11, 1951, was a great day for the Communists. With tremendous jubilation they shouted their delight in the elimination of their most formidable opponent in the Far East, Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

The Communist Daily Worker, quickly able to recognize the discharge of MacArthur as the abject act of appeasement that it was, shouted in the largest size type available "Now End the War." Not since Neville Chamberlain returned from Munich proclaiming "peace in our time" has the world been witness to such a disgraceful abandonment of the hopes of millions of people for liberation from their tyranny.

I include herewith articles which appeared in the Communist Daily Worker of April 12, 1951:

NOW END THE WAR

A tremendous feeling of gratification will be felt all over the Nation today that the war-hungry General MacArthur who called openly for world war III has been fired by the Government.

With the firing of this arrogant militarist, the peace camp of the world has won an important gain which opens up very great opportunities to advance the cause of peace.

MacArthur is out.

Now the war in Korea must be ditched as well.

The men who pushed the United States into the suicidal invasion of Korea in June 1950 betrayed the Nation. They are responsible for the 60,000 American casualties, and the more than 1,000,000 Korean dead and wounded men, women, and children.

If it was a betrayal of America to start the war against Korea, it is equally a betrayal to continue it another single day, with all its horror, devastation, and useless massacre of innocent people.

In firing MacArthur, President Truman has not ordered General Ridgway to cease the bloodletting. On the contrary, General Ridgway has just announced that he wants more war in Korea, that it "cannot be called off like a baseball game." He has also announced that he looks toward a world war with the socialist states of which the Korean slaughter was merely "the first round."

All Americans who rejoice today that the war incendiary MacArthur is out owe it to themselves to put enormous public pressure on the Government to negotiate for peace in Asia with China, and for peace in Europe with the Soviet Union.

It was Truman who gave MacArthur his orders for war in Korea; it was Truman who ordered the seizure of Chinese Taiwan (Formosa). It is Truman and Eisenhower who will seek the rearming of the Nazi war leaders in West Germany. These dangers still face America. In fact, under the inevitable howl of rage from the Taft-Hearst-MacArthur forces against the Government, President Truman now will seek to prove to those groups that the basic Washington-Wall Street program for "war against communism" on a world scale is not only unchanged but will be pressed more than ever.

Why did MacArthur have to go? Because he was embarrassing the Government before the world with his open demands for starting world war III immediately in Asia.

The Government's plan for world domination rests on the rearming of German Fascist war power, with Europe as the planned main battlefield. MacArthur would not accept this variant of the basic strategy.

By revealing the Government's goal to a world war, MacArthur was exposing the Truman government before the world. The Atlantic Pact was beginning to burst at the seams as Britain and France saw MacArthur pushing them into a vast colonial war against all of Asia.

The British and French capitalist classes know they cannot win such a war against all of Asia; they know they could not persuade the people of Western Europe to follow them into it. MacArthur was making it impossible for the prowar governments in West Europe to hide their aims from their restless and angry populations.

The military failure of the MacArthur-Dulles-Truman war in Korea is a failure of the political aims of the Government in Asia. It has been proved beyond all doubt that the aggressive aims of the Washington-Wall Street leadership in Asia cannot overcome the overwhelming resistance of the Asian people now striking out for their national freedom. The heroic Korean and Chinese people proved that. India knows it. Vietnam, the Philippines, Malaya, Indonesia, Burma, etc., all know it.

In preparing for world domination via Europe, the Government hopes to cover up this growing crisis in its policy of rejecting an American-Soviet peace agreement. But the fatal weaknesses in this pro-Fascist prowar plan will become just as stark in West Europe as they have been revealed in Asia.

The popular applause approving the dismissal of MacArthur arises from the profound mass yearning for peace in Korea, and for a genuine peace negotiation with the Soviet Union.

That yearning for peace must not be betrayed or deceived. It must not be bullied into silence by the ragings of the pro-MacArthur forces clamoring for war against China; it must not be silent while the Truman Government refuses to settle with Peoples China and the Soviet Union as great powers on an equal footing.

There is no question that there are millions of Americans passionately eager for peace, disgusted with the whole Truman-led war in Korea, who have been sold the view that the way to peace lies along the line preached by MacArthur-Taft-Hoover. We need solidarity with these fellow-Americans on the common desire for peace, even though we must convince them that the MacArthur-Taft path, no less than Truman's, leads to the war they fear. Millions applaud Truman's action because they want peace; millions denounce Truman out of the same desire for peace. The desire for peace should unite them all.

Common sense and the national interest demand that President Truman return Formosa to its rightful owner, China; that a cease fire in Korea be immediately established with negotiations for the rapid withdrawal of all non-Korean forces, leaving the Korean people to decide their own destiny. China must be admitted to the UN. Instead of the continuing Washington sabotage of an agreement with the Soviet Union at the Paris Big Four ministers conference, the Nation should insist on real negotiations for a peaceful, united Germany, for disarmament, and for outlawing the A-bomb with UN inspection. Our country should enter into a Five Power Peace Pact with the Soviet Union.

The Communists were among the first to demand the recall of MacArthur as a menace to America and world peace; this was a patriotic service for which they were reviled and smeared. But events have proved them right.

The job now is for all Americans, regardless of their views on many issues, to unite now to press forward the gain which the peace camp and the American people have achieved. This must be the swift ending of the suicidal, criminal sacrifice of our American boys in a war against the freedom-seeking Korean people.

End the Korean War at once!

PEACE GROUP SAYS: "QUIT KOREA"

Organizations dedicated to peace yesterday urged President Truman to follow up his recall of General MacArthur by ending the Korean War and initiating a big-power conference to end all exsting differences. The American Peace Crusade, in a wire to Truman, declared:

"Long overdue removal of General MacArthur opens new opportunity to end bloody Korean conflict. Urge you heed the hopes of millions of Americans by initiating immediate negotiations for peaceful settlement in Korea and withdrawal of United States troops. Urge further that you instruct Ambassador Jessup at Deputy Foreign Ministers' Conference in Paris to use this moment of high hope for peace to reach effective agreement with Soviet Union and other nations leading to long-term peaceful relations on world scale."

Former Congressman Vito Marcantonio, ALP State chairman, said:

"The order dismissing General MacArthur was signed by President Truman, but dictated by the American people.

"The White House has had to recognize the meaning of mail to Congressmen and the President, which is running 100 to 1 in favor of bringing the boys home from Korea and stopping the senseless slaughter by immediate negotiations for peace. From the homes, the farms, the shops, the factories of our land comes the urgent mandate that now is the great moment to end the hostilities and to substitute the conference table for bloody battlefields in the settlement of differences.

"The dismissal of General MacArthur is a great victory for the millions of Americans and for the people all over the world who want peace. His plans for deliberately spreading the area of combat and for lighting a fuse on an atomic world war must be decisively and unconditionally dismissed, along with himself.

"A change in military commanders is not enough.

"There must be a change—sincere, prompt, and effective—in the whole bipartisan policy of war. There must be a halt to the scuttling of the four-power peace conference now going on, and a genuine effort at peaceful negotiation must be begun.

"We call upon President Truman to dismiss the program for war and to install a program for peace."

LABOR PLEA

The text of a wire to President Truman by the New York Labor Conference for Peace, signed by Samuel Freedman, chairman, read:

"We are convinced that the great majority of the American people approve your action in relieving General MacArthur of his command. The removal of General MacArthur who not only blocked settlement of the Korean war but also sought to spread the war to China, should be followed by an immediate peaceful settlement of the war in Korea. We trade unionists urge you to take steps now to initiate peace negotiations to bring about an end to the war in Korea and the return home of the American troops.

"This occasion also offers a new opportunity to call a conference of Britain, France, Soviet Union, China, and United States to discuss settling all existing international differences."

PROGRESSIVE PARTY

A statement by Progressive Party leaders Elmer A. Benson, chairman, and C. B. Baldwin, secretary, said:

"The dismissal of General MacArthur by the President is a significant victory for the peace forces of this Nation and the world. At every important step, General MacArthur's statements have been designed to prevent peace and widen the war in Asia. The American people want not only the dismissal of a general but an end to the tragic war in Korea that he prolonged.

"This step can be the beginning of the road to real peace which the American people are demanding. What is necessary now is to initiate negotiations for a settlement in Korea, to carry out the conference of Foreign Ministers, and to stop the rearming of Germany.

"The American people will not be misled by any Taft-Hoover-Wherry partisan sideshow over MacArthur's dismissal for they recognize that it is his policies which have led to the tragic consequences in Korea. The American people reject the administration's substitute of arming Europe for war. They demand peace first—either war in Asia, or rearming of Europe."

Thousands of telegrams were pouring in at the White House, among them one from CIO President Philip Murray congratulating the President and predicting that the "overwhelming mass of American citizens" will support his action.

NOW OUST WAR POLICY

Eugene Dennis, general secretary of the Communist Party, yesterday issued the following comment on the removal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur by President Truman:

"The long overdue ouster of the ultra-warmonger, General MacArthur, Caesar of the Pacific, must be more than a change of command. The people should demand that it be the first step in swiftly negotiating an end to the Korean War, returning our boys, making peace in the Far East and re-creating the United Nations in the spirit of the UN Charter by inclusion of People's China. The American people desire profoundly to avert world war III. They are striving not only to silence and shackle the more open and rabid exponents of a preventive war now, but more and more are moving in opposition to the Truman-Dulles bipartisan war policies which led to the Korean War and which, if unchecked, will lead to an atomic world war.

"In short, the people want peace not only in Asia but in the whole world. They don't want world war III ignited in Asia by a MacArthur or in Europe by an Eisenhower.

"The real issue today is not an Asia first war vs. a Europe first war. The real issue is world war or world peace.

"Peace supporters, regardless of political differences or past prejudices, must seize this unique moment to intervene. They should act unitedly not only to end the bloodletting in the Far East but to relieve war tensions everywhere. That requires that the American people and labor in the first instance press for: the success of the current Paris Foreign Deputies Conference, negotiations for a five-power peace pact, and a return to the Roosevelt 'grand design' of big power unity with its keystone of American-Soviet friendship."

GOOD RIDDANCE TO MACARTHUR

(By William Z. Foster)

The forced retirement of Gen. Douglas MacArthur from his position as Mikado and general imperialist dictator in the Far East will be welcomed with a sense of relief by the peace forces all over the world. MacArthur's whole course, especially since the outbreak of the war in Korea, has been to spread the war in Asia and thus to precipitate a third world war. His steps in this general direction have been bold, brazen, and unmistakable.

All over the world there has been a rising demand for the removal of this arch warmonger and firebrand. From day to day the peoples of all countries have feared that this fanatical imperialist, upon his own initiative, would arbitrarily bomb China or take some other brutal and irresponsible steps that would plunge the world irretrievably into a disastrous holocaust. The peoples will hail his removal as a victory for peace.

That the world-wide protest of the peoples had much to do with MacArthur's being fired unceremoniously is indisputable. But it would be the gravest kind of a mistake to conclude therefrom, that the war danger is now past and that peace is assured.

The actuality of the situation is that the quarrel between Truman and MacArthur is not over whether or not there should be a war. Both of them are warmongers, and their dispute is as to where the war should be made to begin. MacArthur is one of that powerful group of imperialists, especially supported by the Republican Party, who want to start the great conflagration by attempting the conquest of Asia. Whereas Truman, an even more powerful spokesman for Wall Street than MacArthur, voices the demand of those monopolists, who hold that the conquest of the world must start with the overrunning of Europe.

Truman was also moved to fire MacArthur from fear that the latter's bull-in-the-chinashop aggressions would break up the imperialist war alliance that is being so carefully built up by the State Department.

Instead, therefore, of the Truman administration utilizing the removal of the jingo MacArthur to establish world peace, it will aim to put more steam into its campaign to militarize the United States, Great Britain, France, and Germany, and thus to prepare even more frenziedly for a clash in Europe with the Soviet Union and the people's democracies. At the same time, but as a subordinate part of its strategy, Truman will strive to defeat People's China and all other democratic forces in Asia.

This is no occasion, therefore, for the forces of peace to fall victims to peace illusions regarding President Truman. Instead, the peace forces, who have raised their voices so sharply in the MacArthur incident, should now press harder than ever to have the Korean war ended with a democratic peace. They should also demand emphatically that the four-power conference now going on in Paris be the opening door to a real easing of the present dangerous world tensions. As things stand now, the Paris meeting is being sabotaged by the State Department, which in no sense wants a democratic peace settlement with the U. S. S. R.

Good riddance to MacArthur. All peace-loving people may well rejoice at his being fired. But if his displacement is to be made into a real step toward world peace, this can be done only by sailing into the Hoovers, Tafts, McCarthys, and Knowlands who are backing him, and especially by defeating the militaristic plans of the even larger menace of war represented by the Truman administration itself.

The Draft Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. AYRES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable time consumed on the discussion of the draft bill. I have been surprised that there seems to be very little consideration being given to what we are doing to the morale of the people affected. In my opinion the following letter shows that we must give our boys more protection during the training period:

Dear Mr. AYRES: Mrs. B——— and myself returned last evening from visiting our only child, a boy 19, who is in the Air Force, stationed at Keesler Field, Biloxi, Miss. What we saw in and around Biloxi is hard to believe.

Gambling joints run wide open, with soldiers in uniform losing their paltry few dollars at dice tables and roulette wheels.

Although I understand Mississippi is a dry State, bars and saloons operate just as openly as they do here in Akron. I saw many a young boy in uniform who obviously could not have been over 18 or 19 buying liquor at these bars with no questions asked.

Wherever you go in Biloxi there are hundreds of slot machines all openly displayed.

It is obvious that such a condition could not exist without the connivance of local enforcement officers, and while I can understand crooked enforcement officers, I cannot understand how the Air Force tolerates such a condition.

There are 40,000 young men in this camp with thousands continuously passing through and the moral effect upon them must be tremendous. Most of them are away from home for the first time in new and strange surroundings and instead of being treated the way they are entitled to be treated, they are being victimized wherever they turn.

Universal Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

PENNSYLVANIA FEDERATION OF YOUNG REPUBLICAN CLUBS,
April 7, 1951.

Hon. HUGH SCOTT, Jr.,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SCOTT: Now that the universal military training bill is currently being debated in the House of Representatives, I felt that you might like to know that the Pennsylvania Federation of Young Republican Clubs stands in favor of the establishment of universal military training.

At our most recent convention, the federation went on record as recommending "the establishment of universal military training so that young Americans will be properly prepared to serve their country in the armed services if needed; and to prevent the unnecessary casualties which are inherent in untrained troops."

The above resolution is by action of our complete convention and not just the board of directors. We are bringing this to your attention for whatever effect it might have on your decision in the current debate.

If the Young Republicans can be of any assistance to you, don't fail to call on us.

Sincerely,

K. L. SHIRK, Jr.,
Chairman.

MacArthur's Dismissal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an editorial which appeared in the April 12, 1951, issue of the St. Louis (Mo.) Globe-Democrat:

MACARTHUR'S DISMISSAL

Seldom has American public opinion been so sharply divided as on the MacArthur issue, climaxed yesterday by President Truman's order that the recalcitrant general be removed immediately from his Far East commands. With some, regrettably, the issue involves politics, and that angle will be pursued relentlessly, we can be assured, to the end that the general may come home to blast the administration in public statements and addresses which may well figure in the 1952 election. But for most the issue is this:

Was General MacArthur right or wrong in departing from his responsibility as a military commander to express sentiments on foreign policy and strategy that ran counter to those of the UN, the President, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the State Department? Was he right or wrong when he became a self-appointed diplomat, over and above his duties as the commander of the United Nations forces in Korea?

With full appreciation of the General's high qualifications as a soldier and his eminent success in the rehabilitation of Japan, this newspaper believes the drastic action by the President was justified.

MacArthur was guilty of insubordination, which cannot be tolerated within the military set-up. He deliberately assumed authority in a field which was not his to command—the making of foreign policy. He violated the explicit orders of his Commander in Chief, a procedure he would not have countenanced for a minute by his subordinates. He flouted his superior command not once, but many times, and after several warnings.

He would have been removed months ago had not the President, with a wary regard for the political dynamite in such action, been well aware of the explosive content in the emotions of the American citizens. Now he has taken the long step with reluctance. MacArthur was and is on all counts the "hottest potato" Mr. Truman has been called on to handle.

General MacArthur expects to return to the States within 3 weeks. He may address a joint session of Congress and air his views on the entire Far East situation. His remarks, to Congress or otherwise, will attract the serious attention of every American citizen, and may serve to clarify White House thinking, or at least put its Korean policy in sharper focus. As a retired Army officer, he can speak without restraint—and doubtless will.

The most unfortunate aspect of the controversy is that in many respects the program which MacArthur championed, in defiance of the President, was realistic and logical. He would have been no soldier at all had he not chafed at the restrictions imposed on him in fighting the Reds in Korea. He was not permitted to bomb the supply concentrations of the enemy.

His UN directives were vague, never clearly detailed. He knew that a stalemate at the thirty-eighth parallel settled nothing, yet when he called for reinforcements to exploit the gains made in recent months, he was denied them. He wished to employ the Chinese Nationalists on Formosa, either in Korea or in an assault on the Chinese mainland, but Washington did not approve.

This newspaper believes he was in error in stating that the place for a showdown with Russia is in Asia, that Europe is secondary.

But above all, there can be no denial that the general was the spectacular victim of a White House-State Department foreign policy that has been consistently inconsistent and vacillating. Neither MacArthur nor the American people have ever been clearly advised as to the precise program the administration has fixed for Far East operations. Mr. Truman has repeatedly sought refuge in the United Nations when a forthright decision was required—and the impotent UN, timid and unenthusiastic, sat on its hands while the situation worsened.

The UN never had much stomach for the Korean "police action." And when MacArthur became a problem child who threatened to involve the UN in a world war by operations against the stooges of Moscow, the Red Chinese, Great Britain, and France, in particular, were apprehensive and called for caution. Well they knew that if the United States went to war against Russia in the Orient, we would not have enough men or matériel to do a good job of helping defend West Europe against Communist aggression. Presumably the President was influenced by British and French representations, and for good reason.

Technically, when the UN was committed to action in Korea, the war should have been directed by its Security Council. But this was impossible while Russia had a seat on that Council. Hence, the United States was given the job in view of our leadership in securing UN approval of the aggressor resolution and the preponderance of our commitments in men and matériel to that area. MacArthur's appointment was in line with that agreement.

But notwithstanding the frustration that plagued MacArthur, his conviction that our Far East policy was bungled and unrealistic, he was a soldier, subject to the same fundamentals of discipline as any private in the ranks. When he gave a command, it was obeyed or else. When he received a command, it was his duty to obey or take the consequences.

We understand that General Eisenhower, while in supreme command in Europe in the last war, did not approve of many things he was asked to do. Certainly, for instance, he believed the western allies should have been permitted to occupy Berlin instead of allowing the Russians to take it over, with results we all know. But Eisenhower had his orders and he followed them. MacArthur had his orders and he flouted them.

We by no means agree that the White House-State Department policy for the Far East has been without fault. Neither the President nor Secretary Acheson at any time have indicated they knew where they were going or how they expected to get there, and we can imagine MacArthur's soul-writhing because of his conviction that he knew best.

But something that was earmarked as policy had the approval of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the President, both in superior command to MacArthur, and what they ordered he should have done his best to carry out. The proper place for him to lodge his protests was with the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the President, and it is their ultimate responsibility if they ignored him and adopted a plan that proved to be wrong.

Flamboyant critical statements from the battlefield, letters home to sympathetic friends who made them public, proposals to negotiate with the enemy at a time when, so the President says, the UN was well along toward an understanding with Red China—all these are extracurricular procedures which are not a military prerogative. If every general in a war disdains orders and operates on his own and as he thinks best, the end result could be disaster.

The chain reaction of the MacArthur dismissal will be heard for many months. The general, now released from all restrictions, may be expected to speak his piece to the American public. He will have ample help in and outside Congress.

Basically the general would expand the war, make the Far East the chief area of combat, as against the UN policy of isolating Korea and concentrating on the defense of Europe. It is difficult to see how those who agree with MacArthur that the war must be carried to China can in the same breath declare that his program must be followed to save the further slaughter of American soldiers.

General MacArthur makes his exit after 48 years in the Army service of his country. His achievements in the Pacific were historic; he was a brilliant occupation commander in Japan. It is unfortunate that he is compelled to quit under tortured circumstances.

President Truman's Speech on Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD BOLLING
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday night, April 14, 1951, a great Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner was held at the National Guard Armory in Washington, D. C. Many outstanding speeches were delivered on this occasion. I include herewith the unselfish and courageous remarks of the President of the United States, Harry S. Truman, of Missouri:

My fellow Americans, this is a meeting of Democrats. More important than that, it is a meeting of Americans. It is a meeting of Americans who put the welfare of their country first.

This is a time when all Americans should put their country first. This is no time for business as usual—or for politics as usual.

There are some people, I am sorry to say, who are playing petty politics right now with the future of the country and the peace of the world. These people seem to think that it is more important to win the next election than it is to prevent another world war. I don't want any Democrat to have such ideas.

I want every Democrat to put patriotism above politics.

Our country is in deadly danger. We face a powerful and ruthless enemy. The only way we can prevail over that enemy is for every man and woman in this country to put national interest above personal interest.

What we are trying to do is to establish peace in the world. And the only way you can have peace in the world is to bring about international law and order.

The men we are honoring here tonight—Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson—knew that.

In their day, the United States was small and weak.

Nevertheless, Jefferson and Jackson stood up for international law and order. They worked for peace, but they would not stoop to appeasement. They knew that the United States could not be safe unless it was willing to fight for what was right.

When Jefferson was President our merchant ships were attacked by the Barbary pirates who ruled the north coast of Africa. These pirates lived by robbery and human slavery. They were collecting huge sums of money in tribute from European nations. Then the Barbary pirates began to demand that the United States pay them millions of dollars for leaving our ships alone. They were arrogant and they were brutal, and they got away with it until someone finally stood up against them.

Jefferson decided to put a stop to the whole thing. He knew that there were times when a country has to fight against international crime. He sent the United States Navy to Africa. He sent the marines ashore at Tripoli. He carried the battle to the enemy nearly 5,000 miles away from the United States.

We smashed the power of those bandits, and we won the praise and gratitude of the world. The Pope at that time, Pius VII, declared, "the American commander, with a small force and in a short space of time, has done more for the cause of Christianity than the most powerful nations of Christendom have done for ages."

Jefferson did not believe this Nation could submit to pirates, and neither do we.

Now, as then, there is no room for piracy in a free world.

Now, as then, there are times when our country has to fight for law and order.

Today, however, the danger we face is not just a gang of pirates in one part of the world.

It is a danger that threatens every nation on earth, every religious faith, every home, and every person in this land. It is the danger that arises from the plans of the Kremlin to conquer the civilized world.

The rulers of the Kremlin have abandoned any serious attempt to improve the lives of the people they control. They are taking the men and women and the resources under their control and welding them into a mighty machine for war and conquest.

They think they can divide the democratic nations and overthrow them one by one.

If they can do that, they will succeed in isolating and surrounding the United States.

Then we should either have to fight a terrible war, against great odds—or yield to the demands of the Kremlin.

Either alternative would be a desperate one.

We must meet this threat just as firmly as Jefferson met the threat of the Barbary pirates.

There is no higher purpose to which we can dedicate ourselves as Democrats and Americans.

For 5 years, we have been checking and countering the threats of Communist expansion—all around the world. We have been helping to strengthen free nations to stand up and resist this pressure. Our policy thwarted the Soviet master plan of expansion. So the Communist leaders reported to open aggression.

This called for a show-down.

The free world gave its answer.

We went to the defense of Korea.

When we did that, nearly everyone in the United States approved. Nearly everyone but the Communists agreed that it was the only thing to do. But now, there are people who say we should not have done it. There are people who say we should get out of Korea.

These people are making a terrible mistake.

They think that we could stop the fight if we got out of Korea. That is not true.

If we got out of Korea, the Communist leaders would strike somewhere else. They would strike at Japan, or the Middle East, or in Europe.

And sooner or later they would go on to strike at South America, and at our own country.

We do not have a choice between fighting in Korea or not fighting at all. Our choice lies between fighting in Korea or fighting somewhere else—somewhere more difficult—and probably somewhere closer to home.

Our struggle against aggression in Korea has had profound effects.

First, it is preventing our Communist enemy from carrying out his plans. By fighting in Korea, we have kept the rulers of the Kremlin from conquering other countries on their list.

Second, it has given the free world warning, and time to begin building up its own defenses. Our struggle has made it clear, not only here, but abroad, that the free world must prepare to defend itself.

Third, our firm stand in Korea has placed a great strain on the whole system of dictatorship. Dictatorships cannot survive continued reverses. Cracks are already beginning to appear in the structure of international communism.

I do not want to hear anyone say that our effort in Korea has been wasted. Our men there have been fighting for you and for me—for everyone of us—for our homes, our futures, and the future of our children—just as surely as if they were fighting on our own soil.

They are fighting in Korea to save us from having to fight on our own soil.

They are fighting to prevent the sacrifices and suffering of a third world war.

It is important to remember that our purpose in Korea is to stop the world war that would result if Communist aggression were to go unchecked. Our purpose is to restore peace.

If the Communist leaders have learned the lesson that aggression will not be tolerated by the free nations of the world, it should be possible to reach a peaceful settlement in Korea.

But it must be settled on a basis that will protect the objectives for which the United Nations are fighting.

To reach such a settlement, the Soviet and Chinese Communist leaders must abandon their aggression.

On that point there can be no compromise.

We will not engage in appeasement.

We will make no deals that would reward aggression.

Let there be no mistake in the Kremlin. We want peace—in Korea and in the rest of the world. But we will not give in to aggression.

We know that appeasement does not lead to peace but leads to war. Our efforts to prevent war must be founded upon the preservation of freedom and justice.

That is why we are supporting the United Nations.

That is why we are aiding the free countries to build their economic strength.

That is why we are building up our own military defenses and helping other free nations to build theirs.

These are basic elements of our foreign policy.

Our foreign policy is a world policy, a policy of world peace—peace not only in the Wester Hemisphere, but in Europe, in Asia—all around the globe.

It is a foreign policy which is above any one party. In recent years, our foreign policy has been shaped by, and supported by, many leaders in both political parties working together. Our foreign policy is truly bipartisan. It is arrived at by "give and take," and improved by criticism and discussion.

That is the way it ought to be, and the way we are going to try to keep it. We welcome fair and honest debate.

But in recent months we have heard too much political hokum attacking the bipartisan foreign policy.

The people who are making these attacks cannot agree on any foreign policy of their own. They are just against the foreign policy this country is following. They are not trying to help this country find its way in these troubled times. They are just trying to confuse us. Why? Because they think if the country is confused enough, they may be able to win the next election.

Let me give you a few examples of the thinking of these confusers.

They say they want a powerful defense system, second to none—but they are against universal military training.

They say they want other free nations to resist aggression—but they don't want us to send any troops to help.

They want us to get out of Korea—but they urge us to wage an aggressive war against China.

They say it will provoke Russia to attack if we send troops to Europe—but they are sure Russia won't come in if we carry the war to China.

They say they want to crush communism—and yet they want us to draw back into our shell and let the rest of the world be overrun by the Reds.

They say they are worried because the Russians outnumber us—but they are not interested in keeping allies who can help us.

The long and short of it is that they want defenses without spending the money, they want us to wage war without an army, they want us to have victory without taking any risks, and they want us to try to run the whole world and to run it without any friends.

We can't afford to be diverted and upset by these political attacks.

We have a big job to do here at home. Our job is to get our defense program carried out quickly and efficiently.

We have made tremendous strides in building our defenses in the last few months. We have more than doubled the size of our Armed Forces since last June 25; the newest types of planes and tanks are coming off the assembly lines; and we are building an industrial system which can turn out more military supplies than ever before in our history.

With our European partners, we are building a strong combined defense force for the North Atlantic area, under the leadership of a great American, Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower.

At a time like this, when we as a Nation are having to build up our Armed Forces and turn out all the material they need, we cannot—as individuals—do all the things we would normally do here at home. We can't build all the new houses we would like; we can't buy all the new gadgets and conveniences we would like. All of us will have to wait a while or do without many things we want.

But I know all Americans will gladly sacrifice some of the material comforts of life to defend the freedoms which give us our inner strength and security.

The Democratic Party has pioneered in the great advances our Nation has made in providing a better life for all our people. The Democratic Party has led the way to better homes, better education, better health, and higher incomes. The Democratic Party has led the way to new respect for the dignity and the worth of the individual. These achievements have come about because of our basic belief, the belief that every individual and every group in our Nation should have a fair deal.

A fair deal has been our pledge to the American people.

It is still our pledge.

In a time of national emergency like the present, when we all face danger together, it is more important than ever before that everyone have a fair deal.

A fair deal for everyone today means that we all share—and share alike—the responsibilities and sacrifices of our defense program.

On the battlefields of Korea our men fight together for a common purpose. Black and white, rich and poor, share common hardships, and often a common fate. The laborer's son, the farmer's son, and the businessman's son are fighting shoulder to shoulder in Korea.

We must have that same united approach to a common cause here at home.

It is as clear now as it was in Jefferson's day that we can enjoy the benefits of freedom only if we assume the responsibilities that go with it.

At this critical time in world history, men and women everywhere look to our Nation for leadership. They know that hope for a better life, human freedom, decency, justice, religion—all these things—depend upon the vigor with which we lead the free world in its fight for survival.

We shall not fail them.

We have known danger many times before, and we have never yielded. The ideals of Jefferson and Jackson have carried us through crises in the past.

They have given us a better and a fuller life.

I am confident that these same ideals will lead us to our goal of a free and peaceful world.

International Children's Fund

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD M. SIMPSON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I want to comment on chapter X in Report No. 298 accompanying the third supplemental appropriations bill for 1951. On the basis of this report, the committee appears to be under a misapprehension as to how the International Children's Fund operates.

Last year I inserted in the RECORD a letter from Herbert Hoover concerning UNICEF in which he stated:

> I do not believe there is any foreign activity in which our Government can engage that has as many returns both from a human and from an economic point of view.

Mr. Hoover does not make exaggerated statements, nor is he a blind follower of the United Nations. He is a statesman known throughout the world for his understanding and support of sound humanitarian enterprises. My concern for this program stems from exactly these two points stressed by Mr. Hoover and my comments today are to further elaborate this position.

The difference between the supposedly high percentage of United States support for this program, as compared with our share in other United Nations programs, is explained first, by the misunderstanding concerning the basis of the matching ratio, described in the following paragraph, and secondly, by the type of program carried out by the Children's Fund. Most of our contributions to the regular budgets of the United Nations and the specialized agencies are utilized entirely for administrative purposes, on the other hand, the greater part of United States appropriations to UNICEF are used for procurement, particularly dried skim milk, and shipping. It is precisely because our contributions to UNICEF have made it possible for this tangible program of international assistance to children to operate in the practical form of a commodity supply program at the community level that outstanding leaders such as Senator TAFT and Mr. Hoover have enthusiastically endorsed this program. The fund is administered by an American businessman, Mr. Maurice Pate, of Massachusetts and Colorado, who has kept administrative costs at an average of 5 percent during the first 3 years of its operation.

The printed report of the hearings accompanying this bill indicates that the Department of State urged support for an appropriation of $12,500,000, on the basis of 72–28-percent formula, which the Department said carried over from UNRRA. The present matching formula did not come from UNRRA but was established by Congress. Originally, this House suggested a 50–50 formula as the basis for financing UNICEF. Fifty percent of the total new resources available for child care programs were to come from the United States, the other 50 percent would comprise 25 percent contributed by other governments for use outside their territories and 25 percent in new resources from receiving countries. The conference altered the proportions somewhat and established the formula of 72 percent from the United States, 28 percent from other governments, for use outside their territories and another 100 percent from receiving countries. Thus the United States share was 36 percent of the total government contributions.

I am attaching a table showing the composition of resources for UNICEF assisted child-care programs from June 1947 to March 1951. This table shows that the United States has actually contributed 34 percent of all resources, which include some nongovernmental contributions. In order to maintain this position and stimulate the additional 100-percent contributions from receiving countries, it will be necessary to retain the 72–28-percent ratio for government contributions used outside national territories.

Thus for the current year, the fund needs $12,500,000 from this country, $5,000,000 from other governments—half of which has already been received and allocated—and another $17,000,000 from receiving countries.

Since UNICEF resources have never been adequate to meet more than the minimum needs of children in most UNICEF receiving countries, the fund has utilized its meager resources in strategic programs designed to help governments establish services for children which could be continued by those governments after UNICEF leaves. Successful pursuit of this policy has made it possible for UNICEF to shift its emphasis from countries which were the immediate victims of the Second World

Roosevelt would jokingly tell Mrs. Roosevelt to put away the carving knife for fear my father-in-law, a cousin and aide of T. R., might use it against Taft.

I mention it because the easiest thing in the world today is to join the wolfpack and kick Harry Truman in the pants. You, however, have not attained your present position by taking the easy way.

And you, in view of your father's record, in view of your own record as a champion of the Constitution, can better understand this fundamental issue than any other man I know.

That issue is the Constitution of the United States—which provides that, if a general wants to run the Government, he must take off his uniform and become a civilian like the rest of us. He cannot have the perquisites and protection of the uniform and give orders to the White House, too.

Furthermore, you cannot have a general who has been running for President and who may still have political ambitions overruling the President of the United States.

As far as President Truman is concerned, my personal feelings toward him are about the same as yours. He has castigated me just as much as he has you. But there is a difference between respect for the office of President and respect for the man. The former is something which must not be soiled or sullied by unfair Senate debate. And the office of President carries with it not only the power but the obligation, under the Constitution, to remove a general who challenges the Constitution.

People are easily confused these days, but you can help to prevent their confusion. And while it might be popular and even healthy to impeach Harry Truman, do it on the grounds of corruption in his administration. There you might be on solid ground. Don't do it on an issue for which your father and every other President has kept the torch of civilian government burning—the principle that no soldier can overrule a civilian elected by the people.

Or, if you will, impeach the President on the ground that his policy is wrong. Impeach him on the issue of failure in China.

It might be healthy if you or Senator WHERRY introduced a resolution embodying the exact terms of the MacArthur letter to JOE MARTIN, and let the Senate debate it—debate the bombing of Chinese bases, the landing of Chiang Kai-shek's troops on the mainland, and the full probabilities and objectives of war with China.

This is an important, vital question upon which we should have full debate, upon which the public should be fully informed. I hope such a resolution will be introduced.

But do not, I urge, confuse the issue by challenging the basic principle of our Constitution in regard to civilian rule.

I have just returned from a trip through Europe. And I can report that you cannot travel abroad these days without sensing how vital is the issue now before our country. Many of the European nations have been through the struggle between military and civilian rule. They have seen the elected parliaments of Italy and Germany weaken. They have seen the people—shaken in their confidence of the democratic system, confused by unfair debate—turn to military dictatorships.

It is out of such confusion, when nations have weak civilian leaders and strong military leaders, that dictatorships spring.

Now, it is easy to jump on an unpopular President—as your family well remembers. It is easy to jump on him and to muddy up public opinion with confusing issues—such as the so-called Ballinger scandals which led to the overwhelming defeat of your father, and which history later proved not to have been scandals after all.

It is also easy to fool the public with a lot of phony flag-waving on an issue which your father and no other President worth his salt would have stood for—namely, permitting a general to thumb his nose at the civilian branch of the Government and get away with it.

But the times today are too dangerous. And it is in days such as these, when we do not have the most astute brains in or around the White House, that we need leadership and courage such as yours outside the White House to keep us on an even keel.

Respectfully yours,

DREW PEARSON.

Voice of America Spreads Its Message Through Classics and Jam Sessions Alike

---

OF

HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Alice Eversman, from the Washington Sunday Star of April 15, 1951:

VOICE OF AMERICA SPREADS ITS MESSAGE THROUGH CLASSICS AND JAM SESSIONS ALIKE

(By Alice Eversman)

The broadcast of the final program of the National Symphony Orchestra to all parts of the world on the Voice of America called attention in a personal way to this important service being tendered in the name of music. Although most of the broadcasts are concerned with the spreading of necessary facts about this country, the spirit of our people as reflected in the music they hear, perform, and compose is also made known. About 15,000 recordings of transcribed programs are sent monthly to 75 countries. During November, December, January, and February some 10,691 hours of programing time were used.

The material for the broadcasts has been assembled and sorted since 1943, when the American Federation of Musicians granted permission to the Voice to record any music put on the air. The music unit staff is one of the busiest in the set-up. They must be constantly on the lookout for the kind of performances to select and have the proper knowledge to prepare the program notes accompanying each recording. Furthermore, they must be ready with an answer to any question that might come up in the 220,000 letters sent the Voice annually from the far corners of the world. Each month a committee of music experts must audition about 100 hours of material, some of which will be discarded, and others put into the library for future use.

The sending of recorded music is governed by the wishes of the people in the area to which it goes. Unfortunately, symphonic music rates the lowest attention. American popular songs and dance music are much in demand, the Voice supplying 250 stations in Brazil alone with the former in the Your Hit Parade program, and European stations with the recordings of Dixieland jazz. An effort is made, however, to maintain a balance between serious classical, semiclassical, and popular music.

Compositions by American composers, recitals by native musicians, as well as those by renowned instrumentalists and operatic singers, and programs by the great orchestras of the United States are included in the first category. One performance by the Metropolitan Opera is always part of the shipments and some particular event, such as the Bach Festival in Bethlehem or the Boston Symphony concerts at Tanglewood, is included.

RELIGIOUS MUSIC INCLUDED

Excerpts from musical shows as South Pacific, the favoriate singers on radio programs, dance and jazz bands, constitute the popular list, while pleasant orchestral numbers, instrumental music of the same kind, spirituals and folk songs form the semiclassics. Every Sunday there are religious broadcasts, with music by such groups as the Trinity Choir of St. Paul's Parish in New York, the choir of East Liberty Presbyterian Church in Pittsburgh, the Schola Cantorum of St. Thomas' in Bloomfield, or that of the Church of the Immaculate Conception in Los Angeles. Most of these latter programs have been beamed to the Far East.

One of the most notable programs is, Fun With Music, designed for children all over the world. Already 26 15-minute recordings have been sent to a number of countries for local broadcasts with commentaries in the language of the country. They follow, mostly, the style used in the youth concerts with some deviations. For instance, there is one program of circus music where calliopes and bassy melodies create the atmosphere for elephants and clowns. Excerpts from Humperdinck's Hansel and Gretel are among the children's operas given which also include Douglas Moore's, the Emperor's New Clothes, and George Kleinsinger's, Tubby the Tuba. The story of the instruments in the orchestras occupies three programs and the history of the piano from 1700 to the present, is traced on two. The highlights of American history from 1620 to 1865 are told for the youngsters in music and even the geography of this country is described in this medium. High school boys and girls, in choruses or ensembles, participate in these programs.

The Voice uses its musical material in two ways. Some of it is transmitted by shortwave broadcasts as programs or as incidental or atmospheric music for some of the dramas. Others are put on the records in assembled programs which are shipped to 90 Embassies, consulates, and other far outposts of the State Department.

The local radio stations receive these packaged programs and clubs or schools are permitted to borrow them. The problem lies in supplying the music of most appeal to the different countries. France, Italy, Spain, and Latin America like our popular music best. India and Indonesia favor military bands. A special tribute was paid to the Marine Band for its recorded performance of the Pakistan national anthem by its composer, Ahmed G. Chagla. He wrote:

"This is exactly how the music should be interpreted. The Marine Band performance is all the more commendable because the melody is foreign to western instrumentalists—." Only Northern Europe craves the symphonic music with soloists.

A particular effort is being made to acquaint the world with the serious works by American composers. Most European nations feel they can supply what music of that nature is wanted and ask for the lighter American kind so popular abroad. However, there is a series called "American Composer" where native compositions in orchestral, chamber music or soloist performance are recorded and sent out. More than a hundred overseas offices receive this allotment. Commercial recordings and published compositions are also supplied to information centers for study and performance by any who desire to have them.

PORTABLES REACH THE REMOTE

Where there are no radios, the Voice sends out jeeps, as in Aden, Arabia, for instance,

War to the long-range, but nevertheless emergency needs of the less developed countries in Asia and Latin America.

As a result of these humanitarian programs many millions of children have already been protected from death, disease, and malnutrition, and many millions more will benefit from the national services stimulated by UNICEF assistance.

All this has been accomplished at an incredibly small cost as indicated by the UNICEF total annual expenditures to country programs:

1950	32,000,000

Under the present formula these sums amount to one-half the cost for specific programs, the other half being contributed by the receiving countries.

It is for these reasons that I would urge the representatives of the House Appropriation Committee, when they meet in conference with the representatives of the Senate, to restore the full appropriation to the International Children's Fund so that the United States may continue to provide at least one-third of the total resources raised for international assistance to children.

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I am inserting in the RECORD a copy of a letter I am today sending to those who have written to me relative to Gen. Douglas MacArthur's dismissal:

DEAR ——: This will acknowledge receipt of your recent communication relative to the dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur from his far eastern command.

As you know, I have at all times been an ardent supporter of General MacArthur as a military leader, and I am still of the opinion that he ranks among our Nation's top military tacticians. However, no military leader, no matter how brilliant he may be, shall or can have the authority under the Constitution of the United States to assume the responsibility for determining our foreign policy.

On our policy in the Far East, I feel—and I have always felt—that we should continue to recognize Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalist Government; that we should refuse recognition of Communist China; and refuse admission of Communist China into the United Nations.

No American general is bigger than the Government of the United States. No American general is bigger than his constitutional Commander in Chief. The very existence of our democracy demands that military authority be subordinate to civilian authority.

I am quite certain that President Truman fully realized that his decision to depose MacArthur would be unpopular. It took battlefield courage on the part of the President of the United States to remove MacArthur from his command. I am in wholehearted accord with the President's decision because I have sworn to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States—without any reservations whatsoever—and under article II, section 2 of the Constitution of the United States, the President is specifically named as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces.

Under article II, he has the right to remove any of his military subordinates. The authority of the civilian Commander in Chief must always be supreme. Civilian control is essential in a democracy. The day military men are encouraged or permitted to flaunt the orders of their civilian superiors, is the day our democracy starts on the last long mile to destruction. Had President Truman not acted as he did, his political, personal, and emotional critics would then, I believe, have some justification for demanding his impeachment for not carrying out his sworn duty as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States.

The most obvious factor about the dismissal of General MacArthur is that he forced his own removal. He would not tolerate any disobedience from any officer under his command. Yet, he willfully disobeyed not only the Commander in Chief, President Truman, but also his military superiors on the Joint Chiefs of Staff. This is an attitude I cannot and will not condone under any circumstances.

I believe that General MacArthur should be accorded the honor of addressing a joint session of Congress and I further believe that he should be requested by the appropriate committees of Congress to give us the benefit of his views on the Far East and answer questions pertaining to our far-eastern policy. I intend to request the Committee on Foreign Affairs to issue an invitation to General MacArthur to appear before that committee so that he can be questioned and so that his answers to the questions asked may be fully known not only to the American Congress but to the American people as well.

I realize full well that as far as the present controversy is concerned, I am not on the popular side. It has been a privilege to serve you in Congress under our present form of government. Under a government controlled by the military, I doubt if you could write to your Congressman and tell him whether you approve or disapprove his actions in representing you in the Congress of the United States.

The question of MacArthur is of little importance compared to the question as to whether or not we shall have a representative government under civilian control or a military government to which civilians will be subordinate. The founding fathers of this great Republic recognized this question and acted wisely in subordinating the military.

I am not one of those who can swing with the political pendulum. My decision is to stand on the side of the Constitution of the United States which I will uphold and defend to my last breath. What happens to me because of this decision is unimportant; my country and our Constitution must always come first.

With best personal wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

MIKE MANSFIELD.

MacArthur Issues Brought Out

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. F. EDWARD HÉBERT

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, I have just read an open letter by Drew Pearson, undoubtedly a most controversial figure inside and outside the ranks of journalism, to the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio, who himself could not by the farthest stretch of the imagination be called a noncontroversial figure.

I call this open letter to the attention of the House because it makes sense to me, good sense, common sense—a commodity which is being used less and less during an era when we need more and more of it.

It makes little difference whether or not we agree or disagree with Drew Pearson, and it makes less difference whether we like or dislike him. But it does make a great deal of difference whether or not we rise above personalities in a crisis when personalities seem to outweigh sober judgment and cold logic.

It does not make any difference from whom words of sound advice come, just so long as the words generate stability. For my part, I believe Drew Pearson has performed a public service in writing this letter and has contributed much in these tense times.

Here is the open letter which appeared in today's press:

THE WASHINGTON MERRY-GO-ROUND—MACARTHUR ISSUES BROUGHT OUT

(By Drew Pearson)

Today's column takes the form of a letter from Drew Pearson to Senator ROBERT A. TAFT on the MacArthur-Truman controversy.

APRIL 14, 1951.

DEAR SENATOR TAFT: When your father was President of the United States, my late father-in-law, a general and a military man all his life, had about the same opinion of him that Douglas MacArthur has of the present occupant of the White House. In fact, your father, whom history records as having done a fine job as Secretary of War, incurred the wrath of many military men, because he both kept within his budget and kept the military in their place.

He fully grasped the fundamental fact around which our Constitution is written—that ours is a civilian government, in which the military takes orders from civilians. He even carried it out so conscientiously that, when your father was Secretary of War and used to come to the White House, Teddy

The NEA (see enclosure) criticizes "setting up a permanent system of military training in the United States." I protest the term "permanent" since statutes are always subject to repeal by the Congress. Use of such term seems designed falsely to excite people and thus to build up opposition. The NEA release also counsels delay on UMT until "present critical international disputes * * * have been settled." Six years since the collapse of the Axis, is there any evidence that such disputes ever will be settled? The NEA release continues the argument over 18, 18½, or 19 as the age, and over 21, 24, or 26 months as the period of military training. All those questions have been thrown up by opponents merely to fill the air with dust, produce delay, and defeat action.

In the stress of actual war we are fully ready to trust our all to the military authorities. But whenever immediate danger seems to lessen, teachers and preachers by the thousands, do-gooders, and America-lasters—all are ready to tell the military just what we need. If our military heads do not know what we need, let us replace them; but let us forsake the leadership of those who mostly know nothing at all about the matter, and begin to rely on the experts. The supreme tragedy of our democracy today is not that so many of our people are "blind mice," but rather that so few of us even suspect our blindness.

The simple fact is that we have never been prepared for a single one of the wars fought since we became a Nation. Had not other democracies fought the opposition almost to a standstill before we entered, we might have been thoroughly beaten in both World Wars. I condemn all this quibbling and ask that just once we get ready for war in time of peace, after having followed the opposite course for 175 years.

I believe this is enough, but sometimes I feel that I should love the privilege of having my remarks extended a few thousand words in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Very respectfully yours,

WM. A. COOK.

Will the President Act?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS B. CURTIS

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of April 14, 1951:

WILL THE PRESIDENT ACT?

President Truman has shown that he has the determination and the courage to rebuke insubordination, but the list of unrebuked improprieties among his associates is a growing one. Why does he not deal with them with the same forcefulness?

While applauding Mr. Truman for his handling of the MacArthur problem, the Post-Dispatch is bound to deplore his totally contrary handling of other problems of personnel which come within the Presidential responsibility.

Two new problems of this nature have just been added to an already long list.

There is the Mississippi job-selling scandal, involving Paul Dillon, of St. Louis, one-time lawyer for Capone gangsters. There is the case of the White House aide who is said to have tried to persuade Senator TOBEY not to be too tough on another White House aide in the inquiry into the RFC.

What is the President going to do about these new cases? Is he going to pass them by complacently, as he already has done with many, with such unfortunate results?

Or is he going to begin, even though belatedly, to make plain to present offenders, and to potential future offenders, that ethical laxity in the administration and in the party will not be tolerated by him?

In the Mississippi scandal, Chairman Boyle, of the Democratic National Committee, has fired National Committeeman Hood, but testimony given to the Senate investigators implicates members of the State committee as well. By sworn testimony not only were jobs bought and sold. By admission of the committees' own counsel the committee made it a part of its stated policy to exert political influence on the RFC.

Paul Dillon's alleged part in helping Hood form the pro-Truman committee makes that proceeding all the more suspect, and all the more damaging to Mr. Truman. Dillon once managed a Truman campaign in St. Louis. It was he who helped obtain a parole for four Capone gangsters—Philip D'Andrea, Paul Ricca, Charles Gioe, and Louis Campagna. An appellate court, upholding their conviction, had called these men "a ruthless and grasping crew of blackmailers whose crimes struck at the very heart of society."

Under these circumstances, does Mr. Truman deem it enough for Chairman Boyle to fire the national committeeman from Mississippi? Should not all members of the State committee who participated in the sale of Federal office, or who countenanced it in silence, be replaced with members who can be relied upon? And should not the President in clear terms denounce what has gone on in Mississippi and pledge every effort to expose, halt, and punish all such wrongdoing in the future?

In the affair of the White House aides, former Senator Wheeler, of Montana, says that at the request of one of them, David K. Niles, he asked Senator TOBEY, of New Hampshire, "not to be too tough" on another of them, Donald S. Dawson, who has been mentioned as one of the inner clique exerting political influence on RFC lending policies.

Did Mr. Truman know what Mr. Niles was doing? What kind of check is there against political manipulations by persons close to the President? Does Mr. Truman not think that an attempt by one of his aides to suppress or tone down evidence in a senatorial investigation is grounds for dismissal?

As the Post-Dispatch said the other day, the moral tone of official Washington can hardly be expected to rise higher than the tone the President sets. Here are two cases in which what he does, or fails to do, will either put a brake on the deterioration of Washington ethics, or permit it to go unimpeded on its downward way.

Universal Military Training Necessary to Long-Range Security Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEROY JOHNSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I have come to the conclusion after much study and reflection that we must have UMT as part of our long-term policy for our national security.

Mr. Walter Lippmann, who has an unusual grasp on security problems, had a very penetrating article, which expresses my views, in the New York Herald Tribune on April 16, 1951.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include this article, which I hope every Member of the House will read:

IS UMT NECESSARY?

Considering how hard it is for the layman to understand UMT (universal military training), it is, it seems to me, doing remarkably well in Congress. The reason that UMT is so hard to understand is that it is not needed now, would not and could not be put into general operation now, and if the world conflict brings us nearer to war, it will not be used at all.

The case for UMT rests on the possibility that having rearmed and improved the balance of power we may succeed in doing what we say we are trying to do—namely, to avert a great war. UMT is designed not for a third world war, but for the only alternative to a third world war—namely, for an armed truce between the two coalitions in which they find it possible to coexist.

UMT, therefore, is designed for a time which may or may not come. No one can possibly know for certain whether that time will or will not come. That is to say a time when we are not engaged in ground fighting, as we are now in Korea, when it would be sound military policy not to have as big a standing Army as we hope to have in 1952; when, nevertheless, it would be suicidal folly not to be able to enlarge that smaller Army quickly in case of trouble.

It is fair to say, I think, that the measure would pass readily enough, substantially as General Marshall wishes it, if it were made plainer than it has yet been made that the military-manpower bill contains the draft and universal military training in one package because we must be prepared both for war and for an armed truce—and that it would be exceedingly dangerous not to be prepared for both of these contingencies.

If unhappily war were certain, there would be no point in talking about UMT. We should rely entirely on the draft to prepare for the war and to fight the war. Today, and for at least 2 years to come, our task is to build up our Armed Forces, which were at the level of about 1,400,000 men at the start of the Korean war. The level which we are aiming at is 3,500,000. This is being done by volunteering backed up by the draft. While this build-up is going on UMT is not needed. The men are being trained in the Army before they serve in the Army, and when they have finished their term of service they will remain in the Reserve for some years to come. In this period of emergency build-up the facilities and the instructors needed to operate universal military training on any large scale are preempted by the Army itself.

Moreover, though expert opinion is not unanimous on this point, it is probable that if we are compelled to keep the Armed Forces at the level of 3,500,000 men in uniform, then probably UMT could not be put into operation, nor would UMT be needed with such a big standing Army replenished by the draft. The drafted men, with their long training and service in the Armed Forces and, after that, with their 6 or 8 years in the Reserve, would be all the military manpower that the country—considering its ocean frontiers—could use in the early stages of any war.

Universal military training is preparation for the long pull, the long armed truce which is the best that anybody has reason to hope for. If there is to be a long armed truce, the maintenance of a huge standing army will become a very serious matter. The financial cost to the Government will be huge. But that is almost certainly a comparatively minor part of the trouble. The equipped with portable sound-producing units. There, in the public square, the programs will be played, usually accompanied by a documentary motion-picture film flashed on a sheet stretched across the square. In some cities, where the United States has public-information libraries, transcribed concerts are given to audiences.

How much of the shortwave broadcasts reach the people has not been estimated definitely, although it is known that 50 percent of all residents in Western Germany hear them and there are 2,500,000 steady listeners in France. Some of it gets through the iron curtain, for one Soviet magazine wrote that the Voice was "synonymous with lying and provocational fiction to millions of Soviet people." The jamming that takes place on broadcasts beamed to Russia requires that most of the time be utilized for news and comment so that some of it will get through. Also, music is easily detected, when not of the Soviet vintage, and dire punishment may descend on those who listen to it.

The Voice, however, continues its good work. It sends to Radio Tjanst of Sweden some of the "jam sessions" in Greenwich Village, or the Philadelphia Orchestra for Radio Turkey at Ankara. Radio Rome hears the Metropolitan's performance of "Don Carlo" exactly as produced in New York, and the program of Fred Waring and his Pennsylvanians will be sent over the Andes. Now, in its recorded form, the performance of the National Symphony Orchestra of April 4, broadcast "live" that night, will be placed in many of the "packages" sent out to the far away places of the world.

No Defense Need in the St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the Dallas (Tex.) News of February 4, 1951, carries the following editorial under the caption "No defense need in St. Lawrence." Every Member of Congress should read this interesting editorial:

NO DEFENSE NEED IN ST. LAWRENCE

Patriotism, remarked Samuel Johnson, who knew men, is the last refuge of the damned scoundrel. He said that close to 200 years ago, and human nature has not changed for the better. So when your sleazy politician can think of no better argument, he proffers his shoddy ware in the name of national defense.

So back to Congress once more comes the St. Lawrence project. Hurry, boys, hurry. We must have it for national defense. Forget all of your old objections. Get the thing under way.

To start on, the St. Lawrence is not a genuine waterway project. Even under the best of conditions, it would not be an all-year thoroughfare for deep-draft, oceangoing vessels. The river is ice locked for a substantial part of every year and impassable for traffic. But, as W. F. Heavey, general manager of the Port of Houston, pointed out the other day in a letter to the Wall Street Journal, the proposed 27-foot project is impracticable for ocean ships with pay loads to and from the Great Lakes ports. Even the Houston Ship Channel has an authorized depth of 36 feet. So the obvious idea is to get 27 feet approved, then go later to 36 as a necessity. But costs are estimated only on the first figure.

The St. Lawrence is a hydroelectric power project. In spite of the claims for its prospective power, river flow, as the National St. Lawrence Project Conference, opposing the plan, points out, will limit kilowatt production to 820,000 in the flood season and 570,000 in any low-water period. Present steam plants serving New York City are capable of more than 570,000 kilowatts individually.

The St. Lawrence is not a necessary project. It is questionable if it is in any way desirable. Fully 15 years back the exhaustive research study by the nonpartisan Brookings Institution analyzed the proposal and demonstrated conclusively that the costs would be far out of proportion to the potential benefits. Since then the costs have risen enormously and the benefits have not enlarged. No one has successfully refuted the Brookings figures. Proponents of the project do not even try.

But once more we are told that a costly folly is necessary to defense. Patriotism, as Sam Johnson remarked, is the last refuge.

Talk of Impeachment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD BOLLING

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, the following column by Thomas L. Stokes expresses my views and, I am sure, the views of a substantial majority of the dispassionate citizens of the United States and the free world:

IMPEACH TRUMAN? FOR THESE "CRIMES"?

(By Thomas L. Stokes)

WASHINGTON, April 13.—There's been lots of wild talk about "impeachment" of President Truman because of his removal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

Republicans spilled it all over the Capitol—for 1 day—to try to indicate their high dudgeon and to give an incendiary slogan to telegram and letter addicts all over the country. They never meant it seriously. For they are wise enough politically, since they have created a martyr of their own, not to offer one to the other side. They would thus lose their advantage.

WOULD CLEAR THE AIR

But it might, indeed, clear the air all around if an impeachment of Harry Truman were sought. For there are many counts. Those of us who are familiar with impeachment proceedings can imagine the scene—the solemn managers on the part of the House, which prefers the charges, being announced formally before the Senate, which is the trial body, and submitting the bill of indictment, somewhat as follows:

1. He, Harry Truman, upheld the Constitution of the United States by removing a general who had arrogated to himself the making of policy and thus asserted the supremacy of the civilian over the military.

2. He, Harry Truman, opposed this particular policy which would begin an all-out, all-Asian war, a trap long laid by the Kremlin.

3. He, Harry Truman, formulated the "Truman doctrine" for aid to Greece and Turkey, which was approved by Congress and which checked the advance of Soviet imperialism in that strategic area.

REVISED EUROPEAN ECONOMY

4. He, Harry Truman, espoused the Marshall plan, which Congress approved and which has revived the economy of Western Europe so that its people again are at work, again have hope, and are no longer willing prey for communism which is rapidly losing ground.

5. He, Harry Truman, sponsored the North Atlantic Treaty which the Senate ratified, and which implemented economic aid with military assistance so that Western Europe can defend herself.

6. He, Harry Truman, appointed Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower to command the combined Western European army, which won united support of Congress and the Nation.

7. He, Harry Truman, evolved a new defense program to strengthen our own Nation which Congress is working out, step by step.

8. He, Harry Truman, initiated the United Nations challenge to North Korean Communist aggression, boldly and promptly, recognizing clearly the new Russian strategy of striking through masked satellites and understanding, too, that aggression must be checked where it appears, else the dictator will be emboldened to move as he pleases and on his own terms.

GAVE MACARTHUR SUPPORT

9. He, Harry Truman, opened the way for appointment of Gen. Douglas MacArthur as commander of the U. N. armies, and gave him every support.

10. He, Harry Truman, is for a civil rights program to assure every American citizen the rights guaranteed by our Constitution regardless of race, creed, or color.

11. He, Harry Truman, is for decent wages and working conditions for our people in peace and war; for decent housing, for improved education and health methods and facilities; for development of our natural resources to provide new opportunities for our people.

12. He, Harry Truman, is for curbing the rapacity of the selfish and powerful who would exploit others to their advantage.

13. He, Harry Truman, won the 1948 election.

14. He, Harry Truman, is a Democrat.

15. He, Harry Truman, is a human being, not a superman.

Of all these things he, Harry Truman, is guilty.

And may God have mercy on his soul.

Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. HESS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

NORTH COLLEGE HILL PUBLIC SCHOOLS,
Cincinnati, Ohio, April 6, 1951.

Hon. WILLIAM E. HESS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HESS: Though I have been one of your constituents for several years, I have never bothered your office with a communication, but now it's different: Today I received a release from the National Education Association opposing universal military training. I am a life member of the NEA, and a churchman from my youth, but the present leadership of both organizations totally misrepresents my views on national preparedness.

Abdul Hamid Zanganeh, and the decision of the Iranian Parliament to nationalize the great Anglo-Iranian Oil Co., the situation in that country has reached trigger-fine explosiveness. Upon the outcome of that situation could depend no less a thing than world peace itself.

Lying on the southern borders of the Soviet Union and within a few minutes' flying distance of the main Russian oil fields, Iran is of great importance for at least two reasons. First is its strategic importance. If Iran should go Communist, Russian influence would reach the Indian Ocean, the Middle East would be isolated from India, and the whole balance of power in that part of the world would shift.

The second reason is oil—black, thick, priceless, and nearly inexhaustible. Several thousand years ago the ancient Iranians founded a religious movement called Zoroastrianism, based upon the worship of fire, which they would kindle from the dark, oily ooze which soaked through their country's soil. Now, however, that oil is used to fire something else—the trucks, tanks, planes of the West's military might.

CRUCIAL TO RUSSIA

Yet important as this oil is to the West—it supplies the major portion of Britain's home consumption and is a tremendous dollar earner—it would be even more important to the Soviet Union. Best estimates are that oil production is lagging throughout the Communist world, and it is believed that this may be one of the reasons Moscow so far has avoided a general war. With reserve stocks from Iran, Russian hesitancy might possibly change.

As well as any place in the world, Iran typifies what the forces of democracy are up against in their effort to establish stability and to insure peace. Simply put, Iran is a bewildering compound of unbelievable poverty, stupendous riches, diplomatic intrigue, and hatred for foreigners.

On one side stands the mass of the people—toiling, illiterate, and so poor that they are barely able to feed and clothe their children. On the other side stands the tiny coterie of land owners, industrialists, tribal sheiks, and politicians—owning most of the land, receiving all the privileges, giving all the orders, and monopolizing the country's fabulous wealth.

TWO SEETHING ELEMENTS

This condition has produced two dangerous elements of discord. The first is the Communist Tudeh Party, which aims to turn the country into another Soviet satellite. The activities of this party gave the United Nations its first crisis when, in the spring of 1946, Tudehists attempted to set up an independent left-wing state in the Iranian Province of Azerbaijan.

The second dangerous element is that of wild and exaggerated nationalism, which sees every foreigner as an enemy and every tie with the outside world as exploitation. It was this element which caused the assassination of General Razmara and forced through the nationalization of oil. In a way, these nationalists are as dangerous as the Tudehists, since their activities, if unchecked, could produce such economic and political chaos as to cause Iran's internal collapse.

In other words, conditions in Iran are those which produce the muddy waters of social and economic discord in which communism has learned to fish with signal success. Once roiled, such waters seldom clear until at least some of the legitimate demands of the poor and discontented have been satisfied.

While it is true that a few preliminary steps have been taken in the direction of greater social justice, such as distribution of the royal estates among the needy peasants, only the surface has been scratched so far.

In the opinion of those who have followed Iranian developments most closely, two things are needed.

First and foremost, the West must avoid further antagonizing the nationalists. With patience, it seems likely that the nationalists can be satisfied and the West can obtain Iran's oil.

After that, it is clear that some new and greater contribution must be made to Iran's economic betterment. For many months, Iran has sought a $25,000,000 loan from the United States—a tiny amount when set against today's vast military expenditures. When the loan did not materialize, it added noticeably to that antiwestern sentiment which lies as close to the Iranian surface as do the oil deposits—and is just as inflammable.

Iran is not lost to the West yet. Indeed, there is no irresistible reason why it should be lost. But events of the past month have shown how easy it could be to lose that rich and strategic area. Only wisdom, firmness, diplomacy, and generosity on the part of the West, principally in Washington and London, can prevent the iron curtain from enclosing that land as it has enclosed so many others.

The MacArthur Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES P. RICHARDS

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials from the State, Columbia, S. C., of April 13 and 14, 1951:

[From the Columbia (S. C.) State of April 13, 1951]

THE MACARTHUR CASE

Since General MacArthur is a military man, born and bred, it is hard for us to understand why he would continue to broadcast his views on the international situation, when his superior in rank had admonished him not to do so. Evidently the general was so convinced that his program was necessary that he felt he should disregard usual military injunctions. Or, perhaps, the general, so long accustomed to being a law unto himself, not even returning to this country some months ago to testify when invited by a Senate committee to do so, had begun to think he was not subject to orders. As to the whys and wherefores of General MacArthur's attitude, we wouldn't know. We are only speculating. But the fact cannot be overlooked that he is charged with ignoring directives, and if he did, therein lies a basic weakness in his case.

That General MacArthur not only was expected, but was obligated, to give the country the benefit of his thinking as to our future course in the Far East is not to be denied by any fair person. But if those responsible for our overhead planning felt that public utterance of conflicting views by one in General MacArthur's position hindered the Nation's efforts to avoid a third world war, then it was reasonable to ask that such statements be cleared through Washington. If General MacArthur felt he could not comply with this request, he could have freed himself from any limitations by asking to be relieved. And we don't understand why he didn't do so and beat the President to the draw.

As to whether the MacArthur plan or the Washington plan is the better way to prevent a third world war is not a question to be settled by public debate. But in forming policies, authority must be placed in some hand, and the Constitution gives this supreme command to the President, whether or not he be an able military man. However, a wise executive in any field seeks, and takes, sound advice from competent people. We hope President Truman availed himself of the counsel of such men as General Marshall, Chief of Staff Collins, and others before determining upon a course.

The debate will rage for years as to whether General MacArthur should have been relieved. And there will always be differences of opinion in the matter. But for the moment, the question is academic. General MacArthur is no longer in command, and the President is not going to reverse himself and reinstate him.

General Ridgway, a competent officer of wide experience, is the man charged now with the responsibility of leading our troops in Korea and directing Japanese affairs. It is an almost superhuman task that has been assigned him, to take over where General MacArthur, with years in the Orient, has left off. But General Ridgway's shoulders are broad, and we believe he is competent to assume the multipost role which has been thrust upon him so suddenly.

When General MacArthur returns to the States there will be much to-do over him. He likely will be the center of demonstrations. The public will line up for and against him. He will be spoken of as the Republican candidate for President, and might get the nomination. All of which is all right. This is a free country and we should have free expression. But this is all right only so long as the dispute does not hamper us in our war effort. Personalities must be placed second when a country is fighting for its existence.

[From the Columbia (S. C.) State of April 14, 1951]

NO PLACE FOR POLITICS

One unfortunate angle to the MacArthur removal is that already it is taking on a political aspect, and this is no time for a partisan line-up on foreign policy.

The Republicans are leading the denunciation of the President. They are even talking of instituting impeachment proceedings, but on what ground it is not clear. Democrats of the national hue are lining up behind Mr. Truman. And a merry war of party accusations is in full rage. This is to be regretted. The MacArthur case should be argued on its merits, and on its merits only.

If General Ridgway proves to the leader that those who know him expect him to be; if he does as well as chief of the Far Eastern Command as he did as general of the Eighth Army, the fury will in comparatively short time be spent. But if there is a turn for the worse in Korea, and the international situation elsewhere does not look so good, MacArthur's stock will rise, and Truman will be blamed for the course the war has taken.

As the State sees it, this is no time for wild talk, incrimination, and reincrimination. It is a time for calm decision. Like or dislike of either Truman or MacArthur should have no place in the appraisal of the drastic action which removed with one stroke of the pen an honored general from all of his commands.

If General MacArthur failed to respect the admonitions of his superior officer, the President, and persisted in making statements which embarrassed Washington in its dealings with other countries, he courted reprimand and possibly removal. Perhaps that was his way of making his point. We don't serious difficulty will be the young men in the camps—their education and their careers interrupted, separated from their families and friends, their normal plans to marry and raise families postponed—with not enough to do and with no reason to feel that what they are doing is urgent and important.

A great standing army, which is not going off to war, is—as the American people have always known—dangerous and demoralizing and wasteful. It will generate pressures—pressure to have a war and get it over with or pressure not to have a war and to go home. An Army affecting Congress and public opinion in this fashion will make it impossible to carry out a firm and prudent foreign policy. Universal military training is designed to train a Reserve for the Armed Forces which will permit the standing Army to be reduced—if 2 or 3 years hence when we are rearmed, war is not imminent and we are in an armed truce.

The more one studies the matter, the more impressive—so it seemed to me—is the military statesmanship of Marshall and Lovett. They have understood, as almost everyone has, the imperative necessity of increasing rapidly our immediate military power. They have understood, as I suppose most of us have, that our military power must be capable of rapid expansion beyond the expansion which is actually undertaken now.

But they have understood also, though not many understood it at the outset, that they must not expand the Military Establishment beyond the point of no return—that is to say to a size where it cannot be supported indefinitely and where, therefore, a war becomes necessary before the Military Establishment deteriorates. It is a very high form of statesmanship—to have grasped this and to have been able to translate the idea into a concrete military program. But that is how and why universal military training has become an integral part of a sound military policy.

Letter From a Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include a ringing letter of Americanism addressed by Marine Sgt. Albert Currier to all Americans:

[From the Boston Sunday Globe of April 1, 1951]

LETTER FROM A MARINE

(Marine Sgt. Albert Currier, 28-year-old Nahant veteran of World War II, is a patient at Chelsea Naval Hospital where he has been recovering from severe head wounds received while serving with E Company, Second Battalion, Seventh Regiment, First Marine Division at the Choisin Reservoir, Korea. He wrote this letter to parents before starting convalescent leave which he will spend with his wife and three children. He tells what the Marine Corps has meant to him. He expects to be hospitalized for the next year and a half. Sergeant Currier's father and two brothers were also marines.)

DEAR FATHERS AND MOTHERS OF MEN WHO SOON MAY ENTER SERVICE: I know it's tough to see your boy leave home to enter military service, but, believe me, the forces that threaten our American way of life aren't fooling. Even though you realize this you're probably lying awake nights wondering what is best for your boy to do.

Perhaps, as you read this, you'll wonder how a guy with a hole in his head can bring you any comfort. Well, there's no getting round it, that's a chance that every man takes when called to defend his country.

But, sure as shootin', his chances for survival are greater if he belongs to an outfit that demands ample training before going into combat and teaches him, through mind and body coordination, to think and act quickly. That's what you get in the Marine Corps and that's what paid off at the Choisin Reservoir. There could have been thousands more casualties in the strategic withdrawal from Hanghum but for the discipline, unity, and teamwork of marines trained for leadership.

It was that strict discipline throughout the ranks that made it possible for the marines to fight their way out of the icy Communist trap at the reservoir, bringing their wounded with them. It was why they were able to salvage men and equipment with the exception of useless articles of personnel gear in the successful though desperate evacuation of Hanghum.

To be a marine is to learn the meaning of comradeship. Take me, for example. I got hit up near the reservoir on top of a 3,500-foot hill. It was November 4, and the day before we'd seen our first Chinese Communist, two prisoners in heavy quilted clothes who walked into us. I was covering our forward observers with harassing fire—setting my mortar to the right range when I saw a green flash, felt something like a bee sting, and that was the last I knew till I woke up in the Tokyo General Hospital 6 days later on the birthday of the Marine Corps.

GETS BEST TREATMENT

But my buddies took care of me. They applied wound compresses and carried me down the hill, on a stretcher, two at a time on relief. I don't know how long it took them to get through the thick underbrush and shrubbery, but I do know that it took 3½ hours to climb the hill in the first place.

They turned me in to the aid station, where I got blood plasma and had my dressings changed. Then they went back to fight. Later I got a letter from them with a paragraph from each gun crew and every guy in the platoon signed it. I won't part with that letter in a hurry. You see, I'm 28, years older than most of my buddies, so they used to call me the mother of the outfit.

To show the kind of medical care that a man gets in the Marine Corps, I want to tell you that 9 hours after I got hit I was on the operating table at Tokyo General Hospital, after being flown out of the line by helicopter to Hungnam Airfield and then by emergency flight to Tokyo.

The wound had caused hemorrhage of the brain and 32 fragments of bone were removed from the back of my skull. I got 7 pints of whole blood and 47 spinal taps. While I was unconscious a Gray Lady wrote to my wife in almost the same words I would have used myself. Every week while I was on the critical list my wife was notified of my progress.

If your boy joins the Marine Corps, I hope he'll never need the drastic medical treatment I did; but if he does, he'll get it—the best all the way through. He'll also have religious guidance and counsel in personal problems from the chaplain of his faith. He'll be taught discipline, manners, and morals. And he won't lack for educational opportunities.

THE OUTFIT IS TOPS

The Marine Corps Institute offers more than 200 correspondence courses, at Government expense, earning up to 2 years' college credit. Marine Corps training courses in aviation, Diesel engines, photography, radio, telegraphy, cooking, baking, engineering, business administration, and other subjects fit a man for a civilian job and additional income after retirement. The higher his rating, the more retirement pay he'll get.

Pride in the Marine Corps, in being a member of a tough outfit that has been winning battles for 175 years, is something a man never loses. Once a marine, always a marine; and if you see a man who has served in the corps walking down the street in civilian clothes, you'll recognize him. It's a wholesome feeling.

During the war we were all together in the Pacific, all in the Second Marine Division. My brother Bill was the first to go in 1942. He served in First Marine Aviation at Munda. Then my dad, Donald H. Currier, volunteered at the age of 48. He was the only one of us to get wounded—on the Marshall Islands. I joined up after he did, and then my brother Donald H., Jr., came in.

I saw dad at Pearl Harbor, then went on to Saipan and then to Tinian, where I met Donald. From there I went to Okinawa, and after the Japanese surrender served 3½ months' occupation duty. I got my discharge from the Marine Corps Reserve that year, but reenlisted in the Regulars in 1947.

My son wants to be a marine, and if he was 18 he would be.

Good luck to you and your boy.

Iran's Crisis Explosive

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. CALEB BOGGS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an article entitled "Iran's Crisis Explosive," written by Joseph G. Harrison, foreign editor of the Christian Science Monitor.

This article was reprinted as a public service by the International Latex Corp., of Dover, Del., and appeared in the Washington Post on April 3, 1951.

The International Latex Corp. has established a wide reputation over a period of years of public service advertisements in order to bring to the attention of the public various views and information available on many important problems.

The article is as follows:

IRAN'S CRISIS EXPLOSIVE

(By Joseph G. Harrison, foreign editor of the Christian Science Monitor)

Most of vast Asia, from its dripping jungles to its glacial highlands, is in turmoil.

Whole nations, peoples, and areas—some of them with cultures thousands of years old—are in upheaval, discarding the old, trying the new, overthrowing governments, strengthening democracy, or establishing dictatorships.

Surprised by the violence of movements affecting hundreds of millions of persons, the Western World must adapt itself now to a new Asia. And it must do so swiftly and wisely if it is to save what remains of that immense land mass for democracy and progress.

If there has been any doubt about this, it now has been forcefully dispelled by the recent events in Iran.

TRIGGER-FINE STATUS

With the assassination of Premier Ali Razmara and former Minister of Education know. On the other hand, if, as one of his chief aides declared, the general disobeyed no directives, the specific cause of removal is not so clear. But this much is certain: The President, acting either on his own or with advice of consultants, decided he thought General MacArthur's attitude was hurting the country's chances of remaining out of a third world war, and, justifiably or unjustifiably, ordered the general to turn his duties over to someone else. Mr. Truman having acted, General MacArthur is out, but our problems in the Far East and elsewhere are still with us. This it would be fatal to forget.

To show how the argument is becoming an interparty one, Senator WHERRY in replying to the President spoke not as an individual Senator incensed over what had occured but as the Senate's Republican leader. He made no effort to conceal his partisan approach.

If the defense effort has been set back, as many contend, by MacArthur's removal, it will be further set back if our foreign relations are put on a partisan, rather than a bipartisan, basis. The good of the country must be put above the 1952 election.

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, for some time I have wondered how long the President of the United States, Commander in Chief, would tolerate the disobedience of General of the Army MacArthur to the orders of his superiors and his disregard of the policies of our Nation and as approved by the United Nations and all of our leaders.

In the past few days I have inserted in the RECORD, for the information of the House and the country, several articles, editorials, and comments of several outstanding recognized international authorities. Today I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an article by Wallace Deuel which appeared in the Washington Sunday Star of April 15 that clearly sets forth the willful disregard of General MacArthur on four occasions, to assurances given to the emissary of the President, W. Averell Harriman, to Chief of Staff General Collins, and to the President himself who, for and in the interest of peace, traveled thousands of miles to confer with General MacArthur. Consequently, I cannot understand why many people fail to realize that it is not a question between President Truman and General MacArthur as individuals but one involving the authority of the office of the Presidency under the Constitution of the United States.

It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that this situation has arisen in willful disregard of orders and purposely made to create a political issue, in cooperation with and upon the insistence of the Republican leaders and newspapers. Mr. Deuel's article follows, and I also include an Associated Press report captioned "Vatican paper backs Truman firing of Mac":

[From the Washington Star of April 15, 1951]

CONSTITUTIONAL DIVISION OF POWERS FIGURES IN TRUMAN-MACARTHUR RUPTURE—PRINCIPLE IS OFTEN MORE HONORED IN BREACH THAN IN PRACTICE—OTHER MILITARISTS HAVE RAISED ISSUE

(By Wallace Deuel)

The Nation's most colorful and most controversial senior soldier tried to defy the Constitution this week—and failed.

President Truman relieved General of the Army Douglas MacArthur of his command for prolonged and repeated flouting of orders and replaced him with Lt. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway.

Republicans, who have long been partial to MacArthur—as he has sometimes seemed to be to them—sprang to his defense, the general prepared to come home to state his case, and the country was plunged into a bitter controversy.

The final outcome and consequences of these dramatic events remained uncertain at week's end. At least one towering fact emerged out of all the fire and fury, however:

This fact is that President Truman has reasserted the constitutional principle of the supremacy of the civilian authority of the Republic over the military.

HONORED IN BREACH

It has sometimes seemed, during the past decade or more, that this principle has been more honored in the breach than in the observance.

Enjoying vast powers, and checked by few lets or hindrances, some of America's strong-willed generals and admirals have tended to act as though they were answerable to no superior authority, civil or military. Discipline, to these men, has appeared to be something which they imposed on others, but which was not to be imposed on them. There has been no one, it has seemed at times, who could command the commanders.

"The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when called into actual service of the United States," the Constitution provides. Some generals have not obeyed.

The Constitution also makes the President primarily responsible for the conduct of the country's foreign relations, too, but some generals have not paid conspicuous heed to this provision either.

General MacArthur has finally forced this constitutional issue of the powers of the Presidency.

MacArthur has been a proud and imperious man all his life, and he has been increasingly intransigent since the end of World War II. He has outdone even himself, however, since the outbreak of the Korean conflict.

The drama of his defiance during this latter period has played itself out in a prologue and four acts—up to now.

PROLOGUE

The curtain rose on the prologue early in August, when MacArthur flew to Formosa, last precarious foothold of the Chinese Nationalist regime of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, to discuss plans for the island's defense.

The military dispositions which MacArthur made are still official secrets. In addition to making these arrangements, however, the general also did two other things which, far from remaining secret, attracted world-wide and not altogether indulgent notice:

He kissed Mme. Chiang's hand (notwithstanding the fact that the hand was gloved at the time) and he uttered spirited and martial sentiments about Formosa, the Chinese civil war, communism, and world policy in general.

The Chinese Nationalists exploited these statements to the utmost. They also intimated that MacArthur had gone much further, in secret conversations, and had promised them support above and beyond any contemplated by American policy.

This all caused some unease in Washington, and it caused even greater unease among America's friends and allies.

The United States had U. N. sanction, and it had allies, in what it was doing in Korea, but it had neither in what it was doing in Formosa. There, America was alone. Its allies, indeed, heartily disapproved of America's China policy. The United States might completely isolate itself in the world if it did what MacArthur seemed to propose should be done.

President Truman decided there was some danger that MacArthur might have mistaken what American national policy was. Accordingly, he sent W. Averell Harriman, special White House adviser on foreign affairs, on a mission to explain matters to the general.

Mr. Harriman returned to Washington, in due course, full of assurances. All was in order, he said. MacArthur understood what policy was and would, of course, respect it. The general is a soldier, said Mr. Harriman; he will do what he is told.

The prologue of the drama ended on this tranquillizing note.

Hardly were Mr. Harriman's shirts back from the laundry, however, when General MacArthur demonstrated that he could not have paid too close attention to what the White House emissary had said. For the curtain now rose on the general's first virtually open defiance of the President.

ACT I

Mr. Truman had proclaimed that the United States had no selfish interests in Formosa, and no aggressive designs on it. This country had intervened in the island only temporarily and only to neutralize it, the President had said—to protect the flank of the forces fighting in Korea, and to prevent the spread of the conflict. The future status of the island could be determined only by international agreement after peace had been restored.

This policy was not to MacArthur's liking, and he opposed it in official recommendations to his superiors in Washington. The general was overruled, however. The policy would stand, he was informed, and must be upheld.

But MacArthur refused to uphold it. On the contrary, he appealed to public opinion against his superiors.

He sent a message to the Veterans of Foreign Wars, then in convention assembled in Chicago, in which he repeated the same arguments against the national policy which his superiors had rejected. Some of the arguments were even stated in the same language in the message as that in which they had been stated in the recommendations.

American policy, General MacArthur said, must be aggressive. The whole Pacific must be an American moat.

Formosa, he insisted, was an essential link in an "island chain" from which "we can dominate with air power every Asiatic port from Vladivostok to Singapore." America must, accordingly, retain control of the island indefinitely, for the purposes of this country's own national security.

The arguments of those who differed with him were "fallacious and threadbare," MacArthur said, and were marked by "hypocrisy and sophistry." It was unfortunate that these arguments had "confused and deluded" many individuals "distant from the actual scene."

The general sent a large number of advance copies of this remarkable statement to friends and acquaintances in the United States, and to a wide assortment of editors, but he did not send any to the State Department, the Pentagon, or the White House. Official Washington learned about the message from newspapermen shortly before it was due to be released.

President Truman was intensely annoyed. He immediately ordered MacArthur to withdraw his message. The general complied. The message could not be suppressed, however. It was already in the hands of too many people. It was published on August 28.

American policy thus was again frustrated, American pledges were again made suspect, and America's allies were again alarmed and alienated.

The President nevertheless made another effort to keep the peace with MacArthur. He sent the general a message praising him for his military accomplishments and explaining once again, with conspicuous tact, what American policy in Asia was and why he had had to ask that the general's message be withdrawn. General MacArthur seemed to accept the President's position and once again harmony seemed to reign.

Once again the curtain fell on a peaceful note. All seemed well, or at least reasonably well.

ACT II

Yet misgivings may have lingered in the President's mind. In any event, Mr. Truman flew to Wake Island on October 12 for a personal visit with MacArthur.

There were conferences in which other officials took part, and the President and the general talked privately for an hour as well. Mr. Truman returned to the United States on October 16, professedly as full of confidence and good will as Mr. Harriman was previously.

The President paid stirring public tributes to MacArthur, and proclaimed that all was and would be well. He denounced a reporter who asked him at a press conference on October 19 if he and the general were now in agreement. It was outrageous even to raise such a question, the President angrily declared.

This was not, of course, an answer to the question which the reporter had asked. Were the President and the general in agreement or were they not? Perhaps the President wasn't sure himself.

But if there were any doubts in Mr. Truman's mind, they were soon dispelled.

ACT III

In November General MacArthur launched an offensive which was to destroy such of the enemy's remaining forces as could be destroyed and drive the rest out of the country.

This was to be an "end the war" offensive. "I want to make good on my statement that they (the U. N. troops) are going to eat their Christmas dinner at home," the general said.

But the offensive ended in tragedy. The Chinese Communists intervened in Korea on a massive scale, and threw the U. N. forces reeling back to below the thirty-eighth parallel.

This was a military disaster, but not yet a political one. MacArthur, however, now threatened to turn the defeat into a political disaster too.

There was some public criticism of the general's conduct of the "end the war" offensive, and some questioning as to whether he should have undertaken it at all. MacArthur reacted with characteristically fierce resentment.

"Never was a man so sorely tried," he exclaimed, and he made a whole series of public pronouncements in which he blamed the defeat in Korea on Washington and on the United Nations.

He blamed them for not warning him that the Chinese Communists would intervene. He blamed them for denying him authority to bomb Manchuria. He said that the limitations imposed on him were unprecedented in military annals.

General MacArthur also asked that he be allowed to use Chinese Nationalist troops in Korea, and he said yet once again that it was necessary to destroy world communism in Asia.

There was much sympathy for MacArthur at this juncture of affairs. But the course of action he was advocating was contrary to the best military judgment in Washington. It was contrary to national policy. It was contrary to repeated assurances as to American intentions which this Government had proclaimed to the world. It was contrary to the policies of America's principal friends and allies. It was contrary to MacArthur's instructions.

Once again the general seemed to be confirming Communist charges that the United States had embarked on a policy of aggression in the Far East, and once again he alarmed and alienated America's allies.

This was the third occasion in 3 months on which the general had undertaken publicly, contrary to the orders of his Commander in Chief, to reverse the Nation's foreign policy. The President, however, still tried to keep the peace with his commander.

Publicly, Mr. Truman stoutly defended General MacArthur against his critics, and even privately he limited himself to directing the Joint Chiefs of Staff to admonish the general to clear future military and foreign policy utterances with his superiors. Categorical instructions to this effect went to MacArthur on December 6.

Washington also sent Lt. Gen. J. Lawton Collins, Army Chief of Staff, to the Far East to confer with General MacArthur and, among other things, to request him to pay more heed to orders and advice from the Capital.

General Collins returned as optimistic as Mr. Harriman and the President had been after their conferences with MacArthur. He had just as little justification for his cheery mood as the President and Mr. Harriman had had for theirs, as events were once more to prove.

ACT IV

The fourth and thus far final act of the drama opened March 20.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff on that day sent MacArthur a message informing him that the United States was planning, in cooperation with other United Nations members, to make a new cease-fire proposal to the Chinese Communists. The Joint Chiefs asked the general to send them any comment he might care to make on this proposal.

General MacArthur did not reply to the Joint Chiefs' request. Instead, on March 24, he made a cease-fire proposal of his own. In it he threatened that the U. N. might attack the Chinese mainland if Peiping did not stop fighting in Korea.

General MacArthur followed this up with a second stirring manifesto which he gave out the next day.

This 48-hour period of March 24 and 25 was the point of no return in the general's destiny. The action of the drama now quickened.

On March 24 the Joint Chiefs sent MacArthur a new admonition:

"The President has directed," they informed him, "that your attention be called to his order as transmitted December 6, 1950. In view of the information given you March 20, 1951, any further statements by you must be coordinated as prescribed in the order of December 6."

"Must?" This reminder had no more effect than the original order had had.

On April 5, Representative JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., Republican, of Massachusetts, House minority leader, read on the floor of the House a letter General MacArthur had written him insisting yet once again that world communism must be fought in Asia, and fought now—as, indeed, the general said he was doing.

On the same day, the London Daily Telegraph published an interview which it said General MacArthur had given its military correspondent and in which the general was quoted as saying much the same things he had written to Representative MARTIN, but in even more intransigent tones and terms.

There was to be one more incident before the denouement. The magazine Freeman published a message from General MacArthur to one of its editors in which the general asserted that 120,000 South Korean troops had been released from combat duty by "political" decisions beyond his authority.

The clear implication was that this action had been taken against MacArthur's wishes, and that it had unduly weakened his forces.

In fact, the Joint Chiefs of Staff had proposed providing arms for these troops, and for a considerable larger number in addition, for the purpose of maintaining them in the field in Korea, but MacArthur had recommended that the arms be given to the Japanese national police reserve instead.

It was only now, finally and at long last, that the President took decisive action against his contumacious commander. Mr. Truman acted in the only manner which remained possible if any action was to be taken at all: He relieved General MacArthur of his command, told the world why he was doing so, and published some of the evidence in the case.

General MacArthur's challenge to the constitutional authority of the President has been so spectacular that some shrewd observers think the general has deliberately forced the climax which was reached this week. He was determined to achieve either absolute authority or a sensational martyrdom, in this view.

The martyrdom, if that should be his lot, would be peculiarly poignant if General MacArthur should appear to fall victim to foreigners, politicians, diplomats, and other such unloved persons, and the general has sought to formulate the issue in these terms. The more raucous of his admirers echo and outdo him in this claim.

In fact, however, the issue is between MacArthur and the Constitution of the United States. The issue is whether the civilian Commander in Chief is to exercise effective authority over the military.

This would be the issue even if there were important disagreements between America and its principal allies and associates on the fundamentals of the policy which the general has defied, or between the Pentagon and the White House. But there are no such disagreements, so far as the duly constituted authorities are concerned.

There is a clear consensus among these authorities, both military and civilian, that the challenge of world communism must be met in the first instance in Europe, not in Asia.

There is a clear consensus, furthermore, that the Communist challenge must be met, so long as conceivably possible, by means short of general war—and that there is a fair chance that it can be met successfully by such means.

The free nations must seek to localize any and every conflict which may break out, in this judgment. Above all, they must avoid, at almost any cost, being drawn into a major war on the mainland of Asia.

If general war is to come, then it must come only because the Communists are determined it must come, and force it on the world. The free nations must not start it.

Unacceptable Explanation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS B. CURTIS
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Joplin Globe of April 13, 1951:

UNACCEPTABLE EXPLANATION

In his radio address to the Nation Wednesday night, President Truman attempted to justify his summary dismissal of General MacArthur by explaining that the general is not in agreement with United States and UN policy in the Far East.

Even if one grants that this is true, it by no means will be deemed a sufficient excuse by MacArthur's admirers and supporters for the harsh and spectacular method used in ousting the general from all his commands.

But it is also true that millions are by no means convinced United States and UN policy as President Truman outlined it has been clear enough heretofore for General MacArthur or anybody else to understand just what it is or has been.

Merely to plead that we want no third world war is no explanation for the unceremonious firing of MacArthur. Nobody wants a third world war. Certainly MacArthur doesn't. But neither he nor millions of others are ready to accept a back-down from the position taken by the United States and the UN last June as the only safe recipe for avoiding a third world war.

Such a back-down is exactly what is proposed by the Asia policy as described by President Truman Wednesday night.

When he directed MacArthur to use United States military forces to challenge the aggression of North Koreans last June the idea was that the free nations of the world must make all of Korea safe for freedom. Now the President and his advisers are apparently convinced we cannot do this; that the best out is to accept a compromise that will leave the North Koreans at the thirty-eighth parallel to ready themselves for another march into South Korea at some future date.

Is it surprising General MacArthur would be dissatisfied with any such conclusion to a war that has already cost the United States more than 50,000 casualties? He is the type that believes in finishing a job. He doesn't accept defeat, partial or complete, with complacency, which is the major explanation for his great popularity with so many Americans. And which also is a major and sufficient reason why he should never have been subjected to the outrageous treatment he has been accorded.

General MacArthur's Dismissal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. McGUIRE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am happy to insert in the RECORD an editorial that appeared in the New Haven (Conn.) Evening Register April 11, 1951, which reflects an unbiased and mature reaction to the removal of General MacArthur.

I am proud to see the New Haven Register join the great majority of the responsible press of the country by endorsing the action of President Truman:

GENERAL MACARTHUR'S DISMISSAL

It had to happen.

President Truman's decision to remove General MacArthur from the Supreme Command in the Far East involving not merely the war in Korea but also the supreme command in the whole Asiatic area and the occupation of Japan was determined upon, no doubt, after the most serious consideration. The policies of the President and of General MacArthur were clearly divergent. The general had merely a military situation to consider; the President had both the military and the diplomatic situation to pass upon.

Under the Constitution the President is declared to be the Commander in Chief of our military forces. However wise the attitude of General MacArthur in deciding upon a total all-out war in the Far East and that of the President in proceeding more cautiously, taking into consideration the views of our allies in Europe and in the United Nations, the decision was up to the President and to the President alone. General MacArthur could not be permitted to assume the dual role.

Whether in the course of events the President or General MacArthur is right as to the policy that should be pursued, it was certainly not up to the general to decide. He necessarily could not know all the facts and it was his duty to fall in line with the instructions he received, whether they seemed to him wise or not.

This leaves the situation very unclear. For a long time the American public has been deeply divided in its opinion as to what our policy in this whole world crisis should be. The American public has been restless under what has appeared to be a policy of indecision in our national leadership, an indecision made more evident by divergent political views expressed in Washington. For a time at least, this apparent indecision must continue for the simple reason that it would be most unwise from any standpoint to let the Russians know just what our ultimate plans are to be. They will not know now whether they have got to prepare for a long war in Asia or in the Middle East or in the Balkans or in Western Europe. What they do know now is that plans are being made to cope with aggression wherever it may seem to be most threatening and to meet it there, not merely with all the power we can command, but with the fullest cooperation of the countries in Western Europe and our allies in the United Nations, to whom we are committed and whose opinions and judgment we are naturally called upon to consider if we are to preserve that unity which is essential to a final accomplishment of our aims. While the American people are naturally most anxious to know what our policy is to be, they should, in our opinion, exercise the greatest patience and not participate in any political maneuvering that should make it necessary to let the Russians know what to expect.

In the meantime—and, in fact, that has been true from the very beginning—the most unwise and unpatriotic course at the moment would be to force a disclosure to the Russians of what they may have to meet. Let us keep them guessing. We should proceed as rapidly as possible in our military and industrial preparations so that if and when a more immediate crisis or threat of aggression should develop it can be promptly and effectively dealt with.

Rubber Exports

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. M. G. BURNSIDE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include two announcements as recorded.

A number of my colleagues have discussed matters related to the following announcements, and some of them asked me to secure information for the RECORD so the questions could be pinpointed:

The Board of Trade announced last night that licenses will be required from April 9 for the export of raw gutta-percha, raw natural rubber, including crepe, and natural rubber latex, to all destinations other than the Commonwealth, the Irish Republic, and the United States.

ANNOUNCEMENT MADE BY THE FEDERATION OF MALAYA AND SINGAPORE APRIL 5, 1951

The Governments of the Federation of Malaya and Singapore announced jointly last night their intention of adopting measures of destinational control over rubber exports. This conforms with the recently announced decision of the British Government to control such exports in order to prevent unduly large quantities of rubber being sent to any destinations so that insufficient supplies are left available for the United Kingdom and other friendly countries.

2. In the Federation, open general licenses for rubber exports will be withdrawn from April 9, when all exports will come under

And again, if general war comes, the primary effort to win it must be made in Europe, not Asia.

This country's constitutional authorities also agree with those of most of the rest of the free world in their attitude toward MacArthur's policy acts and utterances of the past 9 months.

They do not mean and do not intend to be overruled and reversed by any single individual. Least of all do they mean or intend to be overruled and reversed by the open defiance of a general who, no matter how great a field marshal he may be, they have finally, reluctantly, and regretfully concluded is dangerously mistaken in his thinking and dangerously unsuited in temperament for the great responsibilities which always must accompany great authority.

[From the Chicago Sun-Times of April 14, 1951]

VATICAN PAPER BACKS TRUMAN FIRING OF MAC

VATICAN CITY.—Osservatore Romano's news commentator said Saturday, President Truman's dismissal of General MacArthur proclaims a "desire for peace, not by words, but by a decisive act—one that might even be against his own popularity."

The comment—by Giorgio Luigi Bernucci—was the first on MacArthur to appear in the Vatican newspaper that usually reflects the opinion of Pope Pius XII.

Bernucci pointed out that some commentators had observed that the Korean situation would not be altered by the general's recall, but only if the United Nations desire to negotiate met a similar willingness on the part of Peiping.

"But," said the Osservatore writer, "MacArthur remained the expression of that policy that held all further diplomatic effort to be useless and thought that the decision could be obtained only by military success—in practice, war against China with all the risks that could come from it."

Inviting World War III?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES I. DOLLIVER
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David Lawrence, from the United States News and World Report for April 20, 1951:

INVITING WORLD WAR III?

(By David Lawrence)

One issue transcends all others in the controversy that has risen over the removal of General MacArthur as the United Nations Commander in the Far East.

It is whether this sensational step will be construed by the Politburo in Moscow as a sign of strength or of weakness. Will not the very circumstances under which the general was relieved of his command encourage the aggressors and lead them to extend their bold adventures in different parts of the world?

General MacArthur has been the symbol of a determined resistance against Communist aggression—a symbol of the use of total force against an unscrupulous enemy. His removal amounts to a political restriction upon the right of a military commander to fight the enemy with a maximum use of air power directed to any part of adjacent enemy territory.

Instead of fighting a war to win, we are to drag along in a stalemate in Korea—we are to fight without a decision or a second front in Asia to harass our enemies. For months and maybe years, our troops will be subjected to recurrent attacks, while the Chinese Communists, aided by Russian supplies and equipment, continuously pour their manpower into the Korean Peninsula and steadily increase our casualty lists.

The American is not one accustomed to fighting with his hands tied behind his back. Several hundred Russian jet planes attacked our air force last week in what the news dispatches described as "the greatest jet battle in history." Yet Mr. Truman says we must not attack the bases from which these jets came. If the Commander in Chief in Washington, however, calls for a limited war and wants it fought that way, every soldier and sailor and airman must obey. Certainly the President has a constitutional right to secure compliance with his orders and to remove General MacArthur. Similarly, the general now has a right as an American citizen in a democracy to accept that dismissal and carry his case to the country.

If we are to grow technical, Congress, too, has some constitutional rights. It can impeach President Truman not only for carrying on a war in Korea without a declaration of war by Congress, but primarily for failing to let our troops fight the enemy with all the weapons at their command. We already have had 60,000 casualties in 9 months—more than we had in the first full year of World War II.

The debate will go on for a long time now. It will, regrettably, become political. The President may have satisfied Britain, but he has split America. He has destroyed the bipartisan approach to foreign policy which we had a right to hope for. Certainly MacArthur was entitled to a personal hearing before any order of dismissal was issued.

Meanwhile, what do the Russians think? They read that our Department of State on March 20 requested MacArthur to agree to deploy his troops in such a way as to avoid "any advance with major forces north of thirty-eighth parallel" and yet to "permit sufficient freedom of action for next few weeks to provide security for United Nations forces and maintain contact with enemy," so as to give time "to determine diplomatic reactions and permit new negotiations that may develop."

They read the speech of the American President publicly confessing his fear of enraging the new master of Asia—Communist imperialism.

They read also that the Labor government in Great Britain is proposing to placate the Communist Chinese by turning over Formosa to them.

They read that the British Government not only wants Communist China admitted to the United Nations but to sit as a partner at the treaty conferences which are to determine the fate of the Japanese people.

If this doesn't all add up to appeasement, then the Kremlin doesn't have any interpretive brains, doesn't know the difference between a cringing, craven attitude and a forthright, courageous position.

England says: "Appease in Asia and save Europe."

MacArthur says: "Appease in Asia and you lose Europe."

Truman says, in effect: "Don't appease but also don't fight with all your might—the enemy might get mad."

The average American will say: "Appease anywhere, show weakness to a bandit or a bully, and you're lost. To keep on saying you're afraid to go into a big fight will only invite attack from the other fellow."

We must now increase even more our military strength. To diminish our armament and reward the aggressor for his aggression by admitting Red China into the U. N.—as the British advocate—is just to invite world war III. Chamberlain, by his compromise at Munich, invited World War II. It could be that, in beginning to yield step by step to the British policy, President Truman—with the best intentions in the world to do the very opposite—has committed us to fighting world war III both in Asia and Europe.

Public-Assistance Programs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDGAR A. JONAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

HOUSE RESOLUTION 37, SUBMITTED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE SIXTY-SEVENTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Speaker, the lower house of the Illinois State Legislature has for some time last past carried on an investigation on behalf of the State of Illinois in order to determine accurately the facts pertaining to the public-assistance program operated by the State in conjunction with the Federal Government under the provisions of the Social Security Act.

The lower house of the State Legislature in Illinois is in favor of amending the public assistance code of Illinois and thereby make available to public inspection a list of names of all recipients of public assistance in each county of the State.

It is conceded that such an amendment is in conflict with the present Federal law.

I call attention to the language of the resolution which follows and, under unanimous consent, extend the resolution in the Appendix of the RECORD, to wit:

House Resolution 37

Whereas the Congress of the United States by amendment to the Federal Social Security Act has provided that information and records concerning applicants for and recipients of assistance under public-assistance programs operated by the various States in conjunction with the Federal Government under provisions of the Social Security Act shall be limited to purposes directly connected with the administration of these programs; and

Whereas this injunction of secrecy imposed on the States by said amendment to the Federal Social Security Act is a matter which causes great public concern and is directly responsible for numerous injustices, abuses, and fraud by permitting many individuals not actually in need to receive assistance and to escape detection because of the stringent regulations guarding the names of recipients of public assistance, thus creating dissatisfaction with the public-welfare program in many communities of the State; and

Whereas said secrecy provision violates the fundamental principle that any expenditure of public funds should be subject to public audit; and

Whereas members of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois repeatedly have expressed themselves as favoring an amendment to the Public Assistance Code of Illinois which would make available to public inspection and sound use a list of names of all recipients of public assistance in each county of the State, only to be advised that such an action would be in conflict with the licensing control and quantities sent to various destinations will be kept under continuous supervision. No special written application for export licenses will be necessary for shipments to the United Kingdom, Canada, the sterling Dominions, the Irish Republic, and the United States; instead, authority to export will be endorsed by the customs officer upon ordinary export declaration. In all other cases advance written applications must be made for export licenses.

3. In Singapore, where rubber exports are already subject to licensing for other reasons, destination control will now be introduced.

The Act of an Irresponsible Man

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NOAH M. MASON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, by both word and deed President Truman has proven himself unpredictable, unreliable, and irresponsible. He should have been impeached when he ordered MacArthur into Korea in the first place. MacArthur's removal is the act of an irresponsible man. Tragic consequences can be expected as a result of that act. Joe Stalin must be wearing a broad grin these days.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from a constituent. It expresses the general feeling of the people of my district so well that I place it in the RECORD as a true expression of the indignation and resentment of the people of Illinois:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MASON: As a citizen of the United States of America and a veteran who saw combat in the last war, I wish to express to my elected Representative my deep outrage at the manner in which the President has violated the trust of the American people and failed to support the interests of his country.

By his blundering and thoughtless act in relieving General MacArthur, the President has placated the cowardly diplomats of our self-interested and parasitic allies, deserted the thousands of Americans who have died or will die in Korea because he ordered them there in the first place, completely and despicably shattered the prestige of the American people and American military leaders as far as Asia is concerned, and given more aid and comfort to our enemies than can be measured.

I tolerated his unstatesmanlike "s. o. b." letters, his labeling the marines as policemen; I accepted his ordering of Americans to die in combat without the sanction of the people; I was disgusted but willing to wait when I heard how his multitude of questionable friends had taken the American people for everything from deep freezers to million-dollar RFC loans, but this final act has completely destroyed my faith in his ability to administer the great office which he holds.

I don't care if the President is a Democrat or a Republican, but I insist that he must always and unswervingly be an American. I can no longer figure out who Mr. Truman represents, but it sure as hell isn't the American people.

If the President's current acts are guided, there are certainly some large "red herrings" in Washington. If his acts are his own ideas, the man is utterly incompetent to hold his office.

I hope you know what flag is flying over the White House. I am beginning to doubt that the President does.

No Time for Hasty Judgment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. HERLONG, JR.
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. HERLONG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I would like to include a thoughtful and impartial editorial which appeared in the Orlando (Fla.) Morning Sentinel on Friday, April 13, 1951, discussing the events of the past week, under the heading "No time for hasty judgment":

NO TIME FOR HASTY JUDGMENT

Never in the modern history of our country has it received such dramatic news as the firing of General MacArthur by President Truman.

MacArthur, although an able general with a brilliant war record, has not lacked for personal publicity. His staff has done a wonderful job of selling him to the American public as well as to our soldiers on duty all over the world. He has constantly been in moving-picture news reels and magazine articles in the most favorable light.

At best, MacArthur is, to tell the truth, a complex individual.

As John Gunther writes in the Riddle of MacArthur:

"Brilliant and masterful on one hand, vain and enigmatic on the other—what manner of man is Douglas MacArthur?"

To the average American, however—and particularly to the women—he represents the idol and ideal of our military prowess. This is even more so of MacArthur than Eisenhower. We don't think Eisenhower has worked at the publicity job as much so as the older man in the Pacific.

Meanwhile, as all of his favorable publicity was building up MacArthur as the modern George Washington, Mr. Truman has been receiving almost as much unfavorable publicity as MacArthur received favorable publicity. The President has been inclined to go off half-cocked, write scorching letters to individuals, low-rate the marines, cram social equality down the throats of Americans, and otherwise make himself thoroughly hated.

So now, when the President may have come up to size and for once, acted like a great leader for the long-range welfare of his country, his countrymen, and the peace of the world, the people doubt him. Having lost complete confidence in Mr. Truman, the people seem to think that he fired MacArthur out of spite. That he just wrote another nasty letter—this time, to a general sitting out there on the frontier of our security and doing what he could to protect it. All of which has certainly made many an American as sore as a wet hen.

But, while General MacArthur is a popular hero in the eyes of the average American, the public should not condemn his discharge by the President too hastily.

Unfortunately, we are not allowed behind the scenes in Washington. We, who are prone to criticize Truman and his advisers for letting this grand old warrior out now, must realize that Washington has more information than we have.

Washington knows, for instance, whether or not we are now able to fight a war with China. Washington knows, for instance, whether Stalin is trying to suck us into Asia and while we are thus employed, on an all-out full-scale war, tear the guts out of Europe, take over its industrial centers, and conquer Europe quite as easily as Hitler did. With Europe in the bag, England would be a pushover and then China would fall at Stalin's ease just as Paris fell after Hitler rushed to the Channel coast.

We must also remember that MacArthur is 71. We must also realize that when we see him debarking from a plane in Korea, he is bent and stooped. He is old and he looks it.

It may be that Mr. Truman and his advisers are trying to forestall world war III right now, simply because they know that this Nation is not ready for it.

It is apparent that MacArthur was willing to take the risk of world war III. He was willing to send the Nationalist troops from Formosa into China. But should he do so? This might mean the beginning of another, perhaps the last, war.

As we said no longer than a week ago, we believe the troops of Chiang Kai-shek should be employed in a second front of China. But now that Mr. Truman and his advisers have ousted General MacArthur so dramatically, it is apparent that Truman and others know considerably more than the editor of this newspaper. It seems that they have interpreted the design of the Russian attack and that they are now refusing to stick their heads in a trap. If Truman is thinking thusly, he is thinking correctly.

But what has happened in such dramatic fashion in the last few hours cannot detract from MacArthur and his record.

MacArthur is certainly crowned in glory.

He has won himself a position in American history, the like of which few of our military commanders have achieved.

At 71, it is time for him now to retire and rest.

He should wear the laurel leaves, the crown of glory. But to wear them well he should neither aspire to the Presidency in 1952—because he will be too old at 72—nor should he seek to create a third world war by speaking and writing assignments.

He is a great man—as history will record him—if he is great enough to quit now.

Van Fleet to Korea

OF
HON. WAYNE L. HAYS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD, under permission to extend my remarks, an editorial from the Washington Post of April 12 about a man whom I consider one of our great generals, Lt. Gen. James A. Van Fleet, the new commander in Korea. I had the opportunity to see General Van Fleet's work in Greece at the close of the campaign against the Communist guerrillas, and it seems to me that it is a chapter in American military history that the entire country should know about. I have always felt that General Van Fleet did not receive the recognition which he deserved.

VAN FLEET TO KOREA

James A. Van Fleet and Matthew B. Ridgway have proved their mettle brilliantly, and should make a great team in the Far East. The ability that General Ridgway has displayed in retrieving the near-debacle beginning last November in Korea is already the theme of many encomiums among military experts everywhere. Of late he has become well known to all Americans. Ridgway's successor in the field command, Van Fleet, is, however, hardly known at all. Yet he is a born soldier, and has already covered himself with laurels in almost precisely the same kind of operation in Greece which he will now undertake in Korea. In military circles the Greek campaign is called a classic.

No commander in modern times has been handed such a platter of handicaps as Van Fleet was given in Greece. Talk about "sanctuaries"—meaning the political limitations imposed by limited wars: the Greek guerrillas had a real sanctuary which fitted Greece almost like a canopy. It stretched across nearly 1,000 miles of frontier from the Adriatic to the Aegean belonging to Albania, Yugoslavia, and Bulgaria. Directed from a capital in a mountain fastness in northern Greece, the guerrillas fought mainly as raiders, but they also put up pitched battles, and kept the whole countryside terrorized. Time after time General Van Fleet went after them, but was met by a combination of factors which for months had him baffled. There was the mountainous terrain, which is similar to Korea's. Then there was the fear that had all Greece in its grip which made the country people the accessories of guerrillas who always came back. Finally, there was the facility with which the guerrillas, when hard-pressed, could skip over the overarching frontier for rest and replenishment from the larder and arsenal of the three neighboring countries. It was the stiffest task that any field commander could possibly imagine, but Van Fleet was undaunted, let alone uncomplaining.

Early in 1949, Van Fleet engineered a totally new campaign. He instituted a curfew in rural Greece, persuaded this land of villagers that his troops would never relinquish protection, and then proceeded systematically to flush mountain range and valley of the guerrilla bands. The final stroke was delivered when he pushed them to prearranged destinations at Grammos and Vitsi on the Albanian border. Then he drove right along the border and simultaneously loosed Hell-divers with which his Greeks had been trained in secret and made his final bag. The war was over, August 1949, but the world by that time had other preoccupations with Moscow, and failed to appreciate the success. When you think of Pershing's and Kitchener's 3-year travail in the Philippines and South Africa, respectively, you get some comprehension of this man's achievement.

Van Fleet, we wrote a year ago, has left a memory with the Greek soldiers that is bright and shining as well as indelible. They know him as a great captain who welded together a new army and led it to victory and left it a real factor in any future reckoning in the Balkans. We know him as a fine and authentic American with a modesty and a simplicity and a loyalty which are altogether admirable. Policy toward Greece dictated that Van Fleet should take no credit for the successful campaign, but this was natural to Van Fleet, who is one of the most self-effacing men in the Army. There could not have been a better choice to succeed General Ridgway, who now goes to Tokyo with a new assignment, in filling which he will have the good wishes of his countrymen.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD BOLLING
OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, the letter which follows so clearly states the fundamental issue underlying the relief of General MacArthur that I consider it well worth every Member's time to read. The author of this letter, W. Prewitt Ewing, of Kansas City, Mo., understands that the future of the United States and freedom is vastly more important than partisan political advantage.

KANSAS CITY, MO., April 11, 1951.

Hon. RICHARD BOLLING,
Representative in Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BOLLING: In spite of all the tumult and furor over the President's relieving General MacArthur of his commands, it seems to me as a private citizen that no good purpose would be served by the general's being invited to address a joint session of the Senate and the House. It is my hope that you will vote against such a resolution if presented to the House.

It is my judgment that, had the debate between the President and Commander in Chief and the general been permitted to continue by reports on the radio and through the press, it would have been the cause of bad morale in the enlisted ranks of all the Armed Forces and that it would have caused widening of the rifts between the various branches of the Armed Forces. For General MacArthur to be permitted to dignify and glorify his opinions and himself by appearing before a joint session would only add to the probability of these unhappy results. It is hard for me to believe that any soldier failed to recognize the acts and pronouncements of General MacArthur as insubordination.

Anybody with one eye and half sense knows that General MacArthur will have every opportunity upon his return to express his opinions—and probably for highly lucrative stipends. He will not go without a hearing. It may be that he shall have opportunity to express himself before a committee, or committees, of the Congress. It is certain that Robert McCormick will be hard put to find room in his Chicago Tribune for news other than MacArthur in the next coming months. It is further certain that the Republicans in Congress who put the next election ahead of the next generation will make every effort to exploit the MacArthur incident, although their doing so can only increase the confusion and disunity with which the Nation appears now to be so beset. There is an immorality and debasement of integrity which they would pass off in the name of patriotism.

The broad issues which we face are above and beyond the fate of the Democrats or the Republicans in the next election. It appears that Republican Senators, like DUFF and SALTONSTALL, have shown their greater stature in recognition of this fact, and we can only hope that their views will prevail upon their sides in the two Houses of Congress.

Let us, whatever the hardships and whatever the outcry, see that the supremacy of the civil Government and civil policy shall prevail over the military. To reverse this bedrock principle is to follow the course of Mussolini's Italy, of Hitler's Germany, and of Hirohito's Japan—directly to the Fascist state.

If the President made a mistake, and I do not think he did, the mistake was of but temporary consequence. To have condoned and encouraged the military over the civil Government would have been to set us upon a tragic and possibly fatal undemocratic road.

Very truly yours,

W. PREWITT EWING.

I have read Mr. Ewing's letter and wish to say that it expresses my sentiments and judgments.

EUGENE M. MOORE.

Mother Extraordinary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL T. CURTIS
OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. CURTIS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, the time will soon be here when the entire Nation will be observing Mother's Day. I think it is most fitting that I insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article which appeared in the Omaha World-Herald on February 18, 1951, concerning Mrs. George C. Eisenhart. All of Nebraska is proud of this mother and her family.

The article is as follows:

MOTHER EXTRAORDINARY—NINE SUCCESSFUL SONS, TWO DAUGHTERS ARE TRIBUTES TO MRS. GEORGE EISENHART

(By Doris Minney)

If you had chanced to stop in at the George G. Eisenhart home in Culbertson, Nebr., in the 1920's you would have come upon a cluster of romping, rosy-cheeked youngsters and growing young men and women—the 15 children of the late pioneer banker and Mrs. Eisenhart.

Today the 11 remaining children and their remarkable mother are living illustrations of the fine democratic citizens that develop in the typical, well-managed American home.

Now the nine sons and two daughters are scattered over the United States; their father is dead, but their handsome, bright-eyed mother is keeping "the heart of the home" alive for her children and her children's children to return to when they can.

"I want to keep them united as long as I can," she says if you ask her what is her greatest desire.

THREE COLONELS IN FAMILY

An airplane may suddenly rumble in the skies above McCook (where Mrs. Eisenhart has lived since December 1949). The pilot may be one of her two aviator sons, Col. Don Eisenhart, from Wright Field, Dayton, Ohio, or Col. Charles Eisenhart, deputy director of public relations with the United States Air Force in Washington, D. C. Or it may be her son-in-law, Col. M. R. Lemon, flying in from Kelly Field at San Antonio, Tex., to bring word from her daughter, the former Elinor Eisenhart, and their three tots.

If the weather is open and there is a homecoming football game at the University of Nebraska (which school was attended by 10 of the Eisenharts) you may see a dark red roadster cruising along on Highway 6 toward Lincoln. Behind the wheel is brunette Marjorie Eisenhart, principal of East Ward School in McCook. Other occupants are her mother, Mrs. George Eisenhart, and Sally Cunningham, McCook physical education teacher, who makes her home with the Eisenharts during the school term. She is the daughter of Congressman PAUL CUNNINGHAM, of Des Moines.

The trio of women are chatting at a lively pace about the beauty of the crispy fall weather; about how fine it will be to see a football game; about their anticipated reunion with Wayne, a senior in vocational agriculture at the University of Nebraska, and with Carroll, a representative of an insurance company in Omaha.

Eight of the Eisenhart boys—all except Charles, who graduated from Kearney State Teachers College—attended the University of Nebraska and were members of Phi Gamma Delta Fraternity.

"I always plan to attend at least one football game each fall," Mrs. Eisenhart remarks enthusiastically. And you recall that her son, Kirwin, now with an insurance company in Alhambra, Calif., had played on the Nebraska football team, and that two other sons had lettered in track. They were Edward (Ned), now cashier in the Culbertson State Bank founded by his father in 1886, and Warren, a cadet in the junior class at the United States Military Academy, West Point, N. Y.

When Mrs. Eisenhart tells you that all of her children have been athletic and that she and her husband made great efforts to attend all the football, basketball, and track meets in which their lively progeny participated, you understand when she says:

"My hobbies were always keeping in touch with my children's activities."

After that thrilling football game in which Nebraska defeated Missouri, Mrs. Eisenhart, Marjorie, and Sally enjoyed the planned reunion with Wayne and Carroll.

Later as they were driving homeward they stopped at Clay Center hoping to see Russell Eisenhart, who is with the Soil Conservation Service, but Russell and his family were not home. So they drove on to Cambridge, where Hugh Eisenhart is an attorney with Frank Butler, brother of United States Senator HUGH BUTLER. But when they reached Cambridge it was late, so they did not stop—since it was only 30 miles on to McCook—so Hugh and family would be driving home soon.

LOVE AND DISCIPLINE

As you talk with this alert mother whose gray hair is arranged in a pompadour that frames her vibrant face and high lights her dark, penetrating eyes, you notice that she wears silvery earrings to match the buttons on her trim, dressmaker-style dress. And you wonder how she managed to preserve that well-groomed appearance after a lifetime of serving her children.

For Mrs. George G. Eisenhart is typical of the mothers of the 1900's who sewed and mended and cooked for her family with "changeable help." Not only did she make dresses for her four daughters (two of whom are now dead), but she made underwear for her 11 growing sons (two of whom died).

"We were a family in which the father just loved all of us. The boys had implicit faith in their father—in his goodness," she says with a touch of emotion in her generally controlled voice.

Then she goes on in a brisk manner to say, "Yes, it was their father's goodness and my discipline by which our family developed. My husband and I never interfered or overstepped one another's orders. We were careful not to infringe upon one another's ideas."

Mrs. Eisenhart says there's no secret about how she succeeded in raising so large a family to become healthy, well-educated citizens. "It just took hard work. Faith. Perseverance. You just never let up for a single day when you have a family."

The family lived by a very definite schedule.

"Every child had a hook by the back door on which to hang his clothes when he came in from play. Each child had his own drawer for clothing and underwear (which was never put away unmended). And meals were always at a regular time. My babies had to go to bed at 7 p. m., rain or shine, until they were 4 or 5 years old," the mother recalls.

Democratic principles were established in family living. Mrs. Eisenhart says: "I put it up to the children this way: This home belongs to all of us. It's up to all of us to help take care of it. I tried to show them that they were a part of an organization.

"Each one had definite tasks. The boys always helped with the dishes.

"I always tried to stress in my children responsibility and the necessity of keeping their promises," the wise mother recalls.

"CHEAPER BY THE DOZEN"

Smiling, she continued: "When Charles was home recently some one asked him: 'Do you remember anything particularly well about your childhood?' Charles replied readily, 'Hardly a week goes by that I don't remember one thing.' Well, I wonder what that one thing was. Then Charles went on to say: 'I remember that some one was always saying to me, "The older boys wouldn't have done that." '"

Mrs. Eisenhart read the book, Cheaper by the Dozen, and saw the movie version. She feels there was little similarity between the Gilbreath interpretation of communal life of a big family and the Eisenhart family life.

"I wasn't that good," the Nebraska mother says simply, in referring to the smooth manner in which Mrs. Gilbreath handled the often stormy impacts of her impetuous children and efficiency-expert husband.

"The part I enjoyed most in the book and movie was that referring to the Gilbreath family going for a ride in their automobile."

For every Sunday after all of the Eisenharts had attended Sunday school and church and had a good dinner, 10 or 11 of the children and their parents would take off in the family auto which had a drop seat to accommodate the extra load of small passengers.

"That was our Sunday recreation and the children loved it," she remembers.

Another form of recreation of which the Eisenhart boys were particularly fond was camping out.

Mrs. Eisenhart recalls that although her husband was not especially fond of this rugged form of diversion, he saw that his sons had the opportunity to enjoy the wholesome activity.

"I remember once he camped out with the boys near Estes Park when it was very cold and seemed disagreeable to him. However, he put up no objections because the boys thought it a wonderful event."

THE GIRLS CAME LATE

There wasn't a girl in the Eisenhart family until after six sons had put in their appearance, so the girls were never assigned to too much supervision.

"I was glad the girls weren't among the older of the children," Mrs. Eisenhart says. "They might have been inclined to shoulder too many responsibilities of rearing the other children. The boys were always good to help, but boys always get away from home more than girls, so duties are not so constant with them."

This innate sense of justice seasons all of Mrs. Eisenhart's dealings with her "considerable" family. There was never any partiality or prejudice demonstrated by this judicious woman, who says:

"The children all have been wonderful to me, and I'm equally fond of all of them."

Sally Cunningham, who has been adopted into the clan of recent years since she and Marjorie Eisenhart began sharing an apartment, says:

"I've met every one of the children, and they are a perfect tribute to their parents."

ON SCHEDULE

In matters of discipline Mrs. Eisenhart was firm and fair.

"I seldom punished them," she says. "The most severe treatment I employed was the use of a little green switch when they ran off. A primary rule was that the children were all to come directly home from school and change into play clothes. If they planned to go elsewhere to play, they were to report such to me. If there had to be punishment, that was by denying them the privileges they most liked (such as camping trips)."

There were narrow escapes in the Eisenhart family just as there are bound to be in any sizable family. One of the narrowest occurred at the swimming hole on the Republican River. It was the custom of the boys to run down a bank to the river, jump a barbed wire fence that fringed the bank, and jump directly into the water.

One time Charles Eisenhart slipped when he attempted to clear the fence, fell across the jagged wire and was torn open until his "innards" were exposed. The doctor who sewed him back together doubted that Charles would survive, but he did.

Three of the Eisenhart children died of diphtheria; one died of strep throat.

"The only way you live through such tragedies is that there are tasks awaiting you so you can't stop. There's a baby crying. So you just have to go on—working it off—whether it's grief or otherwise," she says philosophically.

AND 16 GRANDCHILDREN

Humorous incidents were so numerous in the course of family living that if you ask Mrs. Eisenhart to tell of such, she'll say:

"You should ask the children that."

She does recall that when one of the Eisenhart boys brought his fiancée home to give the family a "look-over," the girl, an only child, was almost bewildered at the sight of so many handsome boys gathered around the family table.

"She just kept looking from one to another in amazement," Mrs. Eisenhart recalls as amusement lights her dark, intelligent eyes.

Incidentally, the girl became an Eisenhart by marriage. As of now there are seven daughters-in-law; one son-in-law; 16 grandchildren.

In Mrs. Eisenhart's opinion, large families may not be advisable for all people. She thinks it would be difficult to raise one in the new, smaller houses. But she says:

"I know that a large family was meant for me. It was almost a religion with me."

She considers her greatest reward "seeing my children grow up to live well-adjusted, useful lives."

IN CIVIC AFFAIRS

Despite the demands of motherhood and home making, Mrs. Eisenhart found time to serve as chairman of the Culbertson Public Library Board for 26 years. She was thrice matron of the Culbertson Order of the Eastern Star; a charter member of the Culbertson Woman's Club; an active member of the Presbyterian Woman's Group.

Her married children all have families.

"They all love children," Mrs. Eisenhart says happily.

Then smiling, she adds, "Occasionally the boys tell me they know too much about child care. 'We have to help our wives too much,' they chide good-naturedly."

For the Eisenharts are known for their cooperativeness. The second generation, like the first, continues to carry the torch of service not only at home but in public affairs.

During World War II seven of Mrs. Eisenhart's sons were in service. Four of them and her son-in-law were overseas at one time.

Ask, "How do you keep up with letter writing?"

She'll reply, "I don't. And sometimes I hate myself for it. The children all write. Some of them regularly each week."

REMEMBERED BY PUPILS

That Mrs. Eisenhart devotes the major portion of her time and thinking to her family is admirable and expected. Equally admirable is her concern over the development of her community and State.

She was born in New York; came with her parents to Hayes County, Nebr., when she was a small child; returned to Ballston Spa, N. Y., to attend high school. Then she came back to Nebraska to teach school winters; attend school each summer.

It was while she was teaching in Culbertson that she met and married George Eisenhart. One of her fondest memories is of how her banker husband served as counselor to farmers of that prosperous agricultural area.

Today Mrs. Eisenhart speaks with enthusiasm of the continued extension of irrigation facilities in that community by the Bureau of Reclamation. "This will help stabilize the farmers' income," she says with genuine concern.

Among the farmers and farmers' wives in the Culbertson vicinity are many who were students of Mrs. Eisenhart. One such is Mrs. Alex Eisenach, who was born in Russia and came to Culbertson with her parents when she was 6 years old. Mrs. Eisenach says:

"I started to school when I was 7. Mrs. Eisenhart was my teacher. I couldn't speak English very well (the child spoke German) and I liked her because she was so kind and patient with me. In later years I clerked in the Wacker store in Culbertson and I was pleased because Mrs. Eisenhart always came to me to be waited on."

The estimation of Mrs. Eisenhart's exceptional talent for teaching and motherhood is multiplied by the number of people one may talk with who have known her through the years.

Even though Mrs. Eisenhart will never find time to paint a picture, or write a book, she has created a family that reflects the finest in democratic ideals. In her life motherhood has become an art.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, reaction to President Truman's dismissal of General MacArthur has been extensive and varied. To cite one instance, I include the following article from the New York Times of Sunday, April 15, 1951:

VATICAN PAPER BACKS TRUMAN STEP IN MACARTHUR CASE AS AID TO PEACE

ROME, April 14.—President Truman's dismissal of General of the Army Douglas MacArthur was described by l'Osservatore Romano today as a decisive act proclaiming a desire for peace.

The MacArthur case was removed from the international plane to one essentially domestic by the dismissal, said the Vatican newspaper, which usually reflects the opinion of Pope Pius XII. The newspaper noted that President Truman's decision might even be against his own popularity.

This first editorial comment on the case by l'Osservatore Romano was written by Girogio Luigi Bernucci.

It said General MacArthur had been "the expression of that policy which held all further diplomatic effort (toward a Korean settlement) to be useless and thought that the decision could be obtained only by military success—in practice, war against China with all the risks that could come from it."

"He found himself waging limited war, but not the enemy, which could count upon vast numerical superiority that could not be touched beyond the Manchurian frontier," the editorial added.

"The logical deduction he drew was that of making means adequate to the end. But the consequence—Truman observed—could be a general conflict.

"The President of the United States refused a policy that presented such a risk for the United States and the world.

"With the discard of the hypothesis to attempt to end the conflict by force of arms, there now remains that of seeking a solution through negotiations."

Noting foreign Communist declarations that General MacArthur had been dismissed because of military reversals or popular opinion against the war, the paper said the affair had "ignited a discussion between the two parties that monopolize the great majority of the American electorate."

It went on to say that President Truman "has—it has been observed—placed himself above contingent party interests with a gesture to ease the situation.

"Unfortunately, it seems that the reply to Truman's gesture comes only with propaganda, which, however, will not change the facts," the newspaper concluded.

He Defied His Superior Officer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS C. RABAUT
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Detroit News of April 12 regarding the recent decision to relieve General of the Army Douglas MacArthur from his command in the Far East:

HE DEFIED HIS SUPERIOR OFFICER

Three years ago next November the American people made their choice of a Commander in Chief as well as a President to guide their affairs until 1952.

By the vote of the majority, these responsibilities were given to Harry S. Truman.

Under the system of government in which this majority believes, and must continue to support if we are to remain a democracy, the major policies of our Nation are administered by him, even as they are formed by his guidance and the action of the elected representatives of the people.

Were we to depart from this system, we might still endure, but it would not be under a Government of the United States as we have known it since the days of the founding fathers.

So long as the fundamental principle remains, it is unthinkable and intolerable that any lesser servant of Government, either in a civil or military capacity, should undertake deliberately to overrule the President of the United States or seek by counsel to change what is being done.

When the principle is violated, the main victim is the system itself, and the political discipline which as a people we derive from it.

During his last several months as Supreme Commander in the Far East, Gen. Douglas MacArthur gave repeated and deliberate offense to this concept of how the Nation should be governed.

He intervened in political and foreign policy matters not within his province; he ignored the instructions of his Commander in Chief.

The President, in due course, removed him.

Probably no event since Pearl Harbor has more thoroughly shocked and stunned the Nation than this one action closing the public career of one individual. It remains to see whether we will prove capable of viewing the case in perspective, clearly recognizing the vital issue, or will permit partisan prejudice and personal respect for MacArthur's great services to the Nation to compound the damage already done.

The signs are not yet hopeful.

Almost before the ink was dry on the President's order, political party leaders were being routed out of their beds so that they might make capital of the incident.

Resolutions of condemnation were being passed by organizations throughout the country before they had paused to acquaint themselves with all the facts.

What can possibly come of all this except a further beclouding of principle, and a greater deterioration in a situation which calls above all else for national unity?

Never once has the road been closed to MacArthur by which other men bring their influence rightfully to bear in the making of national policy.

At any stage he could have returned to Washington, given his counsel to Mr. Truman and his advisers, and either persuaded them to his way, or resigned, if he believed their policy unsupportable. But this he did not do.

That put it up to the President, after repeated affront, to take the hard and unenviable decision which he regarded as necessary.

In so doing he must have had the advice and support of Defense Secretary Marshall, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs General Bradley, Secretary of the Army Pace, and Army Chief of Staff Gen. J. Lawton Collins.

All these men, by virtue of their training and responsibilities, must be concerned with the question of whether this Nation can survive, or its arms endure in strength, when basic disciplines are trod underfoot.

The American people cannot do better now than turn their minds to this same question, not alone as it applies to the removal of a general, but as it bears on all aspects of the national life.

Tidelands

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ED GOSSETT
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, the Congress of the United States is overwhelmingly in favor of tidelands legislation which will reestablish in the States the title to all lands within their described boundaries. Congress should act at once to reassert the principle that a sovereign cannot take property without compensation. When the House last expressed itself on this subject, it voted 257 to 29 against the Federal Government's seizure of State property. Prior to 1937, no good lawyer ever questioned the title of the States in this property which said States had possessed for more than 100 years.

Mr. Speaker, the attorney general of Texas has been a champion of right principles in this matter. He has recently addressed to Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY a letter reviewing some of the issues. This letter should be made a part of the RECORD, and I offer it for the benefit of those interested in the subject matter:

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF TEXAS,
Austin, Tex., April 10, 1951.

Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
Chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR O'MAHONEY: I appreciate your sending me a copy of your letter of April 8, addressed to the Governors of the 48 States in which you present your views in favor of Federal interim control of the so-called tidelands and against restoration of State ownership.

While we have always disagreed as to the ultimate permanent solution of this long-standing controversy, I have had the highest respect for you and for the sincerity of your views. In fact, I have agreed with you on the desirability of interim legislation which would permit uninterrupted development of natural resources from the tideland belt, provided the interim legislation does not prejudice the position of the States in their aim for a quitclaim bill as the proper and just permanent legislation.

At your recent hearings on Senate Joint Resolution 20, Texas' Governor Shivers, Land Commissioner Giles, and I filed a joint statement approving the general idea of your interim bill and suggesting amendments which we hoped would be adopted in order that we might support it. These facts are cited merely to recall to your mind that I have favored continued development of this property during the present national emergency the same as you have done. The only major difference between us results from the insistence of Federal officials that they be given exclusive leasing powers over the area during the interim. This is a position with which you agree because it would not hinder, but would actually help, in your fight for permanent Federal control. For the same reason, it is only natural that State officials should fear and oppose such a provision in interim legislation. I see no reason why this interim legislation should not allow continued operations by the States with approval by the Department of Interior, just as has been done for nearly 4 years in California under stipulations between that State and Federal officials. Or a joint operation between the State and Federal officials could be provided so as to give neither side an advantage when permanent legislation is considered.

Regardless of who is right, the fact remains that a majority of the Members of the House (257 to 29 on the last vote in 1948 after the California decision) and a majority in the Senate favor ultimate restoration of this property to the States because of their long-recognized ownership and good faith possession. The States discovered and developed the resources in these lands; and, except for recent Federal claims and lawsuits, there would be no threat of delay in development today. The President and his Cabinet members ignore the majority in Congress, as well as the national emergency, when they threaten to stop production from these lands unless it is placed under exclusive Federal control. If the emergency is as great as you indicate, it would seem that the President would be willing to sign any bill that receives a majority vote in Congress and guarantees continued development of the property. If you are correct in saying that Federal officials would stop production of resources from these lands rather than permit a majority of Congress to provide for their continued development by the States, then the need for their development must not be as great as your letter to the governors would indicate.

Still hoping that a fair interim bill can be worked out, I regret that you have by your letter to the governors raised points which are aimed solely against permanent State ownership legislation. I fear this will cause more opposition to the general idea of interim legislation. At least, you have directed arguments to the governors which I feel compelled to answer as follows:

1. You state that the officials and the press of only three States—California, Texas, and Louisiana—seem to be interested in this issue. Possibly you have overlooked the fact that the Governors Conference (composed of the 48 governors) has been on record since 1948 in favor of State ownership legislation. This is also true of the Council of State Governments, the National Association of Attorneys General, the American Bar Association, the American Association of Port Authorities, National Association of State Land Officials, National Conference of Mayors, National Institute of Municipal Law Officers, National Reclamation Association, and many others whose resolutions are listed in the previous lengthy hearings which were made a part of the record in your present hearings in order to conserve the time of your committee. It is doubtful if there is any one domestic issue today on which State officials stand more united than the fight to restore and confirm State ownership of submerged lands. The quitclaim bill now before your committee, authored by 35 Senators representing 24 States, further demonstrates that interest is not localized.

2. You state that if for any reason this bill (your interim Federal control bill) should not pass, this production will be suspended. This assumes that the President and Federal officials will substitute their will for the will of the majority in Congress and end all production rather than yield to the Congress. I do not believe this exists as a real danger. In fact, I raised this as a possible result in a Supreme Court brief in United States v. Texas, and the reply filed thereto by Solicitor General Perlman said:

"The United States has no intention of stopping production of oil from existing wells * * * the Secretary of Interior stands ready, on behalf of the United States to authorize continued production from existing wells on proper terms and conditions."

As you know, such continued production has been authorized by order of the Secretary of Interior dated December 11, 1950, and subsequent extensions thereof.

3. You say that nationalization of oil by Iran may result in our loss of this supply of oil to Russia, and urge this as a reason for immediate Federal control of heretofore State-operated marginal sea lands. Actually, the States feel that in nationalizing tidelands, our Federal Government is doing to us exactly what Iran is doing to the British lease owners and that danger lurks in nationalization of State resources here at home as much as abroad. Your own colleague, the junior Senator from Wyoming, Hon. LESTER C. HUNT, made this point very forcefully when, as Governor of Wyoming, he wrote the Senate Judiciary Committee in favor of State ownership legislation on February 21, 1948, as follows:

"I share the fear of our people in the establishment of the Supreme Court's doctrine in the tidelands case to the effect that the Federal Government has paramount rights and dominion over the California tidelands. * * * This paramount right and the dominion superior to the rights of the mere title owner to these lands would be the establishment of a dangerous doctrine in America. If this doctrine could be established as to oil because of its part in national defense and the Federal Government's utilization thereof in its conduct of international affairs, this would be the entering wedge toward the nationalization of other vital natural resources. Every State in the Union has some vital natural resource that the National Government could use for national defense and its conduct of international affairs."

Also, eminent authorities on international law believe that Federal control of these submerged lands under the theory of the Supreme Court that they are part of the international domain may result in Russia or other countries making some claim to share in the resources. Judge Manley O. Hudson, Chairman of the United Nations Commission on International Law, Dean Roscoe Pound, Dr. Charles Cheney Hyde, and other experts in the field recently made this joint statement:

"Implicit in the denomination of the area as international domain is the possibility of other nations having rights therein other than innocent passage through the waters. Spain, Mexico, France, England, Russia, and other nations can make no reasonable assertion of an interest in the oil and other minerals within the 3-league Gulfward boundary of Texas so long as this Court recognizes that the area was removed from international domain when it became a part of the Republic of Texas. * * * A contrary conclusion by the United States Supreme Court could well be used by other nations as an opening for claims not now asserted."

4. You urge that governors of interior States should have no fear of losing their river beds, lakes, and other lands beneath inland waters because "the executive branch of the Government has never asserted title to the lands beneath navigable waters, whether * * * the beds of streams or the beds of harbors or bays." The answer is that neither had Federal officials asserted claim to the marginal belt for over 100 years. According to the Supreme Court's California tidelands opinion, the recognition by Federal officials of State ownership is not binding. Promises of Federal officials as to what they will or will not claim are not given much weight by their successors in office. For instance, President Polk, when negotiating for Texas' annexation, wrote Sam Houston, "Of course, I will maintain the Texian title to the extent which she claims it to be * * *." In 1950 Federal officials not only failed to maintain Texas' title but laid claim to it for exclusive Federal use without compensation. In doing so, they also reversed many recent statements of a contrary intention.

If Congress allows the tidelands cases to remain as the law of our land, there is real danger that future Federal officials and Supreme Court Justices will extend it to inland waters. Your colleague from Wyoming, Senator HUNT, also made this point in his letter of February 21, 1948, to the Senate Judiciary Committee, as follows:

"The doctrine announced in the California case is so broad that it is susceptible to the theory's being applied to lands under lakes, bays, rivers, and other navigable inland waters."

Both the Senate and House Committees on Judiciary made the following report after 17 days of testimony on this subject in 1948:

"State officials from every inland State in the Union, except three, testified or submitted statements that in their opinion the decision had clouded the long-asserted titles of the inland States to lands and natural resources below navigable waters within the boundaries of the inland States. * * *

"The Supreme Court has as much power to overrule its prior decisions laying down the inland-water rule as it had power to change its belief regarding ownership of the marginal belt within the boundaries of the States; and it may well do so in view of its holding in the California case, unless Congress acts to establish the law for the future."

The very fact that you have in the past offered a bill to quitclaim lands beneath inland waters is evidence enough that their titles have been clouded. However, inland waters cover 45,251 square miles of land as compared with 26,608 square miles of marginal sea within coastal State boundaries. Oil, coal, and iron ore beneath inland waters are just as necessary to national defense as are the same minerals beneath coastal waters, and the Federal Government has the same duty to protect and defend them. Therefore, it has been consistently agreed among coastal and inland State officials that it would be unfair to quitclaim lands under inland waters without quitclaiming the same type of lands under coastal waters lying within State boundaries. The quitclaim bill (S. 940) introduced by 35 Senators covers both inland and coastal waters. It is not limited to the 28 coastal and Great Lakes States but treats all lands beneath navigable waters of all 48 States as State property just as all previous Supreme Court decisions did for over 100 years.

5. You argue that in view of the Supreme Court decisions the marginal belt lands of Texas, California, and Louisiana belong to all the people of the Nation and should not be quitclaimed to those States. I am sure you would not be so harsh with us if you compared our position with that of your own State of Wyoming when the Federal Government obtained a Supreme Court decision against your State declaring the United States to be the owner of a section of land which had been held in good faith for 57 years by your State public-school fund. Oil, valued at more than $3,000,000 had been discovered on this section of land. The Supreme Court went against Wyoming in a case which Senator HUNT (then Governor) said was an almost identical situation with the California tidelands case.

In this situation, you very properly authored a bill in Congress quitclaiming this section of land to Wyoming, in spite of the Supreme Court's decision and in spite of the argument of the Department of the Interior and Department of Justice that it belonged to all the people and should not be quitclaimed. Congress restored title to Wyoming on that part of the section on which oil was being produced. We who urge restoration to the public-school fund of Texas of the lands which we have held in good faith for over 100 years occupy the same position as you did in the case of Wyoming. The oil under our lands is no more valuable for national defense than the oil under Wyoming land, and the Federal Government is as much obliged to defend Wyoming as it is to defend Texas. The truth is that regardless of which government owns or administers the land, oil and other necessary resources will always be available to our Nation for defense, and it is sincerely believed that with the long experience and present machinery in operation, more oil can be produced in this emergency under State control than would be produced if this added burden is placed upon an already overburdened Federal agency.

I would appreciate your inserting this letter in the record of your present hearings, and I will take the liberty of sending copies to my fellow State attorneys general.

While I have felt compelled to answer some of your arguments against the quitclaim bill, I still stand ready to support your interim bill if it is amended so as not to prejudice, or gain undue advantage against, the States on permanent legislation.

I assure you of my continued esteem.

Sincerely yours,

PRICE DANIEL,
Attorney General.

Mr. Thompson Tells All as Democrat Ears Burn

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, former Governor Thompson, of Georgia, has given a splendid example to the American people, the method by which the New Deal bureaucracy picks the pocket of the taxpayers. I feel that he has performed a real service because the charge of waste and extravagance comes from a man who, normally because of his official position and previous service, would be reluctant to criticize the Democratic Party. It is to his everlasting credit that he has disclosed the outrageous manner in which the bureaucrats disregard the public which they are supposed to serve.

The Courier-Journal of Louisville, Ky., has written an editorial which I feel should be brought to the attention of the American people and especially to the attention of the Truman administration. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD heretofore granted, I am inserting as a part of my remarks the editorial to which I have referred:

[From the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal of April 12, 1951]

MR. THOMPSON TELLS ALL AS DEMOCRAT EARS BURN

The Democratic Party's high command will have quite a time laughing off M. E. Thompson. Mr. Thompson is a former Governor of Georgia, naturally a Democrat by birth and inheritance, and one who has carried many a precinct in his time. Therefore his roar of outrage as he resigns from the Office of Price Stabilization, protesting that it is an obese bureaucracy and that the whole structure of government is no better, gets a play that the MacArthur headlines could dwarf.

Going to Washington on invitation to talk about helping out in OPS, Mr. Thompson found himself after more or less mysterious adventures set down in a cubbyhole with the title of consultant. Nobody consulted him, though he was drawing $53.48 a day plus expenses. He had plenty of time to look around, and the more he looked the more he saw of a clutter of idle consultants. As he tells it, he was there to do a job, not just to get a job, and the situation palled on him. What he exploded at last, with all those good round words like "confusion, inefficiency, waste, and extravagance," would have done credit to a Hoover, if not to a WHERRY.

For Mr. Thompson's purpose the timing of his blast was perfect; for the Democratic strategists, it couldn't have been worse. It came on top of the accumulating revelations about the RFC and about the trails of patronage and influence that led to the President's secretariat and the office of W. M. Boyle, the Democratic National Chairman. It was intermingled with the echoes from Mississippi, where even the weary ears of investigating Senators prick up at testimony of arrant pedding of Federal jobs for cash on the barrel. It was supported by, at the same time it gave added volume to, all the testimony on 5-percenters and political spoils that has been pouring out for several years.

There must be considerable consternation as Mr. Thompson pulls out and tells all as he goes. They must have expected that he would be quiet and grateful along with others whom the organization felt it had to take care of as deserving Democrats. But it is plain that when Mr. Thompson consults, he wants to be consulted. He is obviously a rare bird in the political bush.

Thought Control in the United States of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURR P. HARRISON
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix, I include a condensation of an article entitled "Thought Control in the United States of America," which appeared in the American Legion magazine. The condensation was published in the April issue of the Catholic Digest.

THOUGHT CONTROL IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA—PUBLISHERS ARE PERMITTING COMMUNISTS TO CENSOR THE BOOKS YOU READ

(By Irene Corbally Kuhn)

John Smith went into a bookstore for a copy of Seeds of Treason. He had followed the Alger Hiss trial. He knew this book was an objective study of the whole sordid affair.

The clerk, without looking up, told him they didn't have the book in stock. "Why not?" he asked. "How should I know?" she said. "We just don't have it."

"How about that book by Owen Lattimore called Ordeal by Slander?" She fell over herself in her eagerness to haul out a fresh copy. "Such a wonderful book. You'll be so glad you bought it."

Smith didn't buy, because he knew it was a self-whitewashing job by an accused leftist badly in need of whitewashing.

The next day, near his own suburban home, Smith dropped into a book-and-stationery store run by a woman he knew. No, she didn't have Seeds of Treason either. Yes, she did have Lattimore's book. Why? She depended on the reviews in the New York Times and the Herald Tribune for directions on the purchase of books. Neither thought much of Seeds of Treason, but they praised the Lattimore book. So she bought it to sell and didn't buy the other.

John Smith could be anybody. And the town could be your town. His two experiences represent two techniques used by Communists to exercise their thought control over all of us.

In the 1930's Russian-born propaganda had a fantastic success in our country. Eugene Lyons, longtime foe of Communists, called those years the red decade. The Communist popular front penetrated into our every walk of life and thought. It got into the labor movement, education, youth activities; it poisoned the movies, art, and every branch of publishing. At its highest point (1938) it had deliberate agents and starry-eyed collaborators among New Deal officials, educators, rich women, novelists, and editors. One phase was book publishing and reviewing.

Books are published to be sold just as shoes or sardines are. They are advertised, too, just as other merchandise. But a book gets free advertising that shoes do not. A book is reviewed in papers and magazines, over the radio and on television. Most book reviewers tell the public whether the book is worth buying or not. On the reviewer's honesty and knowledge a book stands or falls, and so does the author's reputation and his livelihood.

If the reviews are unfavorable, the publisher won't spend money on advertising. He can't afford to. If there are no reviews, he can less afford it. The bookseller, who depends on reviews and advertising to purchase, will, therefore, not stock it. Thus many important books can be left to wither on the vine, provided the right techniques are used on them.

The Communists were first to realize what the effective techniques are. They got trusted party members into publishing houses. They made sure they had plenty of authors to log-roll for other party authors, or to apply the hatchet to anti-Communist writers. They spotted fellow travelers among book reviewers. Finally, they put their own little people in retail bookstores as sales clerks.

Whenever a book comes along that is damaging to the Communist effort, the entire strength of their forces is marshaled against it. They bear down on naive people in book reviews, syndicated columns, and editorials.

The syndicated columnist, Bob Considine, is one of the country's best writers. He is fearless, calls the shots as he sees them. Last summer Considine spoke about his field of specialized writing on a national radio network. He said it wields the greatest power. The writer, therefore, should have a corresponding sense of responsibility. By and large, he said, columnists are fair-minded men and women. But he added, "If there is any apparent antireligious feeling among these specialists in journalism, it will be found chiefly among the book reviewers of certain leading New York newspapers and literary publications.

"Here a rather shocking situation prevails," he went on. "If you write a book which steps on the toes of our home-grown left wingers, bamboozled liberals, or outright Communists, or their idols abroad, you can almost count on receiving a number of sour reviews—where the reviews hurt most. There are, of course, outstanding exceptions to this rule. But the average big-city book critic sets himself up as a defender of the legend that those who speak out against Communists and their pale pink carbon copies are automatically cheap sensationalists, warmongers, and unctuous serfs of Wall Street.

"Some of these book reviewers get away with murder, even though their reviews appear in newspapers and magazines which could not possibly exist under communism. The reader of a fat Sunday newspaper digests an editorial renouncing communism, or shudders through stories of torture behind the iron curtain, and then turns to the book-review sections to encounter an inbred critic beating to a pulp a book author who is trying to say the same thing. They seem to produce nothing, these critics. Their role is simply to belt any writer who has the industry and knowledge to produce an anti-Communist tome. Deplorably, few authors have any way of retorting, rebutting, or suing the critic for pulling the rug from under years of devoted work.

"We have book publishers, too, among them who will not touch an anti-Communist book. Among these are some shrewd fellows who have sense enough to know that such books will be solidly battered by the critics, and probably lose money. But there are others who seem to believe with the critics and, like them, are Russia-firsters.

"I can speak with a little personal experience in this latter respect," Considine continued. "I had something to do with the editing of a book named The Rape of Poland, written by the exiled Premier, Stanislaw Mikolajczyk. He gave a detailed account of how Communists were able to seize that predominantly Catholic country with hardly the firing of a shot—except in the prisons of the secret police. The publisher who originally planned to produce the book actually asked Mikolajczyk to tone down his accounts of the tortures and murders inflicted on Polish patriots during the destruction of that country's hard-won liberties. Mikolajczyk, of course, refused to go along with this treacherous suggestion. He found another publisher—one with the courage to let the truth be told."

Mikolajczyk's book, The Rape of Poland, subtitled "Pattern of Soviet Aggression," was published, without censorship or distortion, by Whittlesey House, a division of the McGraw-Hill Book Co., Inc.

Sometimes the attack centers on the author, regardless of the book. John T. Flynn, author of The Road Ahead, is one such victim. His book is a warning that millions who say they hate communism are actually helping them at every turn. The Communist Party has been able to use the professional liberals to do their dirty work.

Devin Garrity of Devin Adair reports, "We published the book and waited for the reviews, especially the Sunday New York Herald Tribune. After 2 months, when it seemed fairly certain there would be no review, I began inquiries and learned the review copy had been received and was on file, but it had been marked for the silent treatment. No review was scheduled for it. We then bought advertising space in the Herald Tribune's Sunday book section and ran the excellent and fair review of Mr. Flynn's book which had been published in Human Events, a small Washington, D. C., publication. The Herald Tribune then changed its position and a review did appear—a smear job to counteract the effect of the favorable review we had bought the space to run."

For a perfect example of the all-out, four-alarm attack on an anti-Communist book by another well-known anti-Communist author, W. L. White's Report on the Russians, is probably the classic example. In the summer of 1944, when the United States and Russia were fighting Hitler, Mr. White accompanied Eric Johnston, then president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, on a 6 weeks' trip to Russia. It was decidedly to Russian advantage to put aside its long-standing rule of secrecy and allow these American visitors to go about the country.

The White book, telling of his trip through Russia, was published by Harcourt Brace. The book was so abused by Stalinist agents in the book trade that reviewers for libraries and church organizations were suggesting, "Don't read it; it's a prejudiced book." The National Council of American-Soviet Friendship, Inc., a Red outfit subsequently declared subversive by the Attorney General of the United States, led the attack with an elaborate, expensive, 32-page two-color brochure, which boldly purpoted to be "the truth." The Rev. Dr. William Howard Melish followed with an adverse review in the Churchman. Dr. Melish is notorious for his consistent support of Red fronts. It is difficult to see what kind of clairvoyance he has in Brooklyn that would enable him to judge the accuracy of the eyewitness reports of Mr. White from Russia. One of the hatchet men on Mr. White's book was Edgar Snow, writer-editor for the Saturday Evening Post. Mr. Snow has long been on good terms with the left. The Saturday Review of Literature chose Mr. Snow to do the job on George Creel's latest book, Russia's Race for Asia, and Snow produced a highly unfair review.

No better illustration of the effectiveness of the campaign to distort opinion on China can be found than a look back at China now, and at our terrible adventure in Korea, all the more heart-rending because it should not have been necessary. And while we're looking at the wreckage, let's take a look at the battle of the books, a battle which the Communists won through their involuntary helpers as much as through their dedicated party comrades. The American people had no real knowledge of China. The leftists filled the vacuum with their own books, reviewed favorably by each other; and by deriding and denouncing all others who had a kind word to say for the lawful Nationalist Government of China, or its leader and sworn enemy of communism, Chiang Kai-shek.

Who are some of these authors and reviewers?

One is Gunther Stein, who in 1945 brought out The Challenge of Red China. This book was reviewed in the New York Times by Nathaniel Peffer. It was a glowing review.

Another is the late Agnes Smedley, who wrote numerous flattering reviews of comradely books. She herself delivered a hefty volume, which Knopf brought out in 1943, titled "Battle Hymn of China." The Chinese Communists were glorified in this one, not only in the text, but in artful juxtapositions of photos and captions. On one page, for instance, is a heart-moving photograph of a Chinese war orphan and a flattering portrait of Chu Teh, captioned "Father of the Red Army."

It was not until after the war was over, however, that the bumper crop of books on China and the Far East appeared. Most, if not all, were reviewed in a way that must have been highly pleasing to Moscow. Take John K. Fairbank, of Harvard, for instance. In 1948, Professor Fairbank wrote The United States and China, published by the Harvard University Press.

The book was praised with enthusiasm by the late Richard Lauterbach and Owen Lattimore. On February 9, 1947, Mr. Fairbank reviewed two other books for the Times: China's Destiny, by Chiang Kai-shek, an edition approved by the author; and an edited unauthorized version of the same book prepared by Philip Jaffe. Fairbank reviewed these together and managed to say nothing about Jaffe's known bias for the pro-Communist case in China, or of his involvement in the Amerasia case, in which Jaffe was fined for participation in the theft of secret documents from the State Department.

For more logjamming, Mrs. Annalee Jacoby appeared in the New York Times Sunday book section on December 16, 1946, as reviewer of My Twenty-Five Years in China, by John B. Powell, an American of unquestioned integrity who lost both his feet in a Japanese prison. Here she took sharp issue with the author, who persisted in calling the Chinese Communists bandits. Mrs. Jacoby berated the author as a "reactionary" and insisted that peace in China's civil war depended on "progress in negotiations between the Kuomintang and the Communists." She was especially contemptuous of Powell's suggestions that there is a "Red menace."

When another non-Communist book, this time on Japan, Japan and the Son of Heaven, by Willard Price, was reviewed in the Times of October 14, 1945, the reviewer was none other than Owen Lattimore, who criticized the book unfavorably. When Lattimore's own book, Solution in Asia, was reviewed in the February 25, 1945, issue, Edgar Snow was given the task. Between them they sold the readers of the Times book section the perfect appeasement-of-Russia program. Snow found the book "penetrating and comprehensive, yet a succinct and logical exposition of the main dilemmas which face us."

Neglected almost entirely, when it wasn't slammed and damned, was Freda Utley's Last Chance in China, which attempted to awaken the American people to the dangers that would face us if communism succeeded in capturing China. Mrs. Utley, as a very young woman, was a member of the British Communist Party and lived in Moscow for 6 years as wife of a Russian citizen who was not a Communist. She worked as a specialist on far-eastern questions at the Moscow Institute of World Economy and Politics. Her rapid disillusionment and why she came to regard the Soviet Government as a tyranny as bad if not worse than Hitler's, is related in her The Dream We Lost. Needless to say, the book was equally, if not more, lost than her later one on China.

The studied practice of ignoring, neglecting, or damning with faint praise books that sought to show the danger from Communist infiltration began far back. The Red Decade, by Eugene Lyons, published in 1941, was the first really authoritative and informative book on the Stalinist penetration of America. At the time he wrote it, Mr. Lyons was editor of a national magazine and had behind him a successful record of best sellers in books and an equally distinguished record as a foreign correspondent and magazine writer. He speaks Russian, worked in Moscow for the United Press, and was the first American newspaperman to interview Stalin. The Red Decade, even more than his earlier work, Assignment in Utopia, earned him the title of red baiter and got him damned high and low by the "intellectuals," "liberals," and Russophiles. Most reviewers were displeased because Mr. Lyons' probing in The Red Decade revealed the infection among their friends, the intellectuals.

The current party line is to sneer at all ex-Communists, to deny and insult their repentance. This is particularly necessary to the Communists because they must try to offset the damage done their cause by such sincere and repentant men as Whittaker Chambers, who testified against Hiss, and Louis Budenz, whose testimony helped convict the 11 top Communists in the United States.

The latest victim of their sneers is Angela Calomiris.[1] When she was a girl, and weighed only 90 pounds, she was invited to join the FBI. She did. But the job she got was to join the Communist Party and to report the treason of these Russophiles to the Government. She spent 7 years doing just that. She did a superb job, at great personal risk and at no salary.

When the 11 Communist leaders were being tried in New York, she appeared on the witness stand against them. They were amazed, but they quickly recovered. At once the air was filled with Communist cat calls. These traitors to the United States shouted, "She is a spy. She is a traitor." All the Marxist monkeys, who had been collecting pennies from the faithful, put down their tin cups and ran up and down chattering, "Spy! Spy!" poor little Angela, who had given 7 years of her young life to her country, was called, by Marxist stooges for Stalin, a spy.

Then Angela wrote a book about her experiences. She called it the Red Masquerade, and the J. B. Lippincott Co. published it. The New York Times and the Herald Tribune gave her book the silent treatment. It should have been reviewed on the first page of their book sections. It wasn't reviewed at all. It was ignored. Communist Party technique No. 1 was applied to the book.

[1] Material from this point on is new; it did not appear in the original article.

On November 2 George Sokolsky got mad. He had met Angela and read her book. He looked for the reviews and, when they failed to appear, he let out a blast in his column that was heard even in the Times and Tribune offices.

On November 19 both of these great papers got the word. A. H. Raskin reviewed the book for the Times. He began: "The war against Communist infiltration has produced a new kind of spy. * * *" This sort of technique is called damnation by indirection. Later he says it cost Angela $30 a month for party dues and the Government footed the bill. Therefore, he concludes the Government is a contributor to the Communist Party. Marcus Duffield reviewed Angela's book for the Herald Tribune (also on November 19, after the Sokolsky prod). He also comes to the dues. He says, "The FBI, being outrageously thrifty, paid her nothing, except bare expenses, such as party dues."

Now you have the cloven hooves on both feet. One says the FBI shouldn't have paid anything. The other says it paid too much. All of this is an attempt to smear Angela. This is professional integrity gone to Moscow. If a lady were so treated in a bar, any one real American would have thrown these two reviewers out. If our publishers are real Americans, they, too, should give the heave-ho to their pinkos. The people of free America demand professional integrity in professionals. They do not like the present second-hand thought control exercised by dishonest professionals.

How To Steal and Profiteer Legally—OPS Is the Answer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOWARD H. BUFFETT
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am enclosing an article entitled "The Return of the Prodigal" by Harry Serwer, and published by Human Events on April 4.

Price control is an economic narcotic. Like other narcotics, an excessive dosage leads to moral degeneracy.

OPS today is about as useful as a rowboat on a desert, or a sprinkling can in a flood.

THE RETURN OF THE PRODIGAL

(By Harry Serwer)

On January 26 the OPS issued an arrogant order known as the general freeze. It was as cruel as a brat plucking wings off an insect, and for the same reason: The OPS didn't know any better. The order limited the ceiling of each item to the highest price it actually brought in the open market between December 19 and January 25, inclusive.

On the day of the freeze every producer and distributor in this country—bar none—was committed for large blocks of merchandise at increased prices—prices which had been soaring, backing, and filling since the inauguration of the Korean shindig. Much of this merchandise had been ordered many months before, and some at prices that were then shooting through the roof. The OPS said, in effect: "If you have goods coming in at high prices, that is your hard luck. You sell them at the ceiling even if you lose money."

Obviously, there wasn't a businessman in the whole Nation who could add a legitimate mark-up to such merchandise without committing a crime; and so, at one fell swoop the OPS added a horde of criminals to the roster. Businessmen were frantically calling their lawyers and accountants and asking what course they should puruse; many were told to ignore the general freeze, and so did. Others took it on the chin by adding the decreed profit which, in many instances, did not cover overhead.

The resentment and clamor became so great that the OPS ducked into a huddle, and on February 27 it came up with a directive captioned "CPR 7," which replaced, in part, the retail stipulations contained in the general freeze. It covered more than 200,000 items—truly a gargantuan job for the Falstaffian misfits who had concocted it.

CPR 7 is known as a divisional factor directive. It aims to control prices by limiting ceilings to historical mark-ups. The divisional factor is a formula introduced apparently to complicate matters.

A couple of vinegar plants got into the wine barrel. Business was asked to absorb all or some of the rising costs. Labor was busting through the 10-percent wage rise limit, sending prices up still further. There was no real shortage because retailers were cutting prices on even such critical merchandise as television sets, furniture, and electrical appliances in order to encourage sales and reduce inventories.

Indeed, there were fairly reliable reports that warehouses were clogged to the rafters with all sorts of commodities. One economist, who represents a number of substantial appliance manufacturers, told me that only 33⅓ percent of current accounts receivable were being collected. This meant that inventories were very heavy, and obviously as large as—or larger than—the capital and surplus of the business.

II

There is no need for control at this moment, if the Department of Commerce is correct in its Survey of Current Business (January 1951 issue). The Survey reinterprets current unit production in 1939 dollars and arrives at a unit increase of 70 percent over 1941. This was accomplished with a labor increase of 24 percent and a working-hour decrease of 10 percent. Thus we have a weighted increase of 66 percent in production. Since our Armed Forces are now limited to 3,500,000 men as against 14,000,000 in World War II, it would appear that we have ample production for both civil and war needs unless the Government plans monumental stockpiling beyond the needs of its own Armed Forces. That may very well be. If the administration proposes to stockpile and all comers willing to take up arms against Russia—then only does the general freeze make sense.

Control must therefore be considered as a part of the psychological pattern for making the country war-minded again. War-minded people partiotically give up more and more of their traditional rights and freedoms. If there is no shortage, control is meaningless; it is not only difficult to attain ceiling prices, but a demand may even develop for floor prices. If there is a shortage, control is a successful device for generating black markets, because the latter are nothing more than free markets vilified.

There are legitimate black markets as well as illegitimate black markets. If a retailer pays the ceiling price plus some cash under the table—that is illegitimate. If the retailer says to the wholesaler, "Sell me 50 dozen of your rayon blouses and I'll feature your name in a newspaper page," that's legitimate.

In the first case the manufacturer received the cash direct. What did he do with it? He socked it away; or he in turn paid under-the-table cash for prime or semi-processed commodities, without which he couldn't continue business; or he tried to find subterfuge to sneak that dough into his business (very difficult with a lot of OPA harpies snooping around for a fast buck).

In the legitimate case the retailer picked up the wholesaler's advertising check (or the wholesaler picked up the primary producer's advertising check). Flip through World War II advertising pages and note how many resource brands were featured by wholesalers and retailers. The great majority were direct or implied deals for merchandise.

III

Another legitimate black market was called copping the double profit. This was a diller. There were many large producers who, in peacetime, sold only to jobbers, sales agents, and wholesalers. These producers wanted none of the headaches which come with direct distribution. But in war shortages all these headaches disappear: production is king. So, these producers double-crossed their historical outlets and sold to the retailer directly. It paid off—and how! Stealing the wholesaler's 10- or 20-percent discount, and getting it without any additional overhead cost, was a windfall. It was legitimate but shockingly immoral; and, yet, a large number of America's substantial business firms went after that double profit. The gimmick was called going vertical—very snooty terminology.

Another phase of the black market is the gadget racket. Sure, the auto dealer will sell you a new car at ceiling; but you must buy $600 worth of unneeded gadgets or you'll wait until judgment day. In fact, accessory gadgets provided more black-market dough than the basic item.

Then there was the tie-in. If a pen was price-fixed at $3, it practically disappeared from the market; but the company which made it would brazenly insist—or hint—that if you wanted a couple of dozen, you'd have to take, as a part of the deal, a few $64 pens and one or two $125 sets. This was also indulged in by top concerns.

Another legitimate black-market operation ran something like this. A need black "wiffnuff" very badly. B has them and is confining his sale to his old customers. B sells strictly at ceiling—not because he is honest, but because he is afraid of taking under-the-table cash. A tells B he has a hot tip on the market and that he is buying 200 shares for B. A doesn't want the money just yet—he'll lay it out and tell B when to send it. Three weeks later—usually sooner—A consults the stock-market page, chooses a stock that has gone up 5 to 10 points, notifies B that he sold the stock at a profit and sends him a check for that profit. B knows it is a phony but keeps the dough; and in a day or two A gets all the black "wiffnuff" he needs at ceiling—and why not? Sometimes A tells B he can get him an auto at strictly ceiling. A pays the black-market price and loses the difference; but the "wiffnuff" is worth a "helluva" lot more to him, because unfinished merchandise is piling up on him, waiting only for "wiffnuff."

IV

Now, let me explain a very legitimate black-market racket. Mr. Jones weaves "gray" (unfinished) goods. His ceiling markup is 10 percent. The cloth costs 45 cents a yard to produce. He is legally entitled to 50 cents a yard. Jonesy is making a wad of dough on a nickel-a-yard profit, because his volume has doubled in a seller's market, his distribution cost is nil, and all the hazards of doing business have disappeared. But he is not satisfied.

He puts his nephew, Willie, into the converting business. (A converter buys "gray" goods and finishes them for the cutting-up trade or for retailing over the counter.) Willie's converting cost is about 20 cents a yard, which brings his total per yard up to 70 cents. He is legally entitled to a 17 percent mark-up, which brings his selling price up to 85 cents a yard. But Jones, who is really Willie's undercover partner, is still not satisfied. So he puts his other nephew, Richard, into the jobbing business. As jobber, Richard is allowed a 12-percent mark-up on the 85-cent cost. This now brings the cloth up to 95 cents a yard.

Is Richard allowed to sell the goods in the open market? Oh, no! Jonesy now scours the market for manufacturers who will give him a partnership for a nominal or no investment; and he, in turn, will supply them with all the cloth they need. (Remember, this was in a period when any dope with a fabric allotment could open a hole-in-the-wall business and get all the orders he wanted.)

Now, you may be sure that Jonesy was at least an equal partner in each of these enterprises. The OPA allowed Jonesy a nickel profit. Instead, he wound up with that nickel plus half of the difference between 50 cents and the final 95 cents at the jobber's level. But that isn't all. Suppose he has an interest in a blouse factory which has a $60-a-dozen ceiling. There may be a net profit of $9 a dozen in a seller's market. Since a dozen blouses averages 25 yards, Jonesy splits half of another 36 cents a yard. That Government-allowed nickel becomes 45 cents profit on a fabric which cost him 45 cents—quite legitimate.

All this seems to be on the way back. The general freeze is the royal red carpet for the prodigal son of the OPA.

The Larger Issues

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, the recent removal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur from his post in Japan has brought forth both instantaneous and spontaneous replies from people all over the country. The citizens of the United States are deeply concerned, as they have a right to be; and Mr. Speaker, I am also concerned over this action.

I have made it a point to talk to the people who should know whether the course of action taken by the President was right or wrong. Within the last few days I have read in the newspapers and heard over the radio and saw on television the views and comments of various persons. I have studied it all with great interest, and I feel that the solidest approach to the question is contained in an editorial appearing in the New York Times on Saturday, April 14, 1951.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the aforementioned editorial entitled "The Larger Issues":

THE LARGER ISSUES

In many respects the present controversy over General MacArthur represents an elemental and emotional outburst expressing the anger and frustration of a nation which, less than 6 years after its greatest victory, finds itself again at war and facing the danger of another world war. But the storm could reach its present violence only because it has been and is being whipped up by political partisans of often opposite persuasion—ranging from Republican extremists on one side to the lunatic fringe of the British Labor Party on the other—who seek to exploit General MacArthur's colorful personality and positive views for their own ends, irrespective of the merits of the case.

This situation makes it all the more necessary for men of goodwill to consider the fundamental issues involved, soberly and realistically. As we see it, there are three such issues. The first, fundamental to free government, is the issue of civil versus military authority. That issue has already been decided in President Truman's favor. Even the strongest partisans of General MacArthur refrain from challenging the President's authority to dismiss him, and the record shows clearly that the general laid himself open to such action. This was not a case of "theirs not to reason why, theirs but to do and die." General MacArthur had the right, the opportunity and even the duty to present his views and recommendations—through military channels. He had no right to challenge the policy of his Government, or even the prescribed strategy where it involved policy. Such a challenge, especially when backed up by appeals over the President's head to the public and especially to the political opposition, was insubordination which challenged the fundamental concept of our Government.

The second issue, stated by President Truman in his address on Wednesday evening to the Nation, is how best to avoid a new world war. General MacArthur holds that such a war can best be prevented by extending the Korean war to China—by bombing that country's military bases, especially in Manchuria, by blockading its coasts, and by using Chiang Kai-shek's forces to establish a second front on the Chinese mainland. Such measures, he is convinced, can crush the Chinese Communists without bringing Soviet Russia into the war, despite the Chinese-Soviet pact and his wrong guess on Chinese Communist intervention in Korea.

In contrast, President Truman holds that such measures could well precipitate the new world war; that we must avoid every action that could be exploited in order to put responsibility for such a catastrophe on us and thus isolate us from our allies and split the free world, and that the best way of avoiding such a situation is to limit the present war to Korea, despite the handicaps involved, in the hope of a peaceful settlement. This policy may fail, and Soviet imperialism may yet lead to all-out war. But in such a case the responsibility will be clear, and the free world will have gained both time and solidarity. We agree with the President.

The third issue is which is our first front—Europe or Asia? General MacArthur and many of his supporters hold that it is Asia—that, in the general's words to Representative MARTIN, it is in Asia that the Communist conspirators have elected to make their play for global conquest, and that by fighting in Asia we are also fighting Europe's war for salvation. This view is based partly on the fact that we are already at war in Asia, partly on opposition in some quarter to our European policies, and partly on Lenin's and Stalin's own maxim that the Western World will be conquered by conquering Asia first.

There is no doubt that the global conflict in which we are engaged has two fronts, and that it is essential to hold both of them. There is likewise no doubt that our front in Asia has been gravely impaired by the blunders of our policy toward China. But now, as during the last war, it is and will remain true that Europe is our first front and concern. For while Asia may have the manpower, Europe is both the cradle of our civilization and the continent of our allies, with an industrial potential that can spell the difference between victory and defeat. It was such considerations as these that led to the recent overwhelming approval by the Senate of the dispatch of additional troops for Europe, and the MacArthur dismissal has not changed the situation.

We Are at War With Red China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PATRICK J. HILLINGS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. HILLINGS. Mr. Speaker, the administration is attempting to justify President Truman's removal of General MacArthur as supreme commander in the Far East on the basis that General MacArthur was attempting to get us into war with Red China by advocating the bombing of air bases, supply lines, and troop concentrations in Manchuria.

If we are not now at war with Communist China, I think the President and his advisors would do well to advise Congress and the people just whom we are fighting in Korea. Last December hordes of Chinese poured across the Yalu River and drove our forces to a point south of the thirty-eighth parallel. Airplanes bearing the red star of Communist China take off from airfields in the so-called privileged sanctuary of Manchuria, rise to a safe altitude, then zoom across the Yalu River dealing death and destruction to our forces in the air and on the ground. A military commander in such a situation would be most derelict if he did not have the inclination to use every means at hand to strike at these troops and destroy these aircraft before they could get into a position to inflict casualties upon his own forces.

To date we have suffered 60,000 casualties in Korea, and despite the handcuffs placed upon him by Truman and Acheson, General MacArthur's outnumbered forces have succeeded in destroying large numbers of Chinese Communists.

Despite these facts, Truman and Acheson tell us that if MacArthur attempts to protect his men from further casualities, he is trying to get us into war with Red China when it is the very same Red China that is causing us so much grief.

In scanning the news columns, I have not detected any let-up in the war in Korea. The same Communist Chinese are continuing to kill and maim our boys and reports are filtering in to the effect that new forces are massing for a spring offensive. The Daily Worker has hailed Mr. Truman for "exercising sound judgment in dismissing General MacArthur." The Communist press knows that with MacArthur gone the United States has lost one of its greatest bulwarks against Communist expansion in the Far East and that the policy of appeasement of the Reds engineered by Dean Acheson over the past 5 years will continue.

It is tragic to note that President Truman who flew to Kansas City at the expense of the taxpayers to attend Tom Pendergast's funeral several years ago will be too busy to greet General MacArthur at the airport when he arrives Thursday. In his place he is sending his military aide, Gen. Harry Vaughan who is noted for his deep freeze deals, corruption, scandals, and dispensing of favors at the White House.

A Century of Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, on the 24th of last month Rev. Paul W. Rishell, pastor, and his parishioners celebrated the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the South Congregational Church in my congressional district.

For over a century now the South Congregational Church has been a pillar of strength to the community life of Brooklyn. I am sure I bespeak the thoughts of the great majority of the residents of the Twelfth Congressional District when I wish Pastor Rishell and his congregation many, many more years of fruitful service to our community.

Under the permission previously granted me by unanimous consent of the House, I include with these remarks the following editorial from the Brooklyn Eagle of Saturday, April 14, 1951:

A CENTURY OF SERVICE

It's a tough job to live a hundred years and all that time serve the community with humane and spiritual purpose. It takes an unusual resiliency against the world's chill and sometimes unfriendly winds and it takes living, vibrant faith in the task at hand.

Brooklyn's South Congregational Church had what it takes 100 years ago when it organized on March 24, 1851, with 23 members. It still has it and it still thrives as a great community institution, serving its people and spreading divine and human good in its everyday activities.

The church has had a fine history and is retaining its good name under the guiding hand of the Reverend Paul W. Rishell, the eleventh pastor. The first church was dedicated by Brooklyn's famous Henry Ward Beecher. We wish the South Congregational Church and its parishioners many more fruitful years to come.

Shameless Betrayal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I heartily agree with the sentiments and the indisputable facts set forth in the editorial in the Standard-Times of Bedford, Mass., under date of April 13, 1951, with reference to the brutal dismissal of General MacArthur by President Truman. It requires hours to open the letters and telegrams that are pouring into my office asking for the impeachment of President Truman and Secretary Acheson.

Under leave to extend my remarks, heretofore granted, I am inserting the editorial entitled "Shameless Betrayal," to which I have heretofore referred:

SHAMELESS BETRAYAL

President Truman's speech Wednesday was a shameless attempt to undermine the confidence and affection which the American people feel for General MacArthur by accusing him of provoking a third world war.

As an excuse for his shocking removal of MacArthur, the President charges MacArthur with "provoking" world war III by (1) asking that he be allowed to bomb the bases of the Communist army in Manchuria, a classic tactic in modern warfare, and (2) by urging we give support to Chiang Kai-shek instead of the present policy of tying his hands.

To charge that bombing Manchuria and freeing Chiang would provoke world war III is spineless speculation by minds without courage.

Winston Churchill said in the Commons in November Stalin would decide when world war III would start and probably nothing England or ourselves could do would change the Moscow timetable.

The world knows with what genius and courage MacArthur was trying to win the war in Korea, handicapped at every turn by the indecision and nonsupport of the President and of Secretary of State Acheson, fronting for the United Nations.

The President's policy in Korea was to fight a little war, fight it hard, but not too hard, for fear it might become a big war.

Of course, this policy couldn't win as MacArthur knew and said, and for this frank honesty of the soldier he is fired "so that," as the President weakly said, "there would bo no doubt or confusion as to the real purpose of and aim of our policy."

After probably the greatest military service to his country since George Washington, General MacArthur is removed from all authority because he asked for authority to fight the Korean War successfully, a war that already has brought America more than 60,000 casualties.

This present Korean dilemma has no precedent in American history.

We are fighting Communist China in Korea, but we are her faithful ally in Formosa, where we have forbidden Chiang Kai-shek to make an aggressive move.

What could please Communist China more than to have MacArthur ordered to fight hard "but not too hard" in Korea, while Acheson ties Chiang's hands in Formosa?

This Truman-Acheson Korean War formula is a perfect set-up for Communist China.

Communist China can only hope it will remain in status quo until, by wholesale liquidation of anti-Communist forces, Moscow style (said already to number many millions), all hope of a National counter-revolution is destroyed.

No wonder three offers of truce to Communist China have been turned down. Disgraceful as the terms were to our honor, they were contemptuously refused.

Yes, we are fighting Communist China in Korea but we are faithful allies of Communist China in Formosa.

Meanwhile, there is no hope of victory.

Truman is afraid to fight hard for fear it might bring on world war III.

Communist China hesitates to drive us off the Korean peninsula for fear that might bring on world war III through a realistic and aroused America.

The Truman-Acheson formula for the Korean War is a war without victory and without peace.

Watch for the most degrading moment in American history, an offer (British leftist Labor inspired), to extend to Communist China a seat in the United Nations, a voice in the treaty with Japan, and surrender of Formosa—in return for a Korean armistice.

Such an offer, of course, could not be made without United States approval.

Not only would such a proposal be the final betrayal of the only remaining Chinese leader capable of opposing communism in China, our ally of World War II—but, miserable as is the idea of such a proposal, I believe it would be refused by Communist China and Stalin—even if it were proposed to deliver Chiang Kai-shek in person to his—and our—enemies.

BASIL BREWER,
Publisher.

MacArthur: The Man and the Myth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAIR ENGLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. Speaker, as MacArthur returns home, both his accomplishment as a soldier and his views on foreign policy will be most carefully weighed and analyzed. As a contribution to this discussion, I desire to place in the RECORD the following article and editorial from the April 2, 1951, Fortnight:

MACARTHUR: THE MAN AND THE MYTH

Gen. Douglas MacArthur needs no defense from his enemies. But how can he protect himself from his friends, those idolatrous worshipers who make him internationally ridiculous by deafening the public ear with claims of his omnipotence and omniscience; by attributing to him all the wisdom and all the virtue under the sun, with none of the faults that flesh is heir to?

After all, General MacArthur is only human. If you cut him, he will bleed. If you shoot him in a vulnerable spot, he will die. He has had a long and distinguished career in the service of his country. There can be no possible question of his personal courage, nor of his normal competence as an officer. He proved that in World War I.

Like any normal human being, General MacArthur has made his share of mistakes. Unfortunately, the foremost of these have been tragic ones in times of crisis, in the Philippines and in Korea, and have cost many American lives.

WHY?

On December 7, 1941, when news of Pearl Harbor reached the Philippines, where he was in command, Air Force officers begged for permission to take off and bomb Japanese airfields on Formosa, whence they knew attacks on them would soon and inevitably come. This permission was refused because there had been no official declaration of war by the American Congress. Surely enough, 8 hours after Pearl Harbor, the Japanese bombers came down from Formosa and destroyed virtually all the American planes in the Philippines as they sat helplessly on the ground.

This error in judgment rested squarely on MacArthur. It was first brought to light in Bill White's book, They Were Expendable, published early in the war. It was confirmed by Hanson W. Baldwin, military expert for the New York Times, in his recent book, Mistakes of World War II.

ACTION?

MacArthur's mistakes in Korea have received a lot of recent publicity and his strident apologists have rushed in to shout them down or shift the blame to other shoulders. The most recent factual report, and a shocking thing it was, was published in Fortnight, February 19, in an unsigned article by an officer who landed and served with the First Marine Division in Korea. This anonymous writer told of gross incompetence and actual cowardice on the part of some Army officers, and of the complete lack of training and morale of many of the enlisted men who had been part of MacArthur's occupation forces in Japan.

After all, MacArthur had been superintendent of the United States Military Academy at West Point and he certainly knew how to train officers and men. Why hadn't he done so?

The Fortnight article practically blew the roof off the Pentagon. Maj. Gen. F. L. Parks, the Army's Chief of Public Information in Washington, issued a statement branding the charges "irresponsible and ill-considered." To borrow an old legal cliché, he couldn't deny the allegations so he defied the allegators.

It was reliably reported that the Pentagon's hatchet men were sharpening their tomahawks to have the scalp of the unidentified writer, who was a Navy chaplain recently returned from Korea. These hatchet men are not to be laughed off when one considers how they got Admiral Louis Denfeld summarily fired as Chief of Naval Operations for speaking his mind when asked about internal politics in the Department of Defense.

There is a rising indignation among some of the less informed upon discovering that their military idol has feet of clay. He has been so sickeningly goose-greased and blatantly ballyhooed by such a large section of the American press since the beginning of World War II that the general public lost its perspective of the man. He could run faster, jump farther, dive deeper, and come up drier than anybody. He knew everything. He could do no wrong. The dawning realization that they have been deceived has made some people pretty mad and the natural human tendency is to take it out on the doughty General.

WHO, ME?

Unfortunately, there's a lot of evidence to the effect that he, too, has been deceived. He has come to believe his own publicity, just like a Hollywood screen star. The late William S. Hart, strong, silent hero of early films, was a broken-down third-rate Shakespearean actor when he got his first break in western pictures. His producer's press agents concocted a tailor-made biography for him telling how Hart was a child of the western plains raised among the Indians, speaking many of their dialects. The tale told of many hair-raising battles with bear, bison, and aborigines; of great exploits with that white-maned old fraud, Buffalo Bill. Hart swallowed it whole and believed it to the hilt. He went to his grave mumbling, "They went that-a-away, pardner." It's deplorable that General MacArthur has shown symptoms of the same ailment.

In our books he was caught completely off base by the sudden beginning of hostilities in Korea last June. His vociferous claque in Tokyo and Washington rushed into print to say that Korea was not a part of his command and so he was not supposed to know what was going on there. But his title was supreme commander in the Far East. That included Korea.

You can't marshal overnight an army of 100,000, with tanks, big guns, and other heavy motorized equipment; you can't hide that under a silk handkerchief as a magician does a bowl of goldfish. It would seem that in the weeks necessary to mount this attack a small, idle portion of General MacArthur's omniscience would have smelled it out. One good intelligence officer in Korea could have warned him.

The occupation troops he threw into the fray from Japan, who had been under his command and available for training for an adequate period to make them soldiers, wrote one of the most disgraceful chapters in American military history. In the face of the enemy they threw down their arms and ran, screaming like hysterical high-school girls that they were occupational troops, not combat forces, and they didn't want to fight.

MAC ARTHUR AGAIN

The Americans were about to be pushed into the sea when the First Marine Division and First Marine Aircraft Wing arrived to stem the tide. The subsequent Marine landing at Inchon, behind the enemy's lines, and their swift penetration inland broke the back of the North Korean Army and assured a swift victory for MacArthur.

He took all the bows. Reams of copy poured from the typewriters of his personal publicity staff to the effect that MacArthur had personally staged all this, even to figuring out the tides at Inchon. Expert oceanographers can tell you what the tides will be anywhere in the world a hundred years from now. This landing was no different from the ones the First Marine Division had been making for several years in practice from Camp Pendleton. No unit as small as a marine raider platoon would ever make an amphibious landing without a thorough advance check of the moon and the tides. But it was a great MacArthur victory.

THE TREATMENT

Early in the Korean hostilities a number of American newspapers printed a syndicated serial labeled "the MacArthur Story" by one Frederic S. Marquardt, who was billed as the Chief of the Office of War Information in the Southwest Pacific during World War II. MacArthur should have sued for libel.

The opening article said: "MacArthur has been called, with justification, the savior of Australia, the liberator of the Philippines, and the conqueror of Japan."

What is the justification? He was not the savior of Australia. He was not the conqueror of Japan. And with all due respect to the great warrior, he did have some help in the Philippines—such as, for instance, Admiral Halsey's Third Fleet, which was probably the most powerful armada that has ever been afloat.

MORE

Marquardt warmed to his work with: "A Japanese in Tokyo once solemnly assured me that MacArthur had a Japanese mother. 'Otherwise,' he said, 'General MacArthur could not have conquered Japan.'"

Nobody conquered Japan. The Nipponese threw in the towel because the going got too rough. MacArthur had nothing whatever to do with the circumstances that brought this about.

Marquardt continued: "Many others have helped make the MacArthur story. His Chief of Staff, Maj. Gen. Edward M. Almond, called MacArthur the greatest man alive."

This is the same General Almond who, against all intelligence reports and all expert advice ordered the First Marine Division into the disastrous venture of fighting their way across a 7,000-foot mountain range in blizzardy, subzero weather on a hopeless, fruitless mission from which they had to fight their way back with heavy losses for themselves but almost unbelievable losses to the enemy.

OTHER FOLK

One wonders if General Almond, who has not yet been court-martialed, has ever heard of a chubby old gentleman in England named Winston Churchill; or of affable "Ike" Eisenhower, who successfully commanded in Africa and Europe infinitely more troops in infinitely bigger operations than MacArthur ever dreamed of; or of dignified, white-haired Admiral Chester Nimitz, whose official designation in World War II was "Commander in Chief of the Pacific Ocean Area," which would seem to include the territory in which General MacArthur was throwing his weight about at the time.

But wait. Marquardt has more: "Gen. George E. Stratemeyer, commander of the Far Eastern Air Forces, went Almond one better. 'He's the greatest man who ever lived,' Stratemeyer said of MacArthur."

Phew! That really is taking in a lot of territory. But do you think even this satifies Mr. Marquardt? Read him further: "An unidentified Japanese spokesman once topped both the generals. He is quoted in John Lacerda's book, The Conqueror Comes to Tea, as saying, 'We look to MacArthur as the second Jesus Christ.'"

No human being can possibly live up to such ridiculous adulation and flattery. And yet it is still going on.

A brief, unbiased, and objective review of the war with Japan might clear the atmosphere a little and put General MacArthur in his proper and, surely, not unfavorable light. Both credit and blame should be placed where they are due.

One does not need to be a military expert or have access to secret files to know that there were six major phases of this war which culminated in the enemy's unconditional surrender before his country was conquered.

First. The first phase started the day after Pearl Harbor. It comprised the whittling down of Japan's navy and merchant marine by submarines of the United States Fleet. Japan was not self-supporting. Food and oil and raw materials for her war machine had to be brought from Manchuria and other captured territory. The American submariners were the great unsung heroes of the war. In constant danger for months at a time, they gnawed away at Japan's life lines until the pinch was felt there long before there was a possibility of an attack on the homeland.

General MacArthur had nothing to do with this. His only connection with a submarine was early in 1942 when one of them helped the MacArthur family to escape to Australia from Corregidor.

Second. The second major phase of the war included the air and naval battles of the Coral Sea, Midway, and the many engagements around Guadalcanal. Until then, the Japanese had not only superiority but almost complete dominance on the sea and in the air. But they lost so many ships and planes, and, what proved to be even more important, they lost so many first-string pilots, they were never able to recover their advantage. We lost heavily, too, but America's replacement potential was so preponderant that from then on the advantage was increasingly on our side.

General MacArthur had nothing whatever to do with these operations. They were not in his area of command. He was sitting helplessly in Australia with practically no one to boss. Virtually all of Australia's and New Zealand's fighting strength had been lost in North Africa and Malaya, and Uncle Sam had not been able to send him many troops yet.

To say that he was the savior of Australia is absurd. Australia was saved when the Marines took Guadalcanal. That was the Allies' first land victory over the Axis. It was Japan's farthest point of advance. From then on to the end of the war, Japan was backing up.

General MacArthur had no more to do with Guadalcanal than he did with the landings in Normandy. The Marines were led in the field by Gen. A. A. Vandegrift, later commandant of the corps. Admiral Halsey was commander in chief, under Admiral Nimitz, of the South Pacific area.

Third. The third major phase of the war was the taking of Saipan, Tinian, and Guam—and later Iwo Jima. These bloody and costly operations were carried out by marine divisions with well-coordinated support from the Navy. General MacArthur was thousands of miles away. All he knew about these activities was from routine reports he received after they had taken place.

These islands provided bases for the massive B–29 raids on the Japanese homeland, which constituted the fourth phase of the war and the beginning of the end. These raids not only razed factories, shipyards, and other military targets, but forced down the throats of the Japanese people the bitter knowledge of their eventual, inevitable doom. The B–29's were under the personal direction of the late Gen. H. H. Arnold, Chief of the Air Force. "Hap" Arnold was MacArthur's equal in rank, and certainly not his lobbygow.

END

The fifth phase was made up of the spectacular victories of Admiral Halsey and his famous Third Fleet in the Philippine and China Seas and around Japan itself. They destroyed practically all that was left of the enemy's fleet and air force. They ranged the eastern coast of Japan, firing at will and without return at any targets within range, while Navy planes from Halsey's carriers swarmed over the cities and towns, making it unsafe for a Japanese gardener to ride a bicycle or trundle a wheelbarrow down the main street of his village.

General MacArthur certainly did not control Admiral Halsey. Admiral Halsey couldn't even control himself. He made some pretty silly statements about riding Emperor Hirohito's famous white horse down the main street of Tokyo, and later admitted ruefully that he never had learned to keep his big mouth shut. But this didn't affect his record as one of the greatest fighting sailors since John Paul Jones.

FINALE

The sixth and final phase of the war was hardly a phase. It was more of a coup de grâce. It was the dropping of two atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. The Japanese were already thoroughly licked and knew it. They had already started overtures to negotiate for peace without the unconditional surrender demanded by the United States. The A-bombs saved their face. Nobody could be expected to stand up against such weapons. They could surrender unconditionally and still retain a little self-respect after their brazen declaration following Pearl Harbor that the ultimate peace would be dictated by them in the White House.

Even the most bumbling Boswell in the MacArthur entourage would hardly claim that he invented the atomic bomb and personally hurled two of them across the intervening waters at Hiroshima and Nagasaki, the way Washington putatively pitched a dollar across the Potomac.

MacArthur did not command or participate in any major action against the Japanese. Bataan was a hopeless holding action. The American forces there were written off from the start. They gave a gallant account of themselves. It is not to MacArthur's discredit that he escaped and left Jonathan Wainwright to become the martyr of Corregidor. Both were following military orders from their superiors.

It is not to MacArthur's discredit that he had little to work with when he arrived in Australia and that it was a long time before he could get going. It is not to his discredit that he played a minor role in the Pacific war. The conflict was much bigger than any one individual. His conquest of New Britain and New Guinea were bloody and dreadful affairs for those involved, but they had little bearing on the final defeat of Japan.

REMEMBER?

The liberation of the Philippines was a moral but not a military necessity. Many thousands of American lives would have been saved if that had been postponed until after the Japanese surrender, which was then inexorably in sight. Surely General MacArthur must have been misquoted in the bombastic utterances as he landed at Leyte: "I have returned. Rally to me." Surely he must have known how much better it would have sounded to posterity to say: "We have returned. Rally to us." For he was not alone.

It is not to MacArthur's discredit that no troops under his command ever came in contact with the main body of the Japanese Army. This latter force was in Manchuria facing the Chinese Communists and the Russians. They only gave up their arms upon the definite order of their deified Mikado.

It is not to MacArthur's discredit that Admirals Nimitz, Halsey, and Spruance, and Marine Generals Vandergrift, "Howling Mad" Smith, and the late Roy S. Geiger commanded in more important strategical victories than he did. That is the fortune of war.

APPROPRIATE

General MacArthur's appointment to preside at the Japanese surrender on the deck of the Battleship Missouri was undoubtedly a tribute to his age and seniority in years of service, a tribute which he justly deserved. But this was not an admission that he had fought the war all by himself, as his fanatical followers would now have the world believe. His subsequent selection to command the occupation forces did not make him a star-spangled Mikado, or a Shinto god.

Mr. Marquardt has been quoted here far beyond his deserts because he is typical of the fawning sycophants who are so wild in their adoration of the aging general. The panegyric petered out pitifully toward the end. After all, when you open by calling your hero a second Jesus Christ, what is there left for an encore?

WHERE NOW?

In baseball when a player loses his batting eye, or a pitcher loses control and walks too many men, he is benched to let someone else try to pull the game out of the fire. There's no sentiment involved. Winning is the important thing. Why shouldn't this obtain in the much grimmer game of war?

General MacArthur has already achieved all the personal glory that one man can carry to the grave. He has given more than a half century of his 71 years in distinguished service to his country. He has been twice wounded. There are no further medals to give him.

Why should the autumn of his life be distorted to absurdity by those overdazzled by the reflection of his effulgence? Why can't he be brought home now, in all dignity and honor, to receive the triumphant reception that is his due, and then be turned gratefully out to grass?

THE MACARTHUR LEGEND: FACT AND FANCY

The accompanying article on Gen. Douglas MacArthur tends to deflate one of the most fantastic legends of our time—and we regard it as long past due. The author, who served as a bomber pilot in the Army Air Corps in World War I, and in the Pacific in World War II, reflects accurately the viewpoint of many thousands of men of all branches of the service who spent weary years between Noumea and Tokyo.

To these men Nimitz, Halsey, Hap Arnold, Vandegrift, Jimmy Doolittle, Buckner, Roy Geiger, "Howlin' Mad" Smith, Lemay, Cates, Patch, Spruance, Mitscher were the names to conjure with.

To those who were there it has always been a mystery why the American people ever swallowed the myth of General MacArthur's preponderant part in the Pacific war.

Nonetheless, we regard General MacArthur as one of the world's major figures because he has ruled Japan so effectively that today we are just about ready to count on the Japanese—our savage enemies of a few year back—as trusted allies against world communism.

We also regard him as having been as right about the American destiny in Asia as Secretary of State Acheson has been wrong.

The civilized world owes a vast debt to General MacArthur for his magnificent performance in Japan and for his advocacy of a militant and realistic, rather than a theoretical and defensive, policy in Asia. History, we believe, will grant him laurels for these two phases of his amazing career far beyond the laurels he will receive for his military prowess.

It is not pleasant to recall that General MacArthur was the commanding officer of the occupation troops in Japan who failed so miserably in the early stages of the Korean War because they had been permitted to grow soft and indolent, because no one had bothered to train them or indoctrinate them in the duties of a soldier, and because they were permitted to go into battle with officers many of whom proved unfit to lead troops. As commander of these troops it was MacArthur's duty to train them and keep them trained, and in this he signally failed.

No Fortnight article has elicited more heartfelt thanks from more diverse people than has the Shame and Glory of Korea—February 19 issue. Men who served in every branch of the service have applauded it. Corroboration has come from many quarters. It is quite clear that the United States Army, which has, of course, officially scoffed at the story, is on the spot with the American people.

It is Fortnight's sincere belief that the basic philosophy of the Army leaves much to be desired and that its methods are inadequate to the successful defense of the Republic.

We believe that the American taxpayer is not getting enough fight per dollar out of his Army, callous as that may sound, and that the Army brass had better reexamine its situation with a cold, stern eye and do something about it—fast.

Fortnight has recently extolled Gen. Matthew Ridgway, now in active command in Korea, as the kind of Army leader of which we need more. Reports from Korea indicate that his capacity for front-line leadership has done wonders for the morale and courage of his troops and that his bold, aggressive methods are finally welding a real army in place of the sad motley originally sent to Korea by General MacArthur.

In subsequent issues Fortnight—with the help of a number of military experts—will venture to propose changes in the Army's basic philosophy and improvements in its methods—training, promotion, recruiting, etc.—which, we believe, will make it possible for a 2,000,000 Army to do the job of the seven- or eight-million Army of World War II—and do it far faster at a fraction of the former cost.

For hundreds of years Rome, even when rotten at its core, was successfully defended by the Roman legions who never exceeded 375,000 at any one time, yet defended Roman rule in Britain, Gaul, along the Rhine and the Danube, in North Africa, Egypt, and the entire Near East.

The United States needs what Rome had—a relatively small, rigorously trained, well-officered, dependable combat army.

Thirty divisions of crack troops can better defend this country than 100 unreliable divisions that eat the taxpayers out of house and home and take years to become effective in actual combat.

An expanded Marine Corps, as proposed in Senate bill 677 by Senator DOUGLAS (Democrat, Illinois), is an essential part of the answer. The other part lies in the reform of the United States Army. Fortnight will have more to say on this subject in subsequent issues.

Bill To Permit Registration of Firearms

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I take this occasion to incorporate in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Mr. Bill Ziebach, sports editor of the Mobile Press Register in Mobile, Ala.

As one who is qualified to judge, Mr. Ziebach is unhesitating in his opinion that H. R. 3023 should be passed as soon as possible.

I hope that petty politics will not deter action on this measure.

Mr. Ziebach's column is entitled "Out o' Doors" and is widely read throughout the South. I feel sure that support for the Hall bill will increase as the result of his words.

OUT O' DOORS WITH BILL ZIEBACH

BILL TO PROHIBIT REGISTRATION OF FIREARMS

At last a man's man has taken legal steps to close a loophole that could result in seizure of citizens' firearms and consequently render this country's civilians impotent to resist aggression from within or without. Representative EDWIN ARTHUR HALL, of New York (may his name be blessed for his action) has introduced H. R. 3023 into Congress, which, if passed, will prohibit any State requiring citizens to register private weapons.

Although the Constitution of the United States gives every citizen the right to own and bear arms, its makers had no experience with the sly methods of modern traitors who use the writing pen as an instrument to first suppress, then arrest and liquidate men and women who would fight for their freedom.

Taking cognizance of this unholy situation, Representative HALL's bill provides as follows:

"A bill to prohibit registration of firearms already issued legally and to protect citizens against unconstitutional seizure of private weapons

"Whereas during World War II, Nazi-minded officers attempted to pass laws abridging the constitutional right of a private citizen to bear arms; and

"Whereas these same officers started their anti-American program by calling for registration of all privately owned firearms; and

"Whereas our founding fathers wisely incorporated within the Constitution of the United States this inherent privilege to our citizens to protect their hearths and homes by possessing arms; and

"Whereas in the several States, the revival of tyranny is asserting itself in the form of proposals to register all legally issued private weapons with design to eventual seizure of firearms owned by individual citizens: Therefore

"Be it enacted, etc., That no citizen shall be compelled to register firearms which he is in legal possession of.

"SEC. 2. No Federal, State, or local officers shall have the power to seize firearms belonging to private citizens who legally possess them."

The measure was referred to the House Committee on Ways and Means on March 1.

There is again a movement in some of the States to register firearms. This bill, if passed, would prevent any such further promotion to curtail the rights of our people which are guaranteed by the Constitution.

Year after year, a slimy few have repeatedly introduced legislation into Congress and State law-making bodies to compel registration of firearms owned by civilians. Year after year it is necessary for patriotic citizens to defend themselves against laws which would put every gun owner under police supervision and enable fifth columnists to quickly gather patriots before firing squads when and if they deem force necessary to subjugate this country.

If ever a law was needed, Representative HALL'S bill is the one, and every patriotic organization and individual citizen should let their Congressmen know their will—as well as conveying word of their support to HALL.

But let no man be subdued if ever gun confiscatory legislation is passed. Let him register one, if he must, but bury two for readiness, as the time will be near when he'll need them.

Congratulations to Archbishop Molloy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to note the granting last week by His Holiness Pope Pius XII, of the title of archbishop to the Most Reverend Thomas E. Molloy, beloved bishop of Brooklyn for these past many years.

The following editorial from the Brooklyn Eagle of April 12, 1951, indicates the esteem and respect in which Archbishop Molloy is held by the citizenry of Brooklyn and Long Island of all religious faiths:

CONGRATULATIONS TO ARCHBISHOP MOLLOY

The people of Brooklyn—of all faiths and shades of religious belief—were pleasantly surprised to learn of the latest honor bestowed upon the Most Reverend Thomas E. Molloy, the reverend bishop of the Catholic faithful here.

He has been singled out to receive the title of archbishop as a personal recognition by

His Holiness Pope Pius XII, for the exemplary execution of his episcopal duties as head of this diocese, which has the largest Catholic population of any in the country.

This honor, we are informed, comes in the nature of a personal tribute rather than one which would designate Brooklyn as an archdiocese. The proximity of Brooklyn to the Archdiocese of New York may be the reason for the unique distinction of conferring the title of archbishop upon His Excellency while Brooklyn still remains a diocese.

We think it is not too much of an exaggeration to say that in the hearts of the Catholics here Archbishop Molloy has won such high esteem that no ecclesiastical dignity would be unmerited.

As a citizen, a public figure, an administrator, a speaker, and scholar as well as a religious leader, Archbishop Molloy has won the respect and good will of the whole community of Brooklyn during his nearly 30 years as head of the diocese. In these days when the very foundations of the world are threatened by onslaught from materialistic and atheistic forces, it is reassuring to have spiritual leaders of the stature of the new archbishop.

The Brooklyn Eagle joins with all men and women of good will in extending to Archbishop Molloy heartfelt expression of felicitations on his well-deserved honor.

Foreign Policy of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT THOMAS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech by W. L. Clayton before a joint session of the Texas Legislature, Austin, Tex., March 6, 1951:

It is a great honor and pleasure you have given me to speak to you on the foreign policy of the United States, the most important subject in the world today.

We could be wrong on every other subject and right on that and the country is rich enough and virile enough to pull out of its mistakes and go forward; but if we are wrong on foreign policy we could be right on everything else and the results still could be disastrous, not only to the people of the United States but to the whole world.

Now, what is the foreign policy of the United States?

Whatever division there may be among our people regarding method or procedure, there is no difference of opinion regarding objective.

The United States covets neither the lands nor possessions of any country or people; on the contrary our interests lie in the maintenance of the independence and integrity of all peoples.

The objective of United States foreign policy therefore is world peace and its preservation under conditions which will insure to all law-abiding peoples life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Now how is this objective to be achieved?

Should we continue military and economic aid to our allies in Europe or should we follow the advice of Mr. Hoover and send not another soldier, not another dollar to Europe until they have got themselves in condition where they won't need either?

Should we continue to fight alongside United Nations forces in Korea until the Communists learn that they not only cannot run us out but that it is too costly to try or should we turn tail and get out now as best we can?

These are some of the vital details of foreign policy on which opinions differ.

I recently saw a cartoon in which the snout of a symbolic elephant was labeled "Put 'em in the front lines," whereas the tail said "Keep 'em in the rear," and the principal proponents of these contradictory policies were to be seen in the background shouting their respective arguments—Dewey and Stassen upholding the snout and Hoover and Taft the tail.

Nobody suggests the withdrawal under present conditions of the United States troops already in Europe; and if our military authorities decide that these troops should be reinforced, that is a military decision which should not be reversed by political laymen. Any policy question involved here was really decided when the North Atlantic Treaty was entered into under our leadership.

That treaty commits us to go to the defense of our European allies if they are attacked. Would it not be wise when we are all gravely threatened with attack to take concerted measures to try to prevent it rather than sit supinely back and wait for the blow to be struck?

What the free world faces is just what our Original Thirteen Colonies faced when they created a Federal Union and wrote the Constitution of the United States and is expressed in this simple phrase: "United we stand; divided we fall."

Europe is the next great prize Russia seeks. If Communist Russia should conquer Western Europe with its vast complex of coal, steel, industry, and technology, you may be sure that the end of world war III would find the United States, winner or loser, no longer the home of the brave and the land of the free.

But all these arguments about Europe are now academic because the decision has been made and the American people have made it. Our destiny is insolubly linked with Western Europe, the home of our ancestors and the birthplace of our social and political ideals.

The only question is, Can this link be made strong enough in time to prevent world war III, or to win that war if it should come?

Unfortunately, the answer to that question is locked in the minds of a little group of rapacious and powerful men sitting in the Kremlin—men without religion, without conscience, without decency, without mercy.

These men intend to conquer the world; they have told us that.

But they want to do it the cheapest and easiest way for them.

If by pressing a button they could gain world victory they would not hesitate to press that button even if it meant murdering millions of innocent men, women, and children.

As these men look out over the world and try to appraise the chances and risks involved in their schemes, we can imagine their leader Stalin addressing them somewhat as follows:

"Our greatest advantage lies in the disunity of our enemy. It is true they have entered into a pact but we all know what that means; pacts are made to break whenever a member finds that it no longer serves his interest.

"Imagine their difficulties. There are 12 members of the pact; they have selected a military head but he is subject to 12 political heads, now conducting 12 separate foreign policies. They are continually squabbling about Asiatic policy, about German policy, about the so-called Schuman plan, etc. They are unable to reach agreement on vital issues. How can this general organize and lead an army of 12 different nationalities subject to orders from 12 different governments? They will find themselves entangled in red tape, in the endless conferences and inefficiencies of their own boasted freedom. That kind of organization cannot stand up against the unity, the cohesion, the discipline of the Communist forces."

When General Eisenhower addressed Congress on February 1, immediately after his return from Europe, he spoke of the vast resources and great potentialities of the democracies and asked why we should be frightened of dictatorial government and then he gave this answer: "Only for one reason—because they have a unity of purpose." And then he said: "What we have got to do is to meet that unity with a higher type, the unity of free men that will not be defeated."

In this vast struggle which is raging throughout the world for the minds and loyalties of men, the weakness of the foreign policy of all the democracies lies in the fact that such policy is mostly negative—it is against something. The Communist policy on the other hand is positive; they have a program to cure all the ills of all people. It is a false program, of course, but anyway it is something positive. And make no mistake about it, it is catching on in the world.

The free world must shift from the negative to the positive if it is to win this struggle.

All history proves that peace cannot long be maintained by pacts and armaments races. The two ideas are completely antithetic. And we must never forget that the very foundation of our foreign policy is the establishment and maintenance of permanent world peace.

As vicious and repugnant as communism is, permanent world peace will never be secured by simply fighting communism even though the Communists lose.

To think that this road would lead to peace is to completely misunderstand what is happening to the world in which we live.

It is a tragic mistake to look upon communism as the only obstacle to a continuation of our tranquil enjoyment of the luxurious life, while much of the rest of the world lives in poverty.

Communism is but an outward manifestation of the world revolution now in progress—a revolution of the "have-nots," not so much against the "haves" as against their own lot in life. This is particularly true of the Orient with more than a billion people, 90 percent of whom are clutching at the ragged edge of a miserable existence.

When the Premier of Pakistan was in Texas about a year ago, he said that when he thought of the United States, he saw an island, fabulously prosperous, but still an island, surrounded by a sea of poverty, of cold and of hunger; and it frightened him.

There are just too many hundreds of millions of people in the world who go to bed cold and hungry every night to expect that victory in the fight to contain communism will bring peace to the world.

Some one will probably say: "But this misery of which you speak has always been with us. How does the situation today differ from the past?" The answer to that is to be found in the techniques of the modern world.

Formerly the miserable lived and died in ignorance; so far as they knew the whole world lived and died in misery; but today they know better.

Justice William Douglas, of the United States Supreme Court, stated the other day in a speech in Arizona that when he was recently in Iran, he found in a city of 40,000 people on the Russian border, 10,000 radios, all battery operated. You may be sure that Communist Russia tells those people every day and every night that the United States lives in luxury at their expense; that we are exploiting their oil and other raw materials and sucking the life's blood out of the people who are the real owners of the wealth of the world.

strength for defense, to mobilize it in the shortest possible time, to mobilize it with the least possible danger to our economy, and to mobilize it with no impairment of our freedoms and with the least possible impairment of our standard of living.

I can say to you with utter sincerity that he did not ask me to serve any selfish purpose—his own or any other man's.

If I am to carry out the instructions of the President, and if I am to live with my conscience, I must put aside self-interest, and I shall expect others—all others without exception—to do the same. On this point there can be no compromise. For the important thing to bear in mind is this—and let me emphasize it from my heart—no man has a right to compromise the life or safety of a single boy in Korea or to compromise the future of this Nation.

We have had our difficulties, even as we have had our triumphs of progress. But only yesterday there met for the first time with the President the National Advisory Board on Mobilization Policy, representing substantially all segments of our people—agriculture, commerce and industry, labor, and the public. It is my sincere hope that this Board will be the means of giving a strong impulse to the successful carrying out of our program of defense mobilization on a basis of equality of sacrifice.

As Chairman of the Board I represent no group except that magnificent one known as the people of the United States. I will listen to advice from the representatives of any group, big or small. In fact, I welcome it, and I will give it all heed. I will listen to the advice of any single citizen. But in the end I am sure that the people of this country want their governmental policy to be determined by their Government. I cannot act in any interest except in the interest of all of our people.

I think I know our people and I think I know the great spiritual values they will bring to the task of uniting our country.

This Nation has victoriously survived every crisis. Now—aroused, strong, unified, confident, each in his own place seeking to serve our country, trusting in each other, and trusting in God—I know that once again we will successfully defend our homes, our liberties, and the land we love.

The Tafts and the MacArthurs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, by coincidence, the Associated Press, on April 14, carried two Taft-MacArthur stories. These were reported in the New York Times on April 15. It happens, however, that one described a clash between the father of the Senator from Ohio and the father of General MacArthur. The other concerns a proposed joining together of the famous sons of these famous men. Because of the rather odd coincidence, I am asking that these articles be included in our RECORD:

[From the New York Times of April 15, 1951]

MACARTHUR'S FATHER WAS IN NOTED ROW—CLASH WITH EX-PRESIDENT TAFT ON RULE IN THE PHILIPPINES LED TO GENERAL'S REMOVAL

WASHINGTON, April 14.—The father of General of the Army Douglas MacArthur, a noted soldier of 50 years ago, also had a bitter dispute with civilian authorities.

Although it involved a domestic political controversy of the period, in a few respects it was strikingly similar to the present situation evolving around Douglas MacArthur.

It may have affected the final years of Gen. Arthur MacArthur's career.

According to historical accounts of the incident this is what happened:

The United States had acquired the Philippine Islands from Spain as a result of the Spanish-American War. In the summer of 1898 Arthur MacArthur went to the Philippines. In May 1900 he became Military Governor.

About that time Republican President William McKinley sent William Howard Taft at the head of a Commission charged with establishing a civilian government in the Philippines. Taft arrived June 3, 1900, just a month after MacArthur had assumed his governorship.

Back home there was a national political fight going on, with President McKinley under heavy pressure from his Democratic opponents to end what they considered expensive military operations against Philippine elements fighting the American takeover. There were demands for early establishment of civilian government in the islands.

In MacArthur's command there was a feeling that only the Army could do the job of restoring order and giving western civilization to the Islanders. The Taft Commission encountered a cold attitude on the part of the general.

Taft waited for MacArthur to pay his respects, but the general sent a colonel instead. Finally Taft himself went to see MacArthur, who gave him a cool welcome and assigned for the commission's use only one small room in the Governor's palace.

Taft thereupon undertook a series of reports on MacArthur to Secretary of War Elihu Root in Washington. He even threatened to resign.

In this antagonistic atmosphere the two men and their associates existed for a year. Then on July 4, 1901, Taft became Civilian Governor of the islands. MacArthur was relieved of his command and returned to military duty in the United States.

In 1907 MacArthur finished a tour of duty as commander of the Army's division of the Pacific and was considered by many in line to become Chief of Staff.

But Secretary of War Taft preferred Gen. J. F. Bell, and MacArthur remained in semi-retirement until his actual retirement at 64 years of age in June 1909.

[From the New York Times of April 15, 1951]

TAFT, MACARTHUR FAVORED—THEY ARE CAPEHART'S PICK FOR 1952 PRESIDENTIAL TICKET

FRENCH LICK, IND., April 14.—Senator HOMER E. CAPEHART, Republican, of Indiana, today proposed a 1952 Republican ticket of Taft for President and MacArthur for Vice President.

He said that Senator ROBERT A. TAFT, Republican, of Ohio, "has more delegates than anybody and is the popular choice."

Senator CAPEHART told newsman that Mr. TAFT would give the Republican party the best leadership on domestic issues and that General of the Army Douglas MacArthur would do the same on foreign policy.

Asked how General of the Army Dwight D. Eisenhower might figure in next year's Presidential campaign, Senator CAPEHART replied:

"I don't suppose he could get away from his mission in Europe. He is tied up in Europe and will be inactive politically for many years."

Senator CAPEHART came to French Lick, a southern Indiana resort, to address a meeting of the Indiana State Chamber of Commerce.

Grain for India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. REVA BECK BOSONE
OF UTAH
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mrs. BOSONE. Mr. Speaker, I am certainly in favor of scrutinizing carefully every request of any kind for funds which comes to Congress in these days of mounting deficits. I want to have all of the facts—and the story behind these facts. But I do not see how anyone can feel that the proposition to send grain to India has not been fully explored, and how anyone can question the need.

I should like at this time to place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two very fine editorials from a very fine newspaper, the Salt Lake Tribune, which point out the dangers of any further delay in voting the funds to send grain to India immediately:

[From the Salt Lake City Tribune of March 16, 1951]

DELAYING AID TO HUNGRY PEOPLE IS DANGEROUS

Backfiring of some assistance programs in the past and realization that our resources are limited has slowed down some American international relief undertakings.

It was sensible, therefore, for Congress to examine carefully the proposal to send food grain to India, where many thousands of persons are starving. The entire proposition has been explored and the testimony is in. There is no question of the imperative need. There should be no further delay. Famine does not wait.

In a sense, the good intentions and honesty of the United States are on trial before the world. Even the most rabid critics of India and its Government have not proposed that we refuse to furnish food to the starving. Only the details about payment and terms are debated. We have the grain and ships are available. All that is required now is appropriate Government action.

If the United States were to refuse aid now countless peoples throughout the world would be convinced that we put a price tag on our acts of mercy, that we help only when we can coerce. However false the charges might be, it would not help us to win friends throughout the globe. The cognomen, "Uncle Shylock," is less flattering than "Uncle Sugar." More important than reaction of other peoples, however, is our own self-respect. We simply cannot afford to be unresponsive to pleas to mitigate human suffering.

Hunger is on the march in India. It is extremely dangerous to further delay the food we have and they need so urgently.

[From the Salt Lake City Tribune of March 28, 1951]

WHILE HUMANS STARVE

The humanitarian phase has been repeatedly stressed in connection with the proposal to send surplus grain to save lives in India.

While droughts were followed by hurricanes, destroying India's maize and wheat crops, contrary nature has overflowed the wheat bowl of the United States. Not to be outdone by nature, Congressmen have perversely decided that starving stomachs can wait. There is grave danger that the grain measure, proposed by the administration with the blessing of Herbert Hoover,

Those who do not hear this over the radio will get the story from those who do.

The first job of the free world is to make itself so strong that the aggressor dare not strike. Peace can doubtless be secured temporarily in this way, and only in this way.

The free world is proceeding on this policy through the machinery created by the North Atlantic Treaty, as cumbersome and inefficient as that machinery is.

This will give us a breathing spell. It would be a tragic mistake to expect that it will give us permanent world peace.

The ferment which is working at the heart of the world, keeping it in pain and anguish, is too potent to yield to the persuasion of armies, of battleships, and bombers.

Indeed, that sort of extravagant trappings, created out of the blood, sweat, and tears of men, will in the end add fuel to the seething caldron of unrest which is now gripping the world.

In truth, the road to permanent world peace must be a much less costly road than the one we are now following.

It is the job of the United States, as leader of the free world, to find this road and to lead the democracies of the world in planting their feet firmly upon it, determined to follow it to the end.

For some time now the free world has been drawing closer and closer together.

The foreign policy of the United States is largely responsible for this—lend-lease, UNRRA, the International Bank, the International Monetary Fund, the British loan, the Marshall plan, the North Atlantic Treaty, and numerous other international actions under the leadership of the United States all attest the strong community of interest of the democratic nations.

But the free world is still separated into too many political and economic compartments to bring about the kind of strong organization necessary, first, for its own preservation, and, second, for the job of raising the standard of living of the peoples of the world if foundations of permanent peace are to be well laid.

To create such an organization and to do such a job, the free world must unite politically, militarily, economically. It must speak with 1 voice instead of 12 or 15 or 20 voices, not all saying the same thing. It must eliminate barriers to the movement of goods within its own boundaries, preliminary to the elimination of world barriers, to the end that markets may be enormously enlarged and that production may be rationalized on the basis of comparative advantage. This would substantially reduce the cost of goods to the people, would bring about a great increase in the production of raw materials throughout the world, and result in the development of the world's resources and production facilities on a scale never before seen. The need of subsidies and grants would cease; the standard of living would automatically rise throughout the world; tranquillity would be restored, and permanent world peace would be within our grasp.

Mr. Charles Wilson and Defense Mobilization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Charles E. Wilson, who is doing a most creditable task as Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization. The address was delivered by Mr. Wilson over the Columbia Broadcasting System on Tuesday, April 10, 1951. Those who know him know that Mr. Wilson clearly set forth his basic and most constructive views:

A week ago the President gave the American people the first report of our progress in defense mobilization. It was a heartening report in many respects. But both before and after it was issued there has been much evidence that many Americans believe we can slacken our efforts to achieve America's might.

It is to caution against this tendency to complacency—rather, in fact, to tell you of the dire need to go forward energetically and resolutely and unitedly—that I talk to you tonight.

The whole history of the human race is the story of the struggle of men to be free—to determine the kind of government under which they would live—to worship God in their own way—to choose freely how they would earn a living.

This struggle went on all over the world for more than 50 centuries during which the war lords, kings, and emperors ruled the earth; tyranny was the common lot of man.

Men before us fought for the Magna Carta and the Bill of Rights, but the great liberation really began with the founding of this Republic. Before that, out of all the billions who inhabited this earth, never more than three or four million people, at any one time, had enjoyed liberty and freedom as we conceive liberty and freedom.

Washington and Jefferson and Madison and Hamilton intended us to be forever free. Government was to be the servant of the people and not their master. Government was to represent all of the people and no man or any group of men were to have any rights or any freedoms beyond those that were to be enjoyed by all of our people.

Under that Government, as conceived by the founders of this Nation, we have developed a freedom and an economy that have given liberty to more people and a better standard of living to more people than mankind has ever known.

All over the world, free nations, inspired by our example, came into being. Within the last 40 years these free nations, in two great world wars, have united to resist assaults upon the liberties of mankind.

Now once more tyranny is on the march. A dictatorship, more absolute and ruthless than any that the world has ever known, challenges all that we have so dearly won. It believes that the only way it can be safe is to undermine or overcome all other governments.

Please do not believe that I seek to frighten you. You know the basic facts as well as I know them. The dreadful shadow moves over this earth. In a short 12 years nation after nation has disappeared behind the iron curtain—Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia, Poland, Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Albania, Eastern Germany, part of Finland, China, and half of Korea—800,000,000 people—a third of the population of the earth.

Untold millions are in slave labor camps and mines and factories, producing materials and munitions of war. Other millions are impressed into the largest armed force this world has ever known—all of these poised to be hurled at the last bulwarks of freedom and liberty.

This brings us face to face with the question whether our country and our way of life are worth the price we must pay to defend them. Here and now we must decide for ourselves the price of freedom. Each of us must decide in his own heart whether he will do his part niggardly or magnificently.

We must decide whether we will be greatly patriotic or whether we will be meanly partisan for ourselves or for any group or class.

I know you will agree with me that what we have here in America is not only worth fighting for, but worth sacrificing for.

And this brings us face to face with the question of what we must do to defend ourselves.

I repeat, we live in a democracy. The Congress will determine how much money is to be made available and for what it is to be spent. The President will administer this program, and as Commander in Chief of our Armed Forces will direct their use.

The Office of Defense Mobilization is charged with the mobilization of men and materials and the over-all direction of the acquisition of everything required by the Armed Forces.

We are charged to do this without destroying or impairing the economy of this Nation.

This requires, in effect, almost a miracle of equilibrium. Give the Army and the Navy and the Air Force the millions of men they require, without destroying the labor force which must produce their weapons, and give them food and clothing, equipment, and arms without destroying the labor force which must produce all of the things necessary for the maintenance of our civilian economy.

At the same time we must see to it that rents and prices and wages do not get into an upward spiral, or there would be no money left from the civilian economy to support the defense effort.

We also need what amounts to almost a miracle of timing. The development of scientific weapons of war means that the rate at which some weapons become obsolete is terrific. So we must make, or be ready to make, all of the things that our Armed Forces need with which to defend us, without having to maintain maximum weapon production at all times.

But at the end, what we really need is an honest will on the part of everybody to seek the best solutions that will protect this country in its essential defense program, and that will stop the inflation which may destroy that program.

The defense program is rolling.

The transition from a full employment economy to a defense program is being achieved in matters of production with less dislocation and more speed than anyone had thought possible.

We are building up the facilities to produce for the Armed Forces, so that they can be expanded with the greatest rapidity in any situation that confronts us.

Contracts for defense production are moving at the rate of nearly $4,000,000,000 a month. Actual production should catch up, this very year, with the rate of spending.

Tonight I can report to you with the utmost confidence that there is building up, here in America, a machinery of defense so powerful that when it is completed no dictator in his right mind would dare attack us.

At the same time, I want to make it crystal clear that we have a gigantic task here at home to maintain our economy under this tremendous burden.

It is necessary that this program have the support of every man and woman in the United States. Every one of us must be willing to give up something—but, more important, we must resist the temptation to claim or grab more than is rightly and justly due us.

When the President asked me to undertake this task, he outlined a single and wholly patriotic goal—to mobilize our dure and guide the lives of its citizens through social, economical, and political strife.

This essay attempts to prove that the American Constitution is what Gladstone called "The greatest work ever struck off by the mind and purpose of man" and that it is superior as an instrument of government even in this complicated modern world.

What qualities make this body of laws so outstanding at the time it was written and in our own day? The Government under the Constitution determined to be democratic, to work under a system in which all the citizens decide questions of public policy, either directly or through their elected representatives. The people profit by a democracy because it strives to promote the interests of society as a whole.

Democracy respects the civil liberties of all. Among these liberties are the right to form one's opinions and express them freely, the right of petition, the freedom of religion, and the right to impartial justice.

It furnishes every individual with equal educational opportunity, regardless of race, religion, social status, and so on.

Democracy promotes those economic, political, and social conditions that are necessary for the enjoyment of liberty.

Democracy demonstrates that far-reaching changes can be carried out in an orderly and peaceful fashion, when the decision to make the changes has been reached by democratic means, that is, by the majority.

It liberates, develops, and uses the intelligence of all its citizens and equips them with the knowledge needed for the promotion of national efficiency.

Democracy teaches that every privilege entails a corresponding duty, and carries with it an obligation to subordinate personal interest for the common good.

The above principles are the ideals that the American Constitution has striven for but they have not always been perfectly realized in our country due to weak instruments. The courts under the American Constitution since the time that John Marshall established their prestige have attempted in all possible ways to administer justice. The Supreme Court has kept apace with the expansion of the country, the complicated social problems, increase of transportation and commerce, and big business—problems which did not exist at the time of the origin of the Constitution. The ability and right to cope with these situations have been handed down from the time of John Marshall who insisted that Congress had implied powers as well as expressed powers.

Another reason the Constitution has guided our ship of state so successfully is the wise system of checks and balances. The power of the Constitution was divided into three separate functions, the executive, legislative, and judicial.

The task of putting and keeping the country on a financial basis was one of the headaches of the framers that was alleviated by Hamilton. Our country has been prosperous and blessed by God despite panics, depressions, and wars, but never has it been faced with such a huge debt as today. Congress, using the powers given by the Constitution, is trying to cope with the situation.

The National Government under Congress today furnishes much leadership, driving force, and money for education, health, and social security. Institutions for the aged, blind, and mentally deficient have been the result of Government aid and supervision.

In relation to the defense program the Constitution gives Congress the power to declare war, raise and support forces for the national defense, make laws for the regulation of these forces for the national defense, to provide for calling forth the militia and the organizing, arming, and disciplining of it when in the service of the United States.

We have seen how this power has been utilized for the successful defense of our land.

If it had not been for the regulations of Congress under the Constitution in regard to commerce and big business, we would probably have a dictatorial government.

The United States has made a supreme effort through the Monroe Doctrine, League of Nations, the United Nations, and other foreign policies, to preserve world peace and normal economic conditions with all her neighbors in other lands.

Today our Government faces a critical and complicated situation in world affairs and we pray that it will stand the test as it has so courageously done in the past.

The Constitution is now more than a century and a half old. It has been praised and it has been severely criticized. It was written for a primitive rural people with an eighteenth-century background but it has grown through amendments and custom and decision to such an extent that it serves as the written instrument of government for a highly industrialized people of 150,000,000 covering a vast expanse of territory. It has survived prosperity and panic. And remember, the Nation is still young.

The Martin Letter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, I am sure many of the Members have wondered, as I have, whether or not General MacArthur intended that his letter to our minority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], should be made public. In a personal letter, a military officer is apt to freely express himself without considering the results that might flow from publication of his private thoughts. I do not quite understand why the Congressman from Massachusetts expected the general to send him a second message, telling him not to make the first public. Yet this is evidently what the gentleman expected if the following news story by the Associated Press is a correct account of an address by the gentleman.

The rule that silence gives consent applies legally only when one is under a duty to speak, and I cannot conceive, under the circumstances, that the general was bound to affirmatively inform the gentleman that the letter was not for publication. If military personnel cannot trust Members of Congress to keep private letters confidential, we will lose the opportunity to obtain information not otherwise available. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts had better authority than his North Attleboro speech indicated for his publication of the general's letter.

The article follows:

[From the Evening Star of April 16, 1951]

ADMINISTRATION SEEKS TO SMEAR MACARTHUR, MARTIN CHARGES

NORTH ATTLEBORO, MASS., April 16.—* * * Mr. MARTIN declared "the issue in this dispute is much greater than MacArthur's career or the loss of a continent to the Communists."

He said: "We are barred from hearing the views of anybody who owes his position to the Truman administration if those views disagree with Truman's. * * * According to this rule Eisenhower cannot speak unless it is what Truman wants to say. When such rules govern we are coming pretty close to dictatorship."

HELD LETTER 10 DAYS

Mr. MARTIN said he had withheld for 10 days General MacArthur's letter stating the general's views on far eastern policy while he (MARTIN) waited for some indication from MacArthur that he wanted the letter withheld from publication.

The minority leader said he finally came to the conclusion he "owed it to the American people to tell them the information I had from a great and reliable source."

The American Constitution in a Modern World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK T. BOW

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, the American Legion, department of Ohio, in sponsoring an annual essay contest for high-school students, is certainly stimulating the Americanism of the youth of our land, this year's subject being the American Constitution in a Modern World.

As the Representative of the Sixteenth Congressional District of Ohio, I am, indeed, proud that one of our fine young boys, Leo Collins, of Alliance, is among the winners.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, it is a pleasure to include Leo's essay:

THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION IN A MODERN WORLD

(By Leo Collins, Alliance, Ohio)

In September 1788 the Constitution of the United States of America was finally ratified and put into effect. The efforts and sacrifices of thousands of men and women, who for centuries had had that hope for freedom, went into that document. The men who wrote and made our Constitution did not write it to meet just the present needs of a small and poor country, but they had visions of a nation which would someday be truly great.

In the approximately 163 years since our Constitution was formed, our Nation has grown from a few small Colonies along the eastern coast of North America to one of the largest, richest, and most powerful countries in the world. Stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific and with approximately 150,000,000 people, the United States has proved that a nation based on a constitution of freedom can and will survive and prosper.

will be talked to death. Meantime, the President of the India League of America says that at least 1,000,000 Indians will die of disease or starvation unless Congress quickly approves the grant.

Approval of this program no doubt would do more than all possible diplomatic maneuvers to win friends in the Far East. Meantime, it is reported that congressional reluctance to act has driven New Delhi to ask Russia for grain. What a potent propaganda subject would be created if the Soviets furnished the Indians the needed grain while American Congressmen indulged in futile filibusters over the question of repayment.

The American Constitution in a Modern World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. VORYS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to present to the Congress and the country the prize-winning essay of Miss Sue Rowe, a Bexley, Ohio, high school senior, in the Ohio American Legion essay contest for 1951. It is worth reading by all of us, and I am proud that Miss Rowe comes from my district.

THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION IN A MODERN WORLD

(By Sue Rowe)

The Constitution in today's world is not a charter of rights handed down by the Government to the people, but a limit of power placed on the Government by the people. The Constitution is not a law granted to the people, but a supreme law made by the people for the United States of America. It is in these facts that the glory of the United States Constitution lies.

People today say that our generation knows more about the Constitution than the founding fathers; but the Constitution makers knew more about good government. Our forefathers laid the foundations and the framework of the Government which are stated in the preamble to the Constitution. Because these men had great foresight in realizing the requirements of a true and lasting democracy, they left the next generation free to establish the Nation socially and economically. The people have been so busy building the Nation that they have not yet nearly begun to fill the inherited framework of freedom.

These pioneers of democracy knew the temptation of a government to take more power or to misuse the power granted to it. Any clause which would make the Constitution superior to the people was removed.

The originators of the Constitution also knew that these fundamental principles must last, not for an age, but for all time. The final draft of the Constitution was so successful that it has been used as the framework of the United Nations Charter.

Today's world is divided by an enormous chasm between two schools of thought. One idea is stated word for word by the preamble and the Bill of Rights. The other centers around the ideology that the state is the supreme power and that the individual exists only to serve and to promote the Government. Education in such a government exists only to make the individual more useful to the state. All opposition to such a government is suppressed.

The Constitution has been found so flexible, so elastic, and so adaptable that it fits perfectly into this world of constant change and has been equal to every new condition presented to it. The elastic clause which gives Congress the power to make laws necessary for completing the work of the Government has been one factor which has made the Constitution so flexible. In these times of economic distress, inflation, and unrest in foreign countries, our supreme law has new goals to conquer.

The Constitution defends us daily; it stands between us and the fallacy that man belongs to the state. The throne, crown, and sceptor of the people is the Constitution which, as long as it is maintained in letter and in spirit, secures liberties and pursuits of happiness. The Constitution is the candle which will light the way of the world through future years and centuries.

The American Constitution in a Modern World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting essays written by Mr. Kenneth Creasy of Delaware, Ohio, and Mr. Maurice Bouffioux of Mt. Vernon, Ohio. Mr. Creasy and Mr. Bouffioux are two of the winners of the Annual Essay Contest sponsored by the Department of Ohio American Legion and the Auxiliary.

Twelve winners were chosen from the thousands of essays submitted with three being selected from each high school grade. Mr. Bouffioux placed first, along with two others, in the ninth grade division, while Mr. Creasy shared top honors in the senior class.

The title, Mr. Speaker, this year was "The American Constitution in a Modern World." The work of these young men certainly merits the time of every Member of Congress to carefully analyze their recommendations.

I am indeed very thankful, Mr. Speaker, that the American Legion and the Auxiliary sponsor such a program and I am grateful that so many young people—the youth of today and the manhood and womanhood of tomorrow—will devote many hours of time and study in preparation of an essay of this type.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate Mr. Creasy of Delaware and Mr. Bouffioux of Mt. Vernon for their endeavors and their achievements and I am happy to submit their essays for your consideration.

THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION IN A MODERN WORLD

(By Kenneth Creasy)

Any sensible person will tell you that a building, in order to stand over a long duration of time, must be of firm foundation and structure. Likewise, governments must be sound in structure, and they must be built upon foundations that can withstand all that might challenge them.

Think back with me, if you will, to the years immediately preceding 1789. During that time, the leaders of our country grasped a belief in an idea, and this idea was later to become the foundation of our democracy. In truth, they wished to do something that would let us live and do as we had dreamed of doing since our venture onto this great continent. Thus, our forefathers came upon a plan for organizing a government dedicated to the belief that all men should be free to live in peace. They believed, as we believe today, that we should be a self-governing people. Yes, these men began to develop their dream, and then, they began to act as if what they believed were true. The result was the Constitution of the United States of America.

Thus, by virtue of our Constitution, our Government was established, consisting of three branches: the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. In more common terms: the President, the Congress, and the Courts. With these established, our country began to make history. We grew, we prospered, and in doing so we rejoiced.

As times changed and life in our world, and our United States became more and more complex, our Government had to adjust itself to meet many changing conditions. The tests of the strength and flexibility of our Constitution became great and numerous. But, as the forward-looking men who had conceived it had believed, the Constitution was strong enough to withstand even the problems offered by a more modernized world.

Let us look at the preamble of the Constitution and see precisely what is promised by that document. It goes as follows: "We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

From its very beginning, the Constitution has been used for guidance in all our governmental undertakings. For example, our courts provide justice to all who come before them.

Much has been done to provide for the common defense, as can be witnessed by the establishment of military power. Closely related to the common defense is the general welfare. Along this line Federal highways, parks, and the like have been constructed. Of necessity, a system of social security was set up to provide for the economic and social well being of the individual.

Obviously, the American Constitution works extremely well in the modern world. This is evidenced by the fact that it has been amended only 21 times in 162 years.

To sum it up, I would say that our Constitution has proved itself to be a firm foundation for Government, and the guiding light behind our success. This document, developed in 1789, is the basis of the American way. Truly, it has made our Government, as Abe Lincoln said, "A government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION IN A MODERN WORLD

(By Maurice Bouffioux, Mount Vernon, Ohio)

The American Constitution in this modern world of today, is, as it was intended to be in the beginning, a workable government based on the fact that all men are created equal and have inalienable rights which must be protected. Since it is based on these God-given rights, it has, and is destined to en-

The American Constitution has changed very little since it was first formed. It has proved that the common people, once they realize what freedom in a democracy like ours can mean, will never give it up. The modes of transportation and material surroundings and even the methods of waging wars to defend our hard-won freedoms have changed, but as our Constitution was not based on material things but rather on ideals, it has endured through the years. It is a guide which helps you to gain material things and bring greater happiness into your life while still allowing you to have your personal freedoms.

Yet you often wonder just what effect our Constitution has on our modern world. But, actually, it is not a hard problem to solve when you realize that today, even more so than back in 1789, people all over the world are crying out against and trying to escape from the persecution and injustices which dictators and communistic governments are forcing on them. Our Nation, with our Constitution as its base, stands as the only truly free country in the world. The world is slowly but surely learning that a nation can be free and prosper with equality for all of the people.

As you look around you, you realize that behind all of our conveniences, which we consider so important today, such as the telephone, electric light, and the automobile, is our Constitution. It has given our people the freedoms that are so necessary for a person to be able to sit down with an untroubled mind to work on problems of bettering himself and his fellowman.

Yes; when we begin to think about it, we realize that we owe our forefathers more than we will ever be able to repay for their sacrifices and hardships which they went through to make our Constitution live. It is our duty to carry on the traditions of our country so that our Constitution will live on and our descendants will reap the benefits of it just as we have done.

CARE: An Asset for Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, those of us who have contributed to the humanitarian work that CARE is doing across the world—alleviating human suffering and bringing happiness to countless thousands—know that all too little is known of this splendid organization. Under unanimous consent of the House, therefore, I am inserting an editorial which appeared in the March 4, 1951, issue of the Cleveland Plain Dealer, one of the Nation's leading newspapers, entitled "An Asset for Freedom."

The editorial follows:

AN ASSET FOR FREEDOM

People around the world, whatever their nationality, their race, or their religion, have very elementary aspirations. They want enough to eat, sufficient clothing, a roof over their heads, and the means to make the lot of their children better than their own has been.

This fact explains more about the world, the struggle to control it, the basis of political power and the opportunities for leadership than pages of governmental statistics on steel production, shipping tonnage, or wheat output.

The idea is that of Paul Comly French, executive director of CARE (Cooperative for American Remittances to Europe), who spoke before the City Club Forum yesterday, especially on the needs of Yugoslavia. In the last 4 years French has been in virtually every country in the world, mixing not only with the heads of governments, drawing up relief agreements, but what is more important, with the common people. In that time French has crossed the Atlantic 51 times and has been around the world three times. Twelve days ago he was in Yugoslavia.

The work that CARE has done in transmitting more than 10,000,000 packages to needy persons abroad since the war has been one of the greatest assets for freedom in the postwar world. It has reached down to the lower strata of society in every country, places where Marshall plans do not reach and where such aid, going mainly to industries that only indirectly pass on the benefits to the individual, are often never heard of.

In the next 6 months, under the government and CARE distribution of food surpluses in Yugoslavia, one-fourth of the population will receive aid from the United States and will know it is from the United States. The aberrations and political chicanery of UNRRA will be avoided. While Marshal Tito still proclaims his independence of both the east and the west, this distribution to be carried out under the constant checking throughout the country of 16 inspectors, will do more to win support for the west than all the diplomatic arrangements that Washington may make.

CARE operates only in those countries where it can supervise its work. It has pulled out of such nations as Rumania and Bulgaria, where the Communists were interested only in using it as a political weapon. In its operation, we believe, is to be found a key to success in international relations on the level that counts most—the good will of the populations. Governments, especially our own which has so badly fumbled its propaganda opportunities, might well take a lesson from this humanitarian, nonprofit organization.

MacArthur and Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Members will be interested in the following editorial by Mr. Manchester Boddy, editor and publisher of the Los Angeles Daily News. Mr. Boddy has long advocated greater interest in the peoples of Asia. His calm analysis of the General MacArthur episode is worthy of attention:

[From the Los Angeles Daily News of April 12, 1951]

DANGER OF UN SPLIT OVER KOREAN POLICY

Until repercussions from the violent shock of General MacArthur's removal from command subside there will be little if any chance for the voice of reason and common sense to be heard.

Even now, however, it is well to keep in mind that the split between General MacArthur and his followers and the Truman administration with its supporters is only one part of the picture.

There is grave danger that the United Nations itself may be divided into two irreconcilable blocks.

Carlos P. Romula, 1949 president of the General Assembly of the UN, gives this clear picture of why United Nations forces are fighting in Korea (the Yale Review, December 1950):

"After centuries of obscurity and submergence, Asia has assumed a new importance in world affairs. It has emerged as one of the main proving grounds of the United Nations, a place of decision on the issue of war or peace, and one of the reasons for which the deep social and economic disequilibrium of modern society will have to be redressed if the future is to be made secure from ruinous conflicts, wars, and revolutions.

"Korea, which is the epitome of the plight and the challenge of Asia, is a turning point in the life of the United Nations. The attack upon the Republic of Korea on June 25, 1950, drove the world organization to the wall. It had to resist aggression and maintain the rule of law or surrender its right to continued existence."

UN FACED DEADLY PERIL

"After 5 years of alternating crises and recoveries, which sorely tried its vitality and power though never to the point of mortal danger, the United Nations suddenly found itself confronted with deadly peril south of the thirty-eighth parallel in embattled Korea.

"There it had to make a stand, politically and militarily, and it did."

It made a stand, right enough, but about 98 percent of that stand was made by the United States, and every day it is becoming increasingly obvious that the United States and the United Nations are not, in fact, "standing" for the same objective.

A large section of UN members is growing more and more voluble in its demand that Red China be admitted to membership.

An overwhelming majority of the people of the United States on the other hand, do not hesitate to express their conviction that the UN has no more chance to survive Communist cells within its organization than a human body has to survive cancerous tissue.

As of today, at least, it appears that the Truman administration is unwilling to compel a showdown on this issue as it would be doing if it followed General MacArthur's proposed program.

This unwillingness may be caused by some important facts that are not available to the public.

For one thing, the MacArthur plan of war against China might cause an immediate split between the United States and her European allies at the very time when General Eisenhower is moving heaven and earth to prepare defenses against Red aggression in Europe.

UNITED STATES WOULD STAND ALONE

In any event, it seems certain that if we were to pursue an uncompromising policy of all-out war against communism in Asia we would have to stand alone except for such manpower help as could be organized among the rebellious hordes within Asia itself.

Even though the Truman administration were in agreement with the MacArthur policy in principle, the practical question of whether we are yet ready for the drastic action called for by that policy is one this writer, certainly, is unprepared to answer. And being unprepared he feels that hot, emotional outbursts would be a grave disservice to the public.

For many years the Daily News has been expressing the conviction that the era of the Pacific is at hand; that with mass man on the land mass of the world, which is Asia, and not Europe, which is the sick appendage of Asia, rests the fate of western civilization.

Our course of action, however, must be the product of extremely careful timing, enlightened statesmanship and diplomacy.

It is very easy to get into a terrible war of destruction and almost impossible to get out of it. It seems to us that now is the time to prepare defenses against war rather than a time to expand the one we are in.

The Communists are not getting stronger in Asia. Starvation, disease, internal confusion, lack of transportation, oil and production facilities combine to work against them.

The United States, on the other hand, is getting stronger with each passing week.

For all of these reasons we cannot escape the feeling that the administration had no choice but to head its team in Asia with a commander who can conscientiously play the kind of game upon which we are now relying to win the long, weary years that lie ahead in the battle of readjustment.

The MacArthur Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER K. GRANGER
OF UTAH
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting an editorial appearing in the Deseret News, Salt Lake City, Utah, April 13, 1951, that seems to me to be pertinent at this time. If all the newspapers and news commentators would have exercised the same good judgment in the MacArthur case as did the Deseret News there would have been less hysteria among the people and certainly the advice given in the editorial of ascertaining all the facts before expressing a judgment is sound for both newspapers as well as individuals.

The editorial follows:

MACARTHUR CASE DEMANDS ALL FACTS BEFORE JUDGMENT—SO LET'S WAIT

If ever there was a time when snap judgment was dangerous, impertinent, and even maliciously mischievous, the case of the abrupt removal of General MacArthur from his hatful of commands is one.

If it should be true that MacArthur has been an insubordinate soldier, and that is the one prime hard fact in the case, then Mr. Truman performed no more than his obvious duty in replacing him with a soldier who will obey orders as a military man is sworn to do.

But even if that should be true it would be hard to see that prime fact clearly as things stand now.

The incident is an element in a stew of domestic and international politics which boils so hot and tumultuously that the comment and debate it has aroused, not only in this country but across the world, is thus far almost altogether the sharp ejaculation of personal and political emotion rather than expression of objective reason and considered judgment.

The latter must wait until all of the facts are known.

Certainly not all of the facts are known now; for one thing, among many, MacArthur himself has not been heard, and how nearly those who have taken it upon themselves to speak for him come to saying what he himself would say, no one but the general himself now can know. And it will require the consideration of international lawyers to make clear to most of us exactly how the President of the United States could remove a United Nations generalissimo and replace him with a man of his own choice, without formal UN by-your-leave.

The answer to a good many other questions, all equally important connected with this business remains obscure.

Until thorough and competent investigation clears them up, until all of the pertinent facts are plainly established, the Deseret News prefers to reserve judgment on the MacArthur case.

This is too important a matter for it to be in the public interest for any responsible public expresser of opinion to permit itself to go off half-cocked. That includes newspapers.

We do think it correct, however, to hope at this point that the complete clarification of all of the facts connected with the MacArthur case will help to unmesh the tangle of acts and motives and curiosities of politics which seems to make the whole pattern of this country's international policy during recent years, obscure.

If anybody now can give a flat outright answer to every question that has been asked in good faith about the conduct of our international policy since 1945, we have not met him—in Washington or anywhere else.

What the country wants in that connection is precisely what we are waiting for in the MacArthur case. A plain, frank, unequivocal display of the facts.

Revenue Taxes Affecting Wine-Producing Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN F. SHELLEY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, Congress will shortly be asked to legislate on a new revenue-raising bill. The Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives has concluded lengthy hearings on all phases of the subject and is now in the process of marking up a 1951 tax bill for reporting to the House. I have been seriously disturbed by the possibility that the President's recommendations for wholesale increases in excise taxes will be accepted, without adequate consideration of the use of more equitable means of obtaining increased revenue, such as closing the many loopholes in corporation and income-tax provisions which we all know to exist. I have been most particularly alarmed at the consequences should the proposed excessive increases on wine taxes be put into effect, as have my colleagues from California and other grape-producing areas.

My mail has been full of letters from grape growers and others engaged in some phase of the wine-producing industry documenting the disastrous effects to be anticipated if the ruinous taxes proposed are enacted. One of these letters so intelligently pictures the situation, and includes such conclusive arguments, that I ask that it be reproduced in the RECORD accompanying these remarks. I sincerely hope that all of my colleagues, both on the Committee on Ways and Means and in the House as a whole, will give very serious thought to the points raised in the letter written by Mr. Laurence F. Hosmer, of Lodi, Calif., which follows:

LODI, CALIF., March 29, 1951.

The Honorable JOHN F. SHELLEY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have been operating a vineyard for 30 years, deriving all the income for the support of my family from that source, and can honestly say that I am familiar with the production of grapes. Since the repeal of prohibition I have been a member of a cooperative winery, and as such have become very much aware of the relationship of the wine market to the other two segments of the vineyard industry, the fresh grape shipping, and the raisin market. They are so closely balanced that disturbance of any of the three results in distress to all. On a total of 36 acres, my annual production varies between 300 and 370 tons per year. Of this total, about 85 tons are of strictly wine varieties and of the balance, less than half are of premium quality profitable to ship. Consequently, of my total production, less than 30 percent can be counted on to show a profit if packed and shipped, and if the wine market is depressed, the portion that is shipped will show very little or no profit either.

During the years 1943 to 1946 inclusive, the price of wine was high, and the fresh grapes shipped also brought good prices. In addition to the tax on wine, I was also paying a heavy income tax, so the Government was deriving quite a bit of revenue from my few acres. At the close of 1946 the wine market became badly depressed, continuing to be increasingly so through 1947, 1948, 1949. During these years, even with the utmost thrift and diligence, I could scarcely get back the cost of production from my vineyard, and paid no income taxes. My situation was almost universal among vineyardists during these years, and some were in worse case than I. Bear in mind that 158,000 families in America derive their livelihood from the growing of grapes. Experience has shown that as little as 10 percent of the total overproduction of wine can depress the entire grape industry; and this proposed fantastic tax on wine would have the effect of producing many times such a surplus constricting the market for wine by over 50 percent.

That would be the initial effect, but the cumulative piling up of surplus on surplus through successive vintage seasons would result in such economic catastrophe that a few seasons would mark the complete destruction of the vineyard industry of this country. Perhaps a few of the huge corporations, as Schenley, would survive, but the farm families would be finished, 158,000 of them. I believe that an intelligent examination of this question would show that if this wine tax were left as it is, the huge harvest of income tax from growers of grapes, and all persons connected with the wine industry, would surpass any increase of the tax on wine, with its inevitable decrease in taxes paid by growers and others.

In the hard years of 1947-49 the Government family had to step in and support the sagging raisin industry with millions of dollars. If the wine industry becomes a dead goose, throwing vast surpluses of grapes into the shipping channels, and the raisin drying yards the same thing will happen again. No revenue, but millions again poured out to save the raisin farmers. Why not let the goose live, and you can continue to pick up the golden eggs? As citizens and farmers, we don't object to paying our share of the taxes—and big ones in these times—but we claim the right to make the money to pay them with. We get along nicely without mink coats but are passionately addicted to the practice of feeding and clothing our families. This proposed tax on wine is so unrealistic that it seems incredible that a responsible public official could have suggested it.

Yours very truly,

LAURENCE F. HOEMER.

General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include therein an editorial from the Pontiac Daily Press, of Pontiac, Mich.

This is one of Michigan's great newspapers and the editorial reflects in large measure the anger of the people of the Seventeenth Congressional District of Michigan, which I have the honor to represent:

GENERAL MACARTHUR

America is seething.

Gen. Douglas MacArthur has been given the Presidential heave-ho in the most brutal manner possible. He was baldly kicked into the alley and the door slammed in his face.

Here is United States diplomacy at its worst.

Again Truman reaches the bottom of the barrel.

General MacArthur has been a controversial figure much of the time recently, but his severest critics can hardly condone the wanton and calculated cruelty in the manner a great man's military career has been terminated.

There were many avenues open to the President if he wished to end the general's services. He could have recalled him to this country. He could have returned him to Washington as an adviser. He could have brought him home for a personal discussion and kept him here as long as he wished.

The general's a gentleman.

Many feel he's a great national hero.

He deserved to be treated like one.

Certainly, an individual with Gen. Douglas MacArthur's capacity and incisive mind is bound to pop off occasionally. That's a part of the package. Even President Lincoln didn't look for perfection in his generals and when he was advised that one of his top sources was nipping a bit, he suggested the brand be ascertained and some provided the other generals.

Whether you believe that the American leader in Japan was an asset or a liability at this particular time, his great service to his country should guarantee him consideration, respect, and even Presidential deference.

President Truman blunders again.

His infinite capacity for diplomatic ineptitude is emphasized once more.

The Nation is rallying to the general's cause in sweeping condemnation of the back alley methods employed by the White House. The question of whether MacArthur was the proper man for the Korean campaign at this moment is quite aside from the question of whether a great national hero should be summarily kicked out the window because a small-time politician sits in the White House and possesses the authority.

In fact, the pronouncement occasioned so great a turmoil that the President went to the radio the same night to explain his action to an angry Nation. His reasoning may have been perfectly sound so far as the situation is concerned, but nothing he said explained the method employed.

General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, the Evening Star is running a series of articles from Mr. John Gunther's new book, The Riddle of MacArthur. Right now, while the Republicans are blaming the administration for all of our Asiatic troubles, the following article rather interestingly points up the fact that even the great General MacArthur has been accused of making errors:

THE RIDDLE OF MACARTHUR—GENERAL WAS BRILLIANT SOLDIER, BUT IS ACCUSED OF BLUNDERS—PLANES CAUGHT ON GROUND IN PHILIPPINES 10 HOURS AFTER JAPANESE ATTACK ON HAWAII

(By John Gunther)

General MacArthur came with the Rainbow Division to France in October 1917, and won practically every medal that the Army could bestow. His bravery was brilliant. He fought in the Champagne-Marne area, and took part in the Aisne-Marne offensive. He was wounded twice, gassed once. One legend is that the first wound came because of an error in the high command; his troops were bombarded by their own artillery.

General MacArthur rose to the rank of brigadier general and, at last, became commander of the division he helped create. One of his officers for a time, though he never met him, was a Missourian named Harry Truman. The general fought at St. Mihiel, Wouvre, and Sedan. Then, after the armistice, he got his first taste of military occupation and the administration of a defeated enemy by serving briefly at Bonn, now the capital of Western Germany.

Back home, he worked in the office of the Chief of Staff, and then for 3 years (1919–22) was superintendent of West Point. Twice he returned to the Philippines for brief tours (1923 and 1928), and in the United States he successively commanded the IV, III, and IX Corps Areas, until he was appointed Chief of Staff in November 1930. In this post he won both loyal friends and unrelenting enemies. He pressed for bigger Army appropriations, gave heed to the problems of a unified command, and preached for mechanization, mobility, and the vital importance of air and armored warfare. Normally his term would have expired in 1934, but President Roosevelt kept him on till October 1935.

MAC ARTHUR FURIOUS WITH DOUGLAS

Lewis Douglas, Mr. Roosevelt's first director of the budget (who many years later became American Ambassador to London), had the job of paring down Government expenditures 25 percent. General MacArthur came to a budget hearing, to resist cuts in the Army appropriation, and spoke for an hour strenuously. Then Mr. Douglas quietly asked him, "General, do you expect a serious epidemic of dysentery in the United States Army?" General MacArthur, taken aback, said "No."

Mr. Douglas then inquired why his budget for toilet paper—among other things—was so extraordinarily high; he had gone through all the Army figures, and thought that they were padded. General MacArthur was so furious that he stopped his testimony forthwith and bluntly left the room. A year or so later Mr. Douglas ran into him, and apologized for the way he had put the question. Then General MacArthur handsomely apologized, too.

Under President Hoover, General MacArthur had been the focus of a bitter controversy because he evicted the bonus marchers from Anacostia Flats in Washington, D. C. Photographs showing him in suavely shined boots and brilliant, glittering uniform as he directed this unfortunate business did not do him much good. But he himself was not responsible for the eviction; the order came to him from higher up, through Secretary of War Hurley, and he had no choice but to obey. There has never been an instance in General MacArthur's history of specific refusal to obey an order. But it has taken him a long time to live down what seemed an outrageously harsh and flowery display of force against a hungry, miserable group of fellow citizens.

RETIRES FROM ARMY IN 1937

General MacArthur didn't know quite where to turn when he finished his tour as Chief of Staff in 1935. He had reached the top; he was only 55, ambitious, and in perfect health. The political atmosphere in Washington was not congenial. So when his old friend, Manuel Quezon, President of the Philippines, suggested that he go out to Manila as military adviser to the Commonwealth with the unprecedented rank of field marshal, he accepted. He retired from the United States Army in 1937, and devoted himself exclusively to the Philippines (his fourth term of service there) for the next 4 years.

He liked the life of Manila, and worked at his job—the organization of Philippine defenses on a long-range basis—with zeal and acumen. He hoped, if the Japanese gave him time, to train 40,000 men annually for 10 years, build up a small fleet of patrol torpedo boats and create a seasoned air force. His basic tenet was to equip the islands so that an attack would cost an enemy more than the value received, he told me in Manila once. He was convinced that there were only two beaches in the archipelago where an enemy could land, and (again if he had time) that the invaders could be held. Like practically everybody else he underestimated the Japanese.

It is hardly necessary to recapitulate here the story of General MacArthur in World War II. By the summer of 1941 practically everybody knew that war was coming—sometime. Mr. Roosevelt recalled him to active status as a major general on July 26, 1941, and promoted him to lieutenant general the next day, in command of all United States Army Forces in the Far East; the Philippine army became part of the American command. General MacArthur was severely embarrassed by the destruction of his planes on Clark Field on Pearl Harbor day. The Japanese caught him in exactly the same naked and exposed state as they caught the Americans in Hawaii, though he had ample warning since the Pearl Harbor attack had come 10 hours before.

Today the inclination of his staff is to blame a subordinate officer for this botch and blunder. General MacArthur himself thought that war was inevitable, but he did not expect it till the spring of 1942, and he felt that the Japanese would probably bypass the Philippines in favor of softer spots to the south.

SERIOUS BLUNDER RECALLED

One may bring this story up to the present again by mentioning that General MacArthur has several times made serious blunders in judgment, based on faulty information. The attack on South Korea on June 25 apparently took him by complete surprise, and he thought that the Korean War was won after the landing at Inchon on September 15. He told Mr. Truman at their meeting on Wake Island a month later that the danger of Chinese intervention had passed, but the Chinese drastically fooled him. Then (though he tried to wriggle out of this by saying that the remark had only been "jocular") he predicted flatly that the American troops would be home by Christmas—only 3 or 4 days before they were caught by surprise and hammered back. General MacArthur, having scouted the ground personally for what was to have been his final advance, crashed into a colossal trap—moreover a trap about which he was fully aware.

Yet he has been generally regarded as the very symbol and incarnation of military omniscience. Few people dared to criticize him when he lost his planes on the Philippines; it was almost as if a conspiracy of silence existed to protect him, and most people are loath to criticize him now.

Mr. Roosevelt was, as everybody knows, violently attacked because American officers at Pearl Harbor were caught unaware and unprepared. Those who like to calumniate Mr. Roosevelt usually take earnest care to ignore the fact that General MacArthur in the Philippines likewise lost most of his planes on the ground. Most Roosevelt haters are MacArthur lovers (and vice versa) which perhaps serves to explain their easy exculpation of General MacArthur while Mr. Roosevelt is still venomously maligned.

General MacArthur thought—another error—that Manila could be held for a long period, because Corregidor was "the strongest single fortified point in the world." He did not think that the Japanese, or anybody, were capable of the type of attack they launched. He was wrong.

It's Your Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include therein part of a short address delivered by Abraham Lincoln at Indianapolis on February 11, 1861.

I know of no statement or opinion expressed that has a greater challenge in it for America today than this short address by the Great Emancipator, delivered nearly 90 years ago. All Americans should read it:

IT'S YOUR BUSINESS—HERE'S AN ALMOST-FORGOTTEN MESSAGE FROM ABRAHAM LINCOLN

In all trying positions in which I shall be placed, and doubtless I shall be placed in many such, my reliance will be upon you and the people of the United States; and I wish you to remember, now and forever, that it is your business, and not mine; that if the Union of these States and the liberties of this people shall be lost, it is but little to any one man of 52 years of age, but a great deal to the 30,000,000 people who inhabit these United States, and to their posterity in all coming time. It is your business to rise up and preserve the Union and liberty for yourselves, and not for me. I appeal to you again to constantly bear in mind that not with politicians, not with Presidents, not with office seekers, but with you, is the question: Shall the Union and shall the liberties of this country be preserved to the latest generations?

The Fallacy of the Proposed St. Lawrence Seaway Cannot Be Overcome by Argument

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the following interesting editorial exposing the fallacy of the St. Lawrence seaway was taken from the columns of the March 5, 1951, issue of the Mobile (Ala.) Register:

FALLACY OF THIS PROPOSED SEAWAY CANNOT BE OVERCOME BY ARGUMENT

The more its proponents clamor for its construction, the more obvious and irrefutable becomes the fallacy of the proposed so-called St. Lawrence seaway.

Long alert in counseling against dumping American tax money into that hocus-pocus project has been New York City's West Side Association of Commerce.

One of the conspicuous facts about the proposed so-called seaway is, of course, that for several months out of each twelve it would be icebound and not available for use by shipping.

Among other conspicuous facts is that the channel would be too shallow for most American merchant ships, while a vastly larger proportion of foreign-flag ships would be able to navigate it.

Thus the proponents of the so-called seaway are in a position of clamoring for the expenditure of American tax money to create a rank discrimination against the American Merchant Marine.

This contrast between the percent of American and foreign ships that could negotiate the seaway has just been cited by James W. Danahy, vice president of the West Side Association of Commerce in New York.

Mr. Danahy called it an "incontrovertible fact that 58 percent of foreign-flag ships have a draft which would permit use of the seaway, while only 10 percent of American ships come within this classification."

Meanwhile United States Representative JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, of Pennsylvania, has delivered another blast at the project.

Congressman VAN ZANDT speaks of "manifold reasons" why the proposed so-called seaway is "an economic monstrosity and should not be foisted upon the American taxpayers who are already overburdened by taxes that take about 35 cents out of every dollar they earn."

He reminds that "the St. Lawrence project is nothing new," because "for the past 50 years it has been talked of at different intervals, only to be shunted aside as impractical and unsound." As others have done, Mr. VAN ZANDT points out that now "advocates of this economic monstrosity have garbed it in the armor of national defense" in the hope of shoving it across under that label.

But nobody is being fooled. The fallacy of the project cannot be concealed by parading it "in the garb of national defense."

As Mr. VAN ZANDT recalls, its advocates over a period of many years have urged construction of the proposed so-called seaway for "practically every reason under the sun." But none of these arguments, nor all of them together, can ever overcome the fundamental fallacy of the project.

A Policy for Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following address of Hon. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., Republican leader of the House of Representatives, over the networks of the National Broadcasting Co., the Columbia Broadcasting System, and the Liberty Broadcasting System, on Friday evening, April 13, 1951:

Good evening.

The midnight removal of General MacArthur has brought into clear focus the fundamental issue facing the American people. That issue is whether the United States shall be bled white by an endless chain of puppet wars and puppet crises promoted by the Kremlin or whether the United States, through courageous and bold leadership, can take decisive actiton that will put an end to Russia's schemes and thus avert a third world world war.

It was on this grave issue that one of the greatest military geniuses of all time, General MacArthur, patriotically decided to stand or fall. His place in history was already secure; he is now immortal.

Let us examine the administration's case.

The administration says that it is trying to prevent a little war from becoming a world war. At the same time, it says that it intends to do this without further appeasement of the Communists. In the same breath, it speaks of willingness to negotiate a peace.

PEACE

First, what is peace?

True peace is obtained when two or more nations agree to mutual courses of conduct and then live up to the letter and spirit of those agreements.

When the administration talks about the possibility of a negotiated peace, we must ask ourselves with whom are we negotiating? The answer to that question is that we are negotiating with the Communists.

In other words, the administration again is flirting with the dangerous idea that you can make a deal with the Communists, when everybody knows that no one has ever made a successful peace with the Communists. Why? Because the Communists have never lived up to a single agreement in history.

What kind of a negotiated peace would we get?

Would it be the so-called peace that we had from 1945 until the outbreak of the Korean War?

Would it be the same kind of peace that let the Soviet Union take over control of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Albania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, and Eastern Germany, one by one?

Would it be the kind of peace that would again permit the Soviet Union to knock off one country after another like so many tenpins?

Would it be a kind of peace that would now let the Soviet Union add South Korea, Formosa, Japan, the Philippines, Indonesia, Indochina, the Malayas, Pakistan, and Thailand to the already conquered areas of Manchuria, China, North Korea, and Tibet?

Even the administration admits the Kremlin has laid out a plan for world conquest. This plan calls for the eventual seizure of every nation on earth by any one of four means—by infiltration, by revolution, by external pressure, or by war. China, for example, was taken by revolution, Czechoslovakia by infiltration, Rumania by external pressure, and war was resorted to in the case of South Korea.

The truth is that the Soviet Union is never at peace and never has been. It is always employing one or more of its four means of forcing its political objectives upon unwilling peoples.

Let the administration explain how it proposes to negotiate a peace under such conditions. To lead the American people to believe that such a thing is possible is barefaced deception.

Until we face the stark facts that confront us in the Communist conspiracy to take over the world, we are certain to drift steadily toward ultimate disaster.

AVERT WAR

How, then, is peace possible? How do we avert a third world war?

The only thing that has ever stopped the Kremlin is a show of strength, a display of will and incisive leadership on the part of those threatened by the Soviet Union.

Milquetoast leadership is the Kremlin's dish.

It grows fat on negotiated deals.

Let us look at the record.

So long as the principal nations of the world were strong, Communist success was limited to the confines of the Soviet Union. In fact, as any schoolboy knows, the only reason Russia became the victim of communism was the appalling weakness of the czars, coupled with the fatal disintegration of that nation as a result of the First World War.

So long as Poland, Czechoslovakia, China, and the other victims of Soviet expansion remained strong, they remained free. So long as Britain, France, and the United States displayed courage and strength, the Kremlin planners kept their plans hidden from the world.

Even little South Korea is an example of how the Kremlin has always pounced at the slightest display of weakness. Less than a year after we had withdrawn our troops from South Korea, the Communists invaded.

I think, therefore, we can consider it a basic principle of conduct in meeting the Communist problem, that only by full employment of strength, courage, and incisive leadership can the world Communist conspiracy be repelled and eventually defeated.

And I am convinced that it is only by adopting this principle that we can avert a third world war. Only by strengthening the hands of our friends in Europe and in Asia and by remaining strong ourselves can a general conflict be avoided.

But that is not all. We must forge new methods and new techniques to meet the threat of communism without resort to war. We are in default in the field of psychological warfare; our counterpropaganda is weak, unimaginative, and without appeal to the oppressed peoples of the world. It is paramount that new methods and techniques be devised.

The great tragedy today is that we have people in high office who either cannot see the need of, or provide the leadership for, such a course of conduct.

FORSAKING ASIA?

In the field of practical application of policy, there are many of us who are convinced that the present plans of the administration call for us only to strengthen our friends in Europe while deserting our friends in Asia. We are forced to this conclusion by two sets of facts:

1. From 1945 until June 1950, the administration pursued a frustrating and contradictory policy of containment of communism in Europe and appeasement of communism in Asia. The policy on Asia had its roots in the Yalta Conference, but it was clearly enunciated when President Truman, on the advice of Dean Acheson, announced to the world on December 15, 1945, that unless Communists were admitted to the established Government of China, aid from America would no longer be forthcoming. At the same time, Mr. Truman dispatched General Marshall to China with orders to stop the mopping up of Communist forces which was being carried to a successful conclusion by the established Government of China. American aid was cut off to China early in 1946 by General Marshall to force a truce at the very instant when government troops were winning their battle against the Chinese Reds—the very same Chinese Reds who today are waging war against us along the thirty-eighth parallel. That is all a matter of record, uncontested and undisputed.

2. In June 1950, on what appeared to be a sudden impulse, the administration without consultation with Congress, plunged the United States into the Korean conflict, obtaining the approval of the United Nations after having done so. In the next 6 months, the fighting surged from the tip of Korea to the Manchurian border, only to become mysteriously stalled in recent weeks in the general area of the thirty-eighth parallel, while rumors of a negotiated peace have circulated freely. Now, General MacArthur—a firm believer in the principle that only by a show of strength and decisive leadership can the Communists be repelled—has been removed because he opposed maintaining a costly stalemate in Korea at the expense of American lives.

APPEASEMENT REVISITED

Those of us in Washington who have watched the emphasis shift in recent months, from winning the war in Korea to proposals to send American troops to Europe, have had every reason to believe that the old policy of opposing communism in Europe, while appeasing it in Asia, is with us once again.

It is significant that General MacArthur's removal on Wednesday coincided with the disclosure that the British Government was proposing to our Government that Formosa be turned over to Red China, that Red China take part in writing the Japanese peace treaty, and that Red China be admitted to the United Nations. Nor have we forgotten that only a few short weeks ago our own Government endorsed a United Nations proposal for a negotiated settlement in Korea that abandoned basic principles which made this country great.

In short, there is evidence on every hand that appeasement of communism in Asia is again the watchword.

Certainly, we should exert every effort commensurate with our security to give Europe the strength so essential to blocking the conspirators in the Kremlin. Certainly, we should do everything possible to prevent the free peoples and resources of Europe from coming under Soviet domination. To fail to do this would be calamitous.

But we insist that to do this, and only this, while deserting Asia, would mean eventual Soviet domination of the entire world.

This administration cannot long continue to hold the world up like an apple, inviting the Soviet Union to take fresh bites, without eventually ending up clutching only the stem of disaster. Make no mistake about it, the Kremlin appetite knows no limits.

If we are going to stop communism, and if that is our policy as the administration claims it to be, then let's stop it on our own terms and not those of the Kremlin.

ASIA IS THE KEY

We will never be able to dictate peace on our terms unless we maintain strength in Asia. Asia, with its vast resources and enormous pool of manpower, is the key.

What we desperately need are policies and a strategy of a truly global nature because we are confronted with a global threat. Anything less than policies of these dimensions can only fail. Anything less can only mean a third world war and untold destruction.

The Kremlin shakes a fist at Europe, but its eyes are on Asia and have been for a quarter of a century. All anyone has to do is read the writings of Lenin, Stalin, or the Communist Daily Worker.

William Z. Foster, the head of the Communist Party in the United States, wrote in the Daily Worker on December 2, 1945: "The war in China is the key of all problems on the international front."

Hitler, in Mein Kampf, stated emphatically that Asia was the key to the world situation.

Tojo knew that Asia was the key to the world situation.

Military strategists of many governments have declared the same thing time and time again.

General MacArthur knew it, and he was fired summarily for attempting to impart his knowledge to the American people.

In fact, almost everybody except the administration in Washington seems to know it, if we can judge by the thousands of telegrams descending upon our Capital.

SECOND FRONT

On February 12, the birthday of Abraham Lincoln, I made a speech on this very vital issue. I proposed that the anti-Communist Chinese forces on Formosa be permitted to open a second front in China to relieve the pressure on our American boys in Korea and to lessen the threat to Europe.

Subsequently, I sent a copy of my speech to General MacArthur asking his views. The general replied that he was in accord with the proposal. He took the eminently sound position that while we were only exchanging words in Europe, we were exchanging bullets in Korea, and that our forces in Asia were entitled to the employment of policies that would win the struggle in Korea.

There have been attempts, notably in the Communist Daily Worker, and on the part of some befuddled thinkers, to label MacArthur as a war maker who was seeking a third world war. Such diabolical nonsense as this needs no answer in America, acceptable though it may be in Socialist circles in Britain and Communist circles in Russia. No clear-thinking American doubts for one moment the integrity of General MacArthur and his earnest desire to bring the war in Korea to a successful and speedy conclusion and to establish world peace. And I am certain that our people will give General MacArthur the most heart-warming reception in history when he returns home next week.

I think it is plain to the American people that General MacArthur was given an assignment to win the war in Korea. I think it is plain to every one of us that things had finally reached the point where not only the general but every American had the right to raise the question of whether we were in Korea to win or to lose.

Speaking only for myself, I must say that I was, and am, more so today than ever, deeply disturbed over the prospect of American boys continuing the struggle in Korea against the overwhelming hordes of Chinese Reds without some supporting move to relieve the pressure upon them.

WHO IS WAR MAKING?

Why this administration-ordered stalemate at the thirty-eighth parallel? Why this mysterious death lock while American casualties mount endlessly?

I think the American people are entitled to answers to those questions, and they have not received them.

For weeks our American forces have been on a treadmill of destruction along the thirty-eighth parallel where they die by the hundreds daily without so much as gaining a meter or losing a mile.

And the President tells us, as General MacArthur before him warned us, that the Chinese Reds are mounting a new and gigantic offensive.

But no one save MacArthur has told us what we can do about it, and he has been fired.

Talk about war making.

At its present rate of reckless conduct, this administration is likely to go down as the most senseless war makers of all time.

I ask you: How much longer can we sacrifice American lives and risk America's future when it should be perfectly clear to anyone that we are lacking the essential global strategy to meet the threat of world communism?

I think the American people have every right to know what the prospects are of such over-all policies being formulated and put into action. I would be less than truthful if I failed to point out the present chances are practically zero.

The reasons are right before us in Washington. We have only to call the roll of the top military and diplomatic advisers to the President here in Washington to understand why we are not going to achieve this desperately needed over-all strategy under this administration.

NO POLICY IN SIGHT

In the Pentagon the five top advisers to the President are Generals Marshall, Bradley, Collins, and Vandenberg and Admiral Sherman. Except for Admiral Sherman, every one of these men has mainly gained his experience in Europe. These generals have neither the background nor the knowledge of the complexities and subtleties inherent in the Far East.

This is not to say that our armed services are devoid of generals and admirals who have the necessary experience. There are plenty of them, both on the active and the retired lists.

Why does not the White House consult and give equal weight to such outstanding authorities on the Far East as Gens. R. O. Richardson, Jr., Kruger, Sutherland, Whitney, Chennault, Hodge, and Wedemeyer; and such Naval admirals as Spruance, King, Halsey, Radford, Yarnell, Bogan, and Denfeld; such Marine Corps generals as Vandegrift, Cates, Edson, and H. M. Smith?

But the domination of Europe-minded advisers is not limited to our Department of Defense, but extends to our policy-making State Department.

The record of the Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, needs no introduction here. The strange background of John P. Davies, John Stewart Service, Owen Lattimore, and the rest of the appeasement clique of the State Department officials and consultants on far-eastern policy, have long since been exposed by the fall of China to the Communists.

Yet, the influence of Dean Acheson upon the White House is profound and far-reaching. It is to our everlasting chagrin that this clique of appeasers should be regularly consulted while outstanding men of reputation and experience in the Far East have been dismissed from or deported to harmless outposts of our diplomatic service. I refer to such eminent experts as Joseph Grew, Nelson Johnson, Stanley Hornbeck, Patrick J. Hurley, Eugene Dooman, Joseph Ballentine, Adolphe Berle, William Bullitt, Everett Drumwright, and Angus Ward.

It is a black page in American history when a Dean Acheson triumphs and a Douglas MacArthur falls.

Little wonder that we lack the breadth of policy and strategy so necessary to defeat world communism, when you realize that for the most part our policy-makers resemble the fabled Cyclops who had only one eye and it in the center of their foreheads.

THE DILEMMA WE FACE

It has been the hope of many of us with respect to Asia that the administration might some day realize the folly of appeasement in the Far East, much as it reversed its policy of appeasement in Europe in 1947 and promulgated the strategy of containment of communism. Unfortunately, however, the words may be written by the White House, but the real tunes are called by the State Department and the Pentagon.

Yet no one can deny that in this crisis the need for sound policies can no longer go unfulfilled. The question is what can we do about it?

Plainly, the burden is on the Eighty-second Congress. When the executive branch fails, the Congress must act.

So far Republicans in Congress have taken the lead in the demand for a complete reexamination of our foreign and military policies. Scores of Democrats tell us privately that we are right and that action is imperative. It is our hope that outstanding Democrats will see their way clear to join us in a major move to strengthen American participation in world affairs.

This should be no party issue. This should be an American cause in which every citizen, regardless of party, should join.

There are millions of American mothers who want for their sons the peace, the prosperity, and the happiness that free men are rightfully entitled to. There are millions of patriotic American men who are willing to offer their services and their lives to preserve America and to bring about world peace, but they, too, deserve assurances that the sacrifices they make will lead to a better world for everyone.

We in America must not be misled by the nearsighted or selfish aims of any nation, friendly though it may be to us. Beyond a doubt, it is up to us to provide not only the sinews but the clear thinking to win the fight against world communism.

We should work, and work hard, to strengthen the North Atlantic family of nations, the Asiatic community of free peoples, and our sister republics in the Americas.

We should continue our efforts to work within the structure of the United Nations, and to strengthen that organization so that it can become inevitably the instrument of peace in the world.

We should meticulously avoid errors in the future that will weaken our hand anywhere. The removal of General MacArthur weakened us in the Far East; it did not strengthen us. For Japan, the day of General MacArthur's dismissal was a day of profound sorrow. In fact, all over Asia, the removal of the general sent a chill of horror down the backs of freemen, lest it mean that they were to be abandoned to Communist expansion.

General Ridgway, the successor to General MacArthur, is a man of outstanding ability. We hope and pray for his success, and we fervently desire that he, too, may rise to the stature in the Far East which General MacArthur attained.

Above all else, we should reach a clear decision on the Korean question.

If we are going to stay in Korea, let us not shackle General Ridgway as General MacArthur was shackled.

If we are not going to stay in Korea, let's make the decision now and stop what would amount to senseless destruction of American lives.

Finally, let me say that time is not on our side. Time, as things stand today, is a full partner in the Communist conspiracy.

There are 1,500,000 anti-Communist guerrillas in the south of China. How long do you think they can hold out if we do not aid them?

There are 800,000 anti-Communist Chinese on Formosa who can be used in military service. How long will they hold out when our British friends talk of turning Formosa over to the Chinese Reds?

To French Indochina, to Burma, Malaya, Indonesia, Pakistan, and India, the operations of the Chinese Reds are a constant threat. How long will they hold out if we turn our backs on Asia?

We are a mighty Nation, and we are entitled to mighty leadership.

We are too mighty for appeasement.

We are too humane to support a senseless drain of American blood in an endless treadmill war.

We must remember that if we have the proper leadership, a little in material things can go a long way when effectively applied. Successful policies are not measured in billions of dollars, millions of foot soldiers, and thousands of planes. The true measure is how effectively those dollars, those men, and those planes are employed.

Every American citizen has a part to play in the molding of public opinion and in obtaining the best out of Government and the best in leadership. If each of us puts his shoulder to the wheel, his mind to the task, and his faith in God, we can achieve the objectives we all seek.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY P. O'NEILL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial from the Scranton Tribune, Scranton, Pa., dated April 12, 1951, relative to Gen. Douglas MacArthur:

HE ASKED FOR IT

There unquestionably will be deep regret and resentment among the many friends and supporters of Gen. Douglas MacArthur as the result of the action of President Truman in relieving him of his command in the Far East.

Hardly anyone will question the fact that MacArthur has established himself as one of our Nation's greatest soldiers. Volumes could be written on his accomplishments in the military field. His courage, his ability as a military leader, his integrity, and his fine reputation cannot be questioned.

As the President so aptly said, "The Nation owes him a debt of gratitude for the distinguished and exceptional service which he has rendered his country in posts of great responsibility."

Under the circumstances, the President's action in relieving MacArthur of his command represented a grave and serious decision which is bound to have repercussions of far-reaching effect. There will be those, for example, who will inject the issue of politics into this situation. That issue does not belong and honest-thinking persons will dismiss it.

There will be others who will endeavor to becloud the real issue by injecting that of our foreign policy—a highly controversial subject. There is no question that our foreign policy was a major factor in this situation. It was in this field that MacArthur and the President disagreed. But it cannot be said that the disagreement was the issue determining the President's action. MacArthur was entitled to his own views on foreign policy, just as every other citizen. But in MacArthur's case the parallel ended right there.

MacArthur, first of all, was a soldier and he was subject, as a soldier, to the orders of his Commander in Chief, President Truman, and to the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Not once, but several times, MacArthur was given specific orders by those in higher command to refrain from making public utterances relative to this Nation's foreign policy without first clearing them with his superiors.

MacArthur chose to ignore those orders, time after time and despite repeated warnings.

As far back as December 1949 MacArthur voiced sentiments contrary to the administration's policies in the Far East by telling, publicly, a group of United States Senators who visited him in Tokyo that we should send arms and troops to Formosa. Then in early 1950 he took an unauthorized and highly publicized trip to Formosa to fraternize with Chiang Kai-shek and openly discussed the proposition of building up Formosa as a base, contrary to our expressed foreign policy. After the Korean War started MacArthur sent a message to the Veterans of Foreign Wars here advocating a policy contrary to that which our State Department had announced relative to Formosa. He was reprimanded by the President.

Mr. Truman, recognizing the gravity of MacArthur's continued conduct, even flew out to Wake Island to confer with him and to reach an understanding about clearance of his, MacArthur's, statements in the future. But the result was negative.

It was not long before MacArthur suggested that he be allowed to supersede the President, the State Department, and the United Nations and go out on the field of battle and make a deal for peace with a Chinese Red general. Then followed another public declaration to the effect that the United Nations forces should be allowed to bomb the Chinese mainland and the United States should release the Nationalist Chinese army from Formosa to attack the Chinese mainland.

Obviously General MacArthur could not be silenced; just as obviously he refused to take orders. As recently as less than a month ago the Joint Chiefs of Staff again told MacArthur to clear his statements on foreign policy and the Far East with Washington.

Commenting on this last warning, the Tribune, in an editorial on March 28, said: "It might be said that the talkative general was so instructed before and has ignored the instructions. In that case, he has been given another chance and if he muddies up the water again the consequence will be his own doing."

General MacArthur asked for it.

Please, Mr. DiSalle, Read This Letter and Then Quit Demanding the Impossible

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks, I include a letter which points out in clear, concise words just how impossible it is for the little-business men of America to comply with CPR Order No. 7.

A like letter has been received by other Iowa Congressmen.

IOWA RETAIL HARDWARE ASSOCIATION,
Mason City, Iowa, April 12, 1951.

Representative BEN F. JENSEN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. JENSEN: This letter is a personal appeal from me to you to help a considerable number of your constituents who are hardware retailers and are among the 20,000 members of this association.

The Office of Price Stabilization has just issued an amendment to its order CPR–7 to include a considerable amount of the merchandise which these small retailers handle.

If their sales of all the goods carried total $20,000 a year, these retailers must abide by this regulation. That means that a very considerable majority of our members will be subject to it.

This order provides an elaborate, complicated system of making price charts. You would be interested to have the OPS send you a copy of the entire CPR–7 order and just glance through it. I wouldn't ask any busy man like you to read the whole thing.

But your little hardware man, with his undermanned establishment, is required to read, and understand, this entire order and to make charts showing his cost and selling prices on all the items he carries which are subject to this order—and they will be about 10,000.

This little dealer—most of them don't even have an adding machine, much less a machine for calculating percentages—is required to figure his margin on each separate item and then his average mark-up on the category in which these particular items are placed.

That procedure is all right for a great department store with its staff of trained accountants. But it is just out of the question for a little hardware store with an entire crew of perhaps five people who are just getting into the busiest part of their business year.

We wonder, however, if it is all right for the big stores because this morning we received a bulletin from Roland Jones, secretary of the American Retail Federation, in Washington, D. C., and we quote:

"Far more disturbing is the fact that out of some 35 charts received by the Washington office (OPS) last week, only two of them were correctly made out."

Now, if the big operators can't do it right, how can the little fellow do it?

Now, the small hardware dealer, Mr. JENSEN, is required to have these charts prepared by April 30. If he waits for the Government he won't even have a copy of the order by then. These dealers don't subscribe to the Federal Register. And OPS doesn't have any list of them to which it mails its regulations.

How in the name of peace can the dealer ever get this job done in less than 3 weeks?

We will send him information but it will take us 3 weeks to get the material printed that we will require and get it into his hands.

Just one example of the absurdity of this regulation, for retail hardware stores, is the requirement that each cost on the list that the dealer enters must be supported by an invoice showing that it is the actual cost.

Well, most hardware retailers buy the majority of their merchandise from jobbers. And a single jobber's invoice may have as many as a hundred different items on it. But the dealer who puts down that his cost of a certain hammer is $1 is supposed to hunt through these jobber invoices until he finds the one on which he was billed $1 for these hammers and then enter on his pricing chart the name of the jobber and the date of that invoice.

Then every dealer has lots of merchandise that he may have had on hand 2 or 3 years. He hasn't saved the invoice for that merchandise. He has his cost marked on the item, or the box in which it is carried, but when you tell him he has to produce an invoice to prove that he has told the truth when he entered that cost, you are asking for the impossible.

Well, suppose the dealer decides he just can't live up to the requirements of this order. What are the penalties? Very light, I can assure you, sir. If the dealer hasn't complied with the price filing by May 30, he is prohibited from selling any of the merchandise. All he has to do is to go out of business because some crazy loons in Washington have cooked up an order that he can't conform to.

Our representative has told OPS people from the beginning that hardware retailers couldn't comply with the CPR–7 order and was assured by them that they wouldn't be required to. But here they are.

Please don't answer this letter with a form reply. I don't care if you don't answer it at all. But please do call Mr. DiSalle, or some one else and see if those OPS people can't be taught some sense.

If you want to, send them this letter and ask them to tell you where it is wrong.

I am going to count on you for some action, Mr. JENSEN. I believe you are a good friend of the little fellow and the hardware retailer is surely one of them.

Yours very truly,
IOWA RETAIL HARDWARE ASSOCIATION,
PHILIP R. JACOBSON, Secretary.

Address Before Rhode Island Automobile Dealers Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address recently delivered by me before the Rhode Island Automobile Dealers Association in Providence, R. I.:

Mr. Toastmaster, members of the Rhode Island Automobile Dealers Association, invited guests, and friends, whether you selected the date of your banquet by accident or design, it fits in perfectly with the congressional Easter vacation. Thus I am able to escape the hurly-burly of Washington for the moment and mingle with you gentlemen who are, whether or not you know it, business associates of mine, for following the illustrious example of our United States Attorney General, I, too, have an interest in a Rhode Island dealership.

I can say in all sincerity that it is a pleasure for me to be with you and to be associated with you because I have a great admiration for the industry you represent. I also have sentiments of respect for your business acumen, because whenever you have occasion to write me on matters which affect your business, I have always been impressed with the force and logic which accompanies your views on legislation.

In our American industrial civilization of today the automotive industry is not only a most important sustaining unit, it might be called the keystone of our industrial arch. This great automobile business had its birth when our people were emerging from an agricultural or agrarian civilization and were turning those qualities of imagination, initiative and resourcefulness to increasing American production.

The automotive industry has been in the forefront of that development and set the pattern and created the blueprint of that productive capacity which has made the United States the leading nation of the world. Today in this country it can be said that our economy is geared to the rubber-tired wheel. Leadership among nations cannot be maintained with the noblest motives energizing that leadership unless a position of economic leadership is sustained. The automotive blueprint of production, adapted to other industries, has been responsible for the fact that while the people of the United States constitute less than 7 percent of the world's population, they produce 50 percent of the world's manufactured goods.

This is something of which you may be proud. I am aware that you gentlemen represent not the production segment, but the distribution and servicing part of this great automotive industry. But I am likewise aware that production could not have attained its impressive totals unless you as a class of American merchants distributed and serviced the vehicles which the factories produce. Although Rhode Island is a tiny portion of the retail automobile industry, it is common knowledge that automobile dealers by and large in the United States, from standpoint of the aggregate number of employees in your part of the industry, namely, distribution and servicing, is greater than the number engaged in production. I understand also that the aggregate investment of 45,000 dealers throughout the United States is a greater aggregate than the total investment of all the automobile factories combined.

Regarding modern civilization it has been said that agriculture and transportation are the handmaidens of industry. This automotive business is not only a prime factor in industry, it might also be said that it produces the instrument for transportation so that in addition to being the most important stone in our structure of industry, it likewise produces the instruments upon which a good part of our transportation depends.

The burden of responsibility created by the very importance of this industry is a heavy responsibility. Though it might be contended that the preponderance of investment and number of employees being in that branch represented by you gentlemen should result in the ground rules of this great industry being promulgated by you, it nevertheless is a fact that the ground rules are promulgated by the production segment of the industry. Perhaps it is fair that the ground rules be laid down by that other branch of the industry, the production branch, because though you gentlemen carry the ball, they make it. But I would say the legal maxim that "there is no right without a responsibility" is not only a legal guide, it is an immutable truth. It behooves those who lay down the ground rules to be fair and equitable. It behooves them to take cognizance of the rights and equities of their team mates who distribute and service the vehicles that the manufacturers produce. It behooves them to police their industry to guard against the imposition of requirements which can be so economically detrimental as to cause disruption and distress in our economic fabric. It behooves them to so interpret the ground rules that there will be no repetition of the condition of some years ago, in which the average business life of an automobile dealer was 3 years, according to a study made by a great university. It behooves them to refrain from imposition of requirements which may hamper imagination and the disposition of the individual to do his best work without arbitrary interference.

Of course, it goes without saying that while the factory has an obligation to be fair with the dealer, the dealer in his turn must be fair not only with the factory but with the public. In my opinion the great bank of good will which the dealers the length and breadth of the country built up during World War II by their ingenious and effective means to maintain civilian transportation melted away in the immediate years following the war. Then, tempted by the great demand of the public for new cars and the willingness of the public to pay any price for them, the few dealers who could not resist the opportunity for big profits did irreparable harm to you all as merchants.

Today's rearmament program in this country undoubtedly will afford a similar opportunity for dealers to swell their profits and with no thought of preaching to you let me strongly urge you one and all to conduct your business in such a manner that the public may continue to have full faith and confidence in you.

Today our Government is in the process of imposing ceilings on new and used cars, parts and services, as well on all other items of business and while of necessity these ceilings will require considerable revision and adjustment, as time goes on, I cannot urge you too strongly, in the common cause of defense, to hold the line and accord to the Office of Price Stabilization your full and willing support.

I suppose I should not take my seat without discussing to some extent the taxes which may be imposed upon your retail business by the Government. Frankly, I do not intend to say or promise too much, for I am but one of 435 Representatives in Congress and then, too, there is the Senate which plays its full part in the legislative picture, but I will say this much—I intend to scrutinize closely all taxes contemplated to make sure that your industry is not compelled to pay more than its full share. The costs of building up the defenses of this country are, as you well know, great. They will continue for some time to come. I know, that as loyal and patriotic citizens, you are willing to pay your full share of these costs. But whenever in my opinion these costs are excessive or unfair, you can rely upon my voice in opposition to pyramiding these taxes to a point where they will tend to slow down or obstruct such an important segment of our retail industry as the automobile business. That I promise you. Taxes defeat their purpose when by their very weight they retard acceleration of business and industry or discourage initiative. And acceleration and the building-up of production today is all important.

To determine the fine line between adequate revenue and taxes that are unduly oppressive is the task which today confronts your elected representatives. Let me assure you we fully recognize that responsibility. The problems confronting us would disturb us far more did we not feel that the American people today fully recognize the importance of our regaining with the utmost speed a position of such military power as to deter those whose professed objectives have been to plunge the world into a third war. United we stand today. The issues involved which are the cause and purpose of our rearmament are so weighty as to enable us, both in Government and industry, to jointly cooperate in their adjustment and solution.

You automobile merchants played your part nobly in World War II. I know we can count on your effective cooperation today, tomorrow and until the hour of peril is past.

The Great Debate

OF

HON. CHRISTIAN A. HERTER

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Hanson W. Baldwin, the distinguished military expert of the New York Times, has this morning made an extremely valuable contribution to the great debate which has now been brought into focus by the dismissal of General MacArthur, over the course which our far eastern policy should take. The analysis by Mr. Baldwin of the different courses which the United States might pursue concludes with the recommendations for extension of the war in the Far East, but by strictly limited means. His detailed recommendations as to the specific measures which the United States should take seem to me to parallel very closely the policy advocated by General MacArthur. They should be studied with care by those who today are condemning MacArthur's policy, even before the general has had a full hearing.

THE GREAT DEBATE: II—FOUR POSSIBLE COURSES OF ACTION SEEN IF KOREAN CEASE-FIRE NEGOTIATIONS FAIL

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

The fighting in Korea yesterday was—as it has been for many months now—vicious but indecisive; no end was in sight.

Political negotiations directed toward the ending of that war should be welcomed. But if, as seems probable, any negotiated termination of the campaign on a basis acceptable to us proves impossible, we then will face only four possible courses of action:

1. Indefinite continuation of the present limited war in Korea.

2. Withdrawal from Korea.

3. Unlimited extension of war to Communist Chinese territory; and if necessary, to Russia; in other words, unlimited war in the Far East, and perhaps in the world.

4. Extension of the war, but by strictly limited means; in other words, fighting a less limited war than we are now doing.

Any and all of these courses must be based on two basic postulates: (a) Even though Europe should have strategic priority, Europe cannot be saved by losing Asia; in other words, the spread of communism in Asia must be halted if we are to win the struggle for the world; (b) there is no possible course of action that does not involve risks—grave risks and the ultimate risk of general war.

FIRST COURSE HELD IMPRACTICAL

The first course—indefinite continuation of the present situation in Korea—can be ruled out as a practical possibility on psychological and political grounds. Unless some end to fighting looms in Korea, the morale of our troops and of the South Koreans is bound to deteriorate; moreover, public opinion in this country will not tolerate indefinitely a toll of casualties with no end in sight. From the strategic point of view, the continued concentration for an indefinite period of so much of our strength in Korea, and the military and economic drain it represents should not be tolerated for more than another 3 to 6 months.

The second course—deliberate withdrawal from Korea—means throwing in the sponge before the knock-down. It would represent a run-out, not only to those we supported in Korea but to all anti-Communist forces in Asia; it would represent appeasement in a new form. It would have intolerable political, moral, and psychological consequences throughout Asia and the world; United States prestige would fall to a new low; our position in Japan would be imperiled; and communism almost certainly would spread.

The third course—unlimited extension of the war to Communist Chinese territory—and if Russia intervened, to Russia—would, as President Truman said, bring on the very thing we are trying to prevent, world war III. An invasion of Communist China with United States forces, or even large-scale blockade and bombardment of China by United States sea and air power, would mean the commitment of far greater force to the Orient than we now have there. If Russia abstained from direct aid to China, we would become involved in a major war against a secondary opponent—a war that would be likely to continue for a long time and that would leave Russia relatively free for other moves in Europe and elsewhere.

This policy suffers from the same disadvantages as does the "preventive war" theory; it brings on the very thing we are trying to prevent—general war—and it might commit us to that war at a disadvantage; we might be shadow-boxing with the real opponent, Russia, while heavily engaged with the secondary opponent, China.

Only the fourth course offers, at least for the foreseeable future, any conceivable hope. Yet we must frankly face the fact that this course, like all the others, runs the risk of war. Any attempt to fight a limited war—though limited wars are the only ones that offer the hope of future political stability—may be doomed to failure; wars have the habit of spreading; and if we deliberately make the war in Korea less limited, we may not be able to control its ultimate spread. But, given the position we are in today, there is no alternative, and any course we take—most of all appeasement—runs the risk of general war.

A limited extension of the war in Korea should include immediately the following positive measures:

1. A large-scale rearmament and reorganization of the Chinese Nationalists' forces on Formosa, supervised and directed by a large United States military mission.

2. Restriction of the Formosan functions of the United States Seventh Fleet to defense of Formosa against Communist invasion; that is, permission for the resumption of the limited blockade of the Chinese coast by the Nationalist Navy, and for Nationalist air raids and commando raids on that coast.

3. A large-scale effort to supply, arm, and organize Chinese guerrillas. This should be done quietly, but vigorously. Our aim should be the fractionalization of Communist China, and support, not necessarily of one anti-Communist leader but of many.

4. The equipping, as rapidly as possible, of additional South Koreans, but no faster than they can be trained effectively and screened politically.

5. A speed-up in the rearmament of Japan.

6. Continued political, economic, psychological and military aid to selected non-Communist governments and factions in Asia, but supervised by United States missions and on our terms.

STEPS HELD INADVISABLE

The new less limited war should not include, at least initially:

1. Large-scale invasion of the Chinese mainland by the Nationalists.

2. Use of United States planes or ships against Communist China outside of the Korean area.

3. Bombardment of the enemy's Manchurian air bases and supply dumps and communication lines. This prohibition, however, should remain in force only so long as the enemy air actions in Korea remain defensive. If enemy air force should intervene massively in deep penetration of Korea against our air, naval, or ground forces, and/or if the safety of our troops in Korea were imperiled, Manchurian bases should be bombed immediately, even though there are both military and political liabilities to such action.

We face, therefore, as the great Truman-MacArthur debate opens, a crisis in the Orient, and in the world. We should welcome political negotiations, on the basis of the thirty-eighth parallel, looking toward the end of the Korean War, but we should never make any basic concessions, such as the admission of Communist China to the United Nations or the surrender of Formosa to the Communists, to secure an armistice. If a negotiated end to the war proves impossible, we must resolutely face the extension of military measures, despite the risk implied.

Three considerations are basic to any course we may follow in the Orient. The first is that we must use Asians to fight Asians. The second is that a defensive policy, or a policy of drift-and-wait never can stem the tide of communism; a policy of a limited offensive—politically, economically, militarily, psychologically—is essential. And the third is that, if Russia and Communist China want general war, any of our attempts to limit the Korean conflagration are futile. In other words, world war III is more likely to be the result of what the enemy does than of what we do. If we fear to take action because of possible enemy reaction, obviously we can formulate no policy worthy of the name.

Bureaucrats at Work

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following article by Fulton Lewis, Jr., on the shocking waste and extravagance in Government departments:

BUREAUCRATS AT WORK
(By Fulton Lewis, Jr.)

WASHINGTON, April 16.—Washington in the spring: The Navy is in a stew. A House Appropriations Committee has just discovered that the Navy has 11,000,000 dozen oyster forks on hand. That's 11,000,000 dozen. Nobody in the Navy quite knows why or how so many were purchased, or what they are going to do with them. There aren't that many oysters, let alone Navy personnel.

But any howling over this extravagance will be drowned out. The Government is buying 100 electric organs, valued at $150,285. That's $1,502.85 per organ.

Along with the 93-year supply of light bulbs accumulated by one Washington bureau there are stacked up 3,000,000 pounds of peanut butter, 6,000,000 pounds of sugar, 175,028 cans of condensed milk, and something to sneeze about, 1,000,000 pounds of black pepper.

Lawyers, of course, never need fear unemployment so long as Washington exists.

The Department of Justice has 1,600 lawyers on its payroll, wants more. Sixteen of them engage in private practice, seldom visit their offices, yet receive full pay, accrued leave, and a 30-day annual vacation.

Oscar Ewing, Federal Security Administrator, is hiring a $10,000-a-year recreation specialist to help out in the defense emergency. Apparently the plan is to teach people how to use all the WPA parks scattered across the country. Ewing also is embarked on an extensive program of vocational training for industry, although thousands of GI's were trained under the GI bill of rights.

To add to the confusion, Congress is about to approve a $25,000 request to test air raid sirens around the country. And the Civil Defense Administration has changed its mind. It no longer wants to build concrete bomb shelters deep in the ground to protect civilians against atom bomb attacks. Now the agency proposes to shore up basements in Government buildings and others and to reinforce buildings with concrete shock walls. And to learn how badly scared we are the CDA is conducting polls across the country. The big test will be whether or not people worry more about the atom or the administration.

Fish have also gone to war. The Fish and Wildlife Service has set up a defense fisheries agency to coordinate fish activities into the defense effort. Naturally this will require money and manpower.

To keep us posted on this and other ideas emanating from Washington the Department of the Interior has 110 press agents. The Bureau of Labor Statistics, as an emergency measure, is demanding 100 more employees to gather housing statistics, although the Federal Housing Administration and the Veterans' Administration have tons of facts on housing gathering dust in their files.

If you want to travel, the Defense Production Administration is the place to work. It has requested from Congress funds amounting to $1,200 each for employees to travel in 1951. It is also paying average salaries of $7,000 annually, compared to overall Government average of $3,600.

One bureaucrat has admitted to Congress that he has "stockpiled" stenographers. He keeps them shuffling papers until there are typing chores as a result of the defense emergency. Representative CLARENCE CANNON, Democrat, of Missouri, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, is pleading with the Government to use women more extensively in the defense effort. This may be the answer:

The Office of Price Stabilization now has 120 lawyers on the payroll. Its enforcement officer, Edward Morgan, was chief counsel of the Tydings Investigation Subcommittee that whitewashed charges of Communists in Government. Morgan also helped handle the Senate Pearl Harbor investigation for the Democrats.

As a wind-up to Washington in the spring it might be well to remind the bureaucrats that since they started spending billions to control inflation, prices, wages, etc., it is costing us on the average of 43 percent more to live today than before the Korean War started.

When the Emerald Isle Is One

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the REC-

ORD, I include the following poem written by Ray Beckett, of Providence, R. I., on March 17, 1951:

WHEN THE EMERALD ISLE IS ONE

Let's say a prayer, when the world's aware
That the Emerald Isle is one.
They'll be no North of Ireland
To darken the Irish sun.
We'll click our heels, to the Irish reels
When the pipers gaily play,
We'll celebrate, from Malin Head
To the end of Bantry Bay.
Let's tip our hats to the Mikes and Pats
Who fought and died unsung
With the Parnells, Moores and Emmets
Of the silv'ry Irish tongues.
March on me boy, let's not destroy
The work already done,
And Irish hearts will know no joy
'Til the Emerald Isle is one.

General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, I directed attention of the House to an editorial in the Washington Post entitled "Now It Comes Out." The following editorial is a sequel. I am also including an interesting editorial from the Post, entitled "MacArthur's Return." The above-mentioned editorials follow:

[From the Washington Post of April 14, 1951]

NOW IT COMES OUT—II

Every Washington reporter is familiar with the diplomatic denial—the procedure whereby a news story is denounced by an official if it becomes embarrassing, even though the facts originally came from him. The practice is a vicious one. It victimizes the public as well as the press; and it has been responsible for the scrambling of an awful lot of history. Now the tales are beginning to unfold of how General MacArthur's headquarters participated in this little game.

Item: In January, Keyes Beech of the Chicago Daily News reported from Tokyo that according to an authoritative source General MacArthur wanted to pull American troops out of Korea and carry the war to China by air and naval blockade. The story was immediately denied in both Tokyo and Washington. Col. Marion P. Echols, General MacArthur's press officer who passed the story, later denounced it as a figment of the imagination.

Now Mr. Beech discloses in a new dispatch that the source of his information was Maj. Gen. Courtney Whitney, military secretary to General MacArthur and virtually an echo of the supreme commander. It is inconceivable that General Whitney, whose loyalty has been slavish, would misrepresent the feelings of his superior. Christopher Rand, reporting from Tokyo in the New York Herald Tribune, adds confirming evidence that General MacArthur was not misrepresented. General MacArthur's aim, he says, "seemingly was to provoke a large-scale showdown with Red China and possibly Russia. Korea was a minute detail in it and probably an unwelcome one—there always has been sentiment in the MacArthur headquarters for abandoning Korea and removing the hostilities elsewhere."

The blanket of censorship in Japan has hitherto made it virtually impossible, of course, to ascertain the facts. Now that this cat is out of the bag, perhaps we can learn of the other instances in which the press has been victimized for telling the truth.

[From the Washington Post]

MACARTHUR'S RETURN

President Truman has accepted with good grace the decision of congressional leaders to invite General MacArthur ceremonially to speak before a joint meeting of the House and Senate. Naturally this does not mean that the administration wishes to give General MacArthur a great national forum for the airing of his disagreement with the President or even for the exposition of his views on far-eastern policy. Rather it means that General MacArthur is to be accorded the reception he deserves as a military hero in spite of his dismissal from his far-eastern command.

It must be taken for granted that General MacArthur will understand the situation and will not take advantage of this generous gesture to magnify the schism that his removal has caused. Belatedly he is to be honored for his illustrious service in World War II and for his commanding work in Japan. In that tribute all the people as well as all of Congress can join without reserve. The fact remains, however, that he has been deposed from his command for insubordination, and if the joint session should be used in any way as a protest against that essential action or to enter into controversy on the points involved in his dismissal, the joint session would become a reproach to him and to the dignity and judgment of the Congress.

Quite apart from the joint session, there is a natural desire on the part of Members of Congress to hear General MacArthur's version of the events that led to his dismissal by President Truman and his view of the conflict in the Far East. The country has a similar interest in the MacArthur story, and it is good news that he is coming home to tell it. Just before the President ousted General MacArthur, this newspaper suggested that he be recalled for report. What is wanted in this connection is not oratory but exposition, and that exposition can most appropriately come in sessions of the committees dealing with the armed services and foreign relations.

In this atmosphere General MacArthur should have complete freedom for telling his story. The important thing is that the controversial aspects of his return to Washington shall not be injected into the congressional ceremony in his honor. Congress as well as the people must learn to distinguish between MacArthur the military hero and MacArthur the superseded exponent of a rejected policy while in an administrative role.

Higher Mail Rates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, while the Congress is considering the advisability of a general increase in postage rates, it might be well to look at the problem from the angle of the folks who will be called upon to pay these increases. Sometimes higher rates do not result either in improved service or increased returns, and a recent editorial in the Ottumwa (Iowa) Daily Courier indicates that a sharp increase in postal rates might actually mean less money for the Post Office Department. Under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include this editorial:

HIGHER MAIL RATES

There is another side to the question of whether postal rates should be raised, as Mr. Truman desires. The Government has said the increases are needed to cut $275,000,000 off the Post Office Department deficit. Mail users show the argument is not all on the Truman side.

Abolishing penny post cards never has worked. When the 2-cent rate was tried in 1917, the volume dropped 70 percent. The same thing occurred, after a brief trial, in 1925.

Second class is used by newspapers and magazines. The proposal is to double the rates. For a figure close to the proposed costs, many publishing companies could set up their own delivery systems or switch to some other method. The post-office revenues would go down, not up. Small, nonprofit, and educational periodicals would be real sufferers in a rate increase. Many would go broke.

Direct-mail advertising uses third-class mail. A rate boost would force some of the thousands of businessmen who use this service out of business. First-class mail is regarded by the Post Office Department as a paying proposition, so it doesn't intend to change the 3-cent rate.

Operating costs of the post office are fairly well fixed. Those who oppose the proposed increase in mail rates cite the case of the telephone companies. The cost to them of a nighttime long-distance call is much higher than in the daytime, but the rate to users is much lower.

The same thing applies to the post office. It has to pay overhead, whether it does any business or not. Mail users are convinced that with the proposed increases, postal business will fall off so sharply that the Department, in the end, will lose more money than it is losing now.

The Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, the tragic dismissal of General MacArthur who has been looked upon by millions of Japanese and the people of the Orient as a "symbol of the justice of democracy and the military power of the United States" at this critical time has not only shocked the people of the Orient, but has been a great shock to the people of the United States who have protested by wires and letters to Members of Congress with a deluge of mail never before witnessed in Washington.

Whether or not the President had the right to dismiss General MacArthur is not now of too great importance. The important thing now is that the Military Affairs Committee in questioning General MacArthur, the military leaders here in Washington, and the State Department bring out all of the facts surrounding the present unfortunate situation. General MacArthur's brilliant military achievements and experience in the Philippines, and his administration of Japan, totaling a period of 14 years, permits him to speak from a background of greater knowledge and experience than the President or anyone in the Pentagon or the State Department.

General MacArthur and General Ridgway as well have stated in substance "that unless the foreign policy is changed here in Washington so that our military commanders in the field are permitted to destroy by bombing enemy bases and supply lines beyond the Yalu River the war in Korea will be dragged out indefinitely into a stalemate."

Mr. Speaker, General MacArthur took this position to prevent the repetition of hundreds of thousands of Chinese troops who struck us near the Yula River during the terrible cold of last winter and who drove our forces back far below the thirty-eighth parallel, and forced evacuation of Hungnam in the dead of winter resulting in the loss of the lives of thousands of soldiers in that long and terrible retreat, and millions of dollars' worth of munitions, equipment, and supplies that fell into the hands of the enemy.

Lieutenant General Stratemeyer in command of the Air Force in Korea has warned that hereafter we can expect serious competition from a newly created North Korean air force equipped with jet fighters and operated by trained Chinese Communists trained by the Russians again flying over at will for an assault on our troops, with our Air Force being allowed to chase them back only to the border.

It has been a cardinal principal of war that the supply lines and bases of an enemy must be destroyed to reduce the power of the enemy in the field.

General Eisenhower and our Chief of Staff agree that if a war comes with Russia in Europe we must, by air power, destroy with bombs the industrial plants back of the line, and the enemy's concentration depots to prevent supplies reaching the enemy in the field. The same should hold true in Korea now.

That is exactly what General MacArthur and General Ridgway or any military man knows must be done if we are to bring the aggression in Korea to a successful conclusion.

Mr. Speaker, the issues in the controversy between President Truman and Gen. Douglas MacArthur will require time-consuming investigations and studies before they are resolved to the satisfaction of the American people.

For more than 6 years our people have lived in a state of confusion. They have been confused by the mistakes of our foreign policies and by our domestic policies as well. We have moved from one emergency to another, but always with heavy Federal expenditures, which increase as time goes on.

To appraise Truman's judgment now in the Far East the people have a right to ask:

Was his judgment good when at Potsdam he approved an agreement that gave Russia and the Chinese Communists control of Manchuria and the north half of Korea which ultimately gave them control of all of China?

Did he use good judgment when he later sent General Marshall to China to carry out his policy to force the Chinese Nationalist Government, then our ally, to accept the Northern Chinese Communists of Manchuria with equal rights into a coalition government of all China? This action helped to defeat the Chinese Nationalist Government.

Was the President's judgment sound when he and Secretary of State Acheson stated to the world prior to the war in Korea that Korea and Formosa laid outside of our sphere of influence in the Orient, and outside of our perimeter of defense?

The people have a right to ask, If we intended to defend South Korea, why were those statements made and why did the President cause all of our military forces to be withdrawn from South Korea?

They have the right to ask the further question, Why did the President and Secretary of State Acheson change their foreign policy within 24 hours after South Korea was invaded in June 1950?

Here again, Mr. Truman's judgment appears subject to question. He sent the Seventh Fleet to patrol the waters surrounding Formosa, to prevent raids by Nationalist Armies on the mainland, and raids by the Communist Armies on Formosa.

When the Reds invaded South Korea, and Chiang Kai-shek offered 30,000 trained troops to help halt the aggression, this aid was refused. However, American soldiers were rushed from Japan, and the United States to carry the burden of thrusting back the invaders.

Mr. Speaker, our whole diplomatic and military policies since Yalta need to be reexamined. The Congress needs to have all the facts. The cloak of secrecy should be removed from our diplomatic blunders, and those responsible for the mistakes should be ousted from the Government.

Mr. Speaker, when General MacArthur returns to Washington Thursday to present his story to the Congress and the American people he will face several handicaps.

First of all, he is still in the military service of his Nation. He will not be allowed to disclose facts that affect the military security of the Nation, regardless of whether or not they are right or wrong.

He will not have at his disposal a large force of publicity men and writers to present his side of the controversy. But President Truman, Secretary Acheson, and Secretary Marshall do have at their disposal a powerful propaganda machine of hundreds of informational and publicity personnel, who will present the administration's side of the picture in great details, magnifying, of course, every small digression or apparent mistake during General MacArthur's administration and glorifying the aims of President Truman to contain the aggression.

Mr. Speaker, the question now resolves around one single factor:

Was General MacArthur right in his military appraisal of the situation and should the military situation be subordinated to political international considerations?

If General MacArthur has blundered in Korea, it will be the first acknowledged blunder of this great military leader in his career. If the international political advisers to President Truman have blundered, the Congress and the American people have a right to know all the facts.

It appears the following are some of the questions which should be answered:

First. What directives, if any, were issued by the United Nations to General MacArthur?

Second. What counter directives, if any, were issued by President Truman to General MacArthur?

Third. What contributions by other nations to the expeditionary forces in Korea were made with the understanding that the Supreme Allied Commander would not be allowed to exercise full and complete military discretion in conducting the campaign to repel the invaders and achieve a military victory?

Fourth. What members of the United Nations, if any, have been supplying neutral aid—conducting business with both sides—to the enemy in South Korea?

Mr. Speaker, when these questions, among others, are answered, the American people and the Congress will be in a better position to judge between the policies of President Truman, Secretary Acheson, and the internationalists in our Government, and the strictly military policies and objectives of America's greatest military leader of modern times—Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

Mr. Speaker, the American people are in fact the Government. Their thousands of letters to their Congressmen by over 100 to 1 condemn the action of the President in his removal of General MacArthur. They appear to have lost all confidence in his Secretary of State, Acheson.

The Congress must assert itself, bring out all the facts, and assume greater control in the direction of the affairs of the Government.

General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the Members who may not have seen the following articles in the Washington Post, I should like to call attention to the columns by Mr. Walter Lippmann and Mr. Marquis Childs, and also an editorial entitled "Churchill on War":

[From the Washington Post of April 17, 1951]

TODAY AND TOMORROW

(By Walter Lippmann)

LIMITED WAR

It is sad but true that no good solution is now possible in Korea. The high objectives which the General Assembly proclaimed in the resolution of October 7—namely, "the establishment of a unified, independent, and democratic government of Korea"—are not now attainable.

The best that can be had now is an armistice at the old frontier of South and North Korea, at the thirty-eighth parallel. It is also the least the United Nations can accept. An armistice in the middle of Korea would amount to a recognition by both sides that Korea cannot be unified in a limited war—in a limited war both sides will have to be content with limited objectives.

The restoration of the status quo ante is a limited objective. The war which is being fought in Korea has been a limited war—that is to say it has been confined to hostilities within the Korean Peninsula; each side has operated from a "sanctuary" outside the limited theater of hostilities, which the other side did not attack. Only a limited objective can be attained by a war which is limited.

If we want more than the limited objective of restoring the South Korea frontier, having repelled the original aggression of June 25, then we must accept the risks of a general war in the Far East. The UN resolution of October 7, insofar as it was sincerely meant, authorized and indeed directed General MacArthur to unit Korea by force of arms, and then to hold elections, etc., etc.

General MacArthur's great error was that he misjudged the intentions of Red China, and thus persuaded the civilian authorities here to believe that the UN resolution could be carried out by the limited forces and the kind of limited war which General MacArthur was conducting. Had General MacArthur's estimate of the situation been better, he would have advised the President that the UN resolution of October 7 should not be adopted unless the United States and its principal allies were prepared to engage in a general war in the Far East. That is what he is saying now. That is what he should have said before October 7.

By the same token had the State Department's intelligence been better, had it not been swept off its feet by the Inchon victory, had it not been so much the captive of its critics that it dares not have the courage of its convictions, it would not have promoted the UN resolution of October 7. It would have worked to attain in September, when we were victorious, the armistice which it would now, after so much bloodshed, like to attain through a stalemate.

The question now is whether the country will agree with reasonable unity that our military objective in Korea is the limited one of repelling aggression south of the thirty-eighth parallel and restoring the South Korean Republic. We can, and we should, still hold it as a political and a diplomatic objective that Korea should eventually be united by democratic means. But we cannot unify Korea by a war confined to the Korean Peninsula, and we shall get nowhere in this controversy until we make the choice of limited objectives out of a limited war or unlimited objectives out of an unlimited war.

The critical weakness of President Truman's position is that while he proclaims his intention to limit the war, he has not mustered up the courage to tell the people clearly that in a limited war we can obtain only limited results.

The view which General MacArthur laid down to Congressman Martin was, unless he has been greatly misunderstood, that if the limitations on our military actions were removed, a victory not only in Korea but in the global issue could be attained. No one has yet explained publicly how so great and glorious a result can be achieved by bombing Chinese cities and using Chiang's troops on Formosa, as Senator TAFT now describes it, "to conduct raids on the mainland." No one has explained how the Soviet Union can be defeated by a hit-and-run campaign against China.

Until it is explained more convincingly than it has as yet been, it must surely be the first principle of our strategy never to commit our main forces—namely our strategic air power and all the forces on which it depends—except against the main adversary. There may be, and indeed there is, room for argument as to whether the main theater of war—in the event of war—would be Europe, the Middle East, or the Far East. But there can be no room for argument, I submit, that the main adversary is the Red Army of the Soviet Union, and that it would be strategic lunacy to commit our main forces, the main forces of the Atlantic community and of western Christendom, until the Kremlin commits its main forces.

RIDGWAY'S TIMETABLE

(By Marquis Childs)

WHY CHIANG'S TROOPS CAN'T BE USED

The documents released by the White House show quite clearly how impossible it was to have any coherent policy with Tokyo pulling one way and Washington another. That is the paramount fact that must not be lost sight of in the midst of the violent reaction the President's decision has produced.

But now the burden is on the coalition of western powers within the United Nations to show that they can carry out a policy intended to resolve the conflict in Korea. Too often delay and indecision have seemed to justify General MacArthur in rushing in to fill a vacuum. The generalizations contained in President Truman's speech do not constitute a policy.

Before the clash with MacArthur reached the head-on collision stage, the Joint Chiefs of Staff had worked out a military plan. It had been accepted by the new commander in chief in the Far East, Lieut. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway, who actually has been directing military operations in Korea for some time. The plan called for a tentative timetable more or less as follows:

The United Nations armies will meet the new Communist offensive. They may be compelled to give up some of the ground won in recent weeks. But there is confidence in the Ridgway command that the offensive can be repulsed. With additional large-cale Communist losses piled on top of the half-million or more suffered after the November intervention, the Chinese will then conclude that they cannot win in Korea.

This will be apparent by mid-September. At that time the Korean situation will be stalemated. The way will then be open to truce negotiations with the Communist regime in Peiping.

But even if they still refuse to consider any negotiation, as they have done for the past 2 months, a stalemate in fact will be taken for granted and plans based on that assumption. If events develop in this fashion, it is estimated that two American divisions will be left in Korea along with some other UN units.

At the same time four trained and seasoned American divisions will be kept in Japan. These divisions will not be allowed to lapse into occupation status, but will be kept in a state of readiness. They could be quickly shifted back to Korea should the Communists again invade from the north.

A basic consideration in this plan is to build up South Korean troops through training and arms provided from this country. This last, as the documents released by the White House show, was blocked by General MacArthur who wanted the arms given to the Jap police.

In this connection it is interesting to note the recommendations of William R. Mathews, editor of the Tucson (Ariz.) Daily Star, and an authority on the Far East and MacArthur's command. In an article written before MacArthur's recall, Mathews suggested that "instead of demobilizing more than 200,000 Koreans for lack of arms, we should find the arms for them and continue their training." Frequently a supporter and long an admirer of MacArthur, Mathews wrote:

"If we allow ourselves to be drawn into a war in China, we will not win it militarily or politically. We will exhaust ourselves. We will not harm the source of communism, we will allow the Soviet Union to grow so strong that it can choose its own time to march west in Europe."

Much of the anger directed at President Truman appears to be motivated by the belief that through using the Nationalist Chinese forces on Formosa, as MacArthur advocated, the war in Korea could be shortened and American lives saved. This touches the usefulness of the refugee army under Chiang Kai-shek. The illusion is cherished by some that this is a force in being, trained, seasoned, equipped, which could be picked up in a matter of days or weeks and dropped down on the mainland of China or onto the Korean peninsula.

Even the most ardent advocates of Chiang and the Nationalists, including retired American admirals and generals who are Chiang's paid advisers on Formosa, have never said that. A large amount of equipment is needed to rehabilitate an army that for nearly 2 years has been held together under difficulties. Rear Adm. Charles M. Cooke (retired), former commander of the United States Seventh Fleet, and Chiang's most important adviser, put the cost of that equipment at $250,000,000 some time ago and rising prices would have upped it considerably by now.

But realistic observers on Formosa point to a far more important consideration—that the United States would have to give 100-percent air-sea support to any action by the Nationalists against the mainland. The chances were at least 20-to-1 that this would have meant a war of indefinite duration and extent with China. It was this risk that President Truman and the Western powers refused to take.

DULLES AND THE JAPANESE PACT

(By Marquis Childs)

NEW IMPORTANCE

A few hours after the dramatic White House announcement of General MacArthur's dismissal, President Truman summoned John Foster Dulles from the State Department. The President told Dulles he wanted him to go to Japan immediately to push as hard as possible for a peace treaty with the Japanese.

Behind the urgency of this request was a deep concern over Japanese reaction to MacArthur's removal. If it was a shock in this country, it exploded with the force of a bombshell in Japan and particularly among middle- and upper-class groups that have looked to America for protection from communism and for economic stability.

The reaction has in fact been far more serious, according to confidential reports to Washington, than the news has indicated.

The Japs have traditionally bowed to authority and General MacArthur had become a kind of second emperor; a symbol of power and security. It was ever feared that the government of Premier Yoshida might fall as a consequence of the news.

After Dulles had heard the President outline this newest mission to Japan, he hesitated for a moment. Both men seated in the quiet of the President's oval study were aware of the extreme difficulty and gravity of the assignment. In the vacuum left by MacArthur's departure a multitude of problems, both military and diplomatic, would have to be solved.

Dulles replied that he was willing to go but he wanted to be reassured that there was no change in American policy with respect to Japan and the Far East. In pushing for a peace treaty at the earliest opportunity, he has been determined not to permit Russian obstructionism to stand in the way of a settlement. He does not believe, as the British seem to, that Communist China should be permitted to take part in decisions on the treaty.

The President responded with great earnestness. He said there was no change whatsoever in the basic policy of the American Government. He gave his special ambassador full power to proceed with a Japanese treaty along the lines he has been following.

In the way in which he has proceeded to try to bring order and stability in the Pacific through a union of non-Communist powers, including Japan, Dulles has given one of the few examples of constructive statesmanship in the postwar world. Secretary of State Acheson gave his Republican adviser virtually a free hand on Japan. And instead of waiting to react against Communist action, as has happened more often than not in other parts of the world, Dulles has gone ahead with a constructive program intended to integrate Japan into the society of free nations not later than the end of this year.

This is the third time in less than 9 months that Dulles has made the long and wearying flight to Tokyo. He was at MacArthur's headquarters when the North Korean Communists launched their attack on the South Korean Republic last June. Returning to America, he expressed the belief that the United Nations would meet aggression with force.

His second trip began shortly after the first of this year. Five weeks were spent in laying the groundwork for a Japanese treaty and a possible future Pacific defense pact with all the nations involved. Besides Japan, Dulles visited Australia, New Zealand, and the Philippines. He expressed the hope at the end of his tour that a treaty might be concluded not later than midsummer.

If he had permitted political considerations to sway him, Dulles might have hesitated about going on this third assignment for another reason. He went into the State Department at the request of his good friend, Senator ARTHUR VANDENBERG, of Michigan. The ailing VANDENBERG made it a specific condition of a continuing bipartisan approach to foreign policy that Dulles be made one of Acheson's chief advisers. Several other Republican names had been suggested, after Dulles' bitter and unsuccessful contest with HERBERT LEHMAN for the New York Senate seat in the fall of 1949, but VANDENBERG insisted on Dulles.

Now, however, extremists in Dulles' party are out to destroy anyone who tries to work with the administration toward a constructive foreign policy. Dulles knew that the attacks would be tripled and quadrupled in the context of the MacArthur controversy. Yet he went—and he went, in my opinion, because he has a deep sense of responsibility in a world torn with dissensions that threaten utter destruction.

It sometimes seems as though the extremists here at home were perfectly willing to bring on this destruction. If only they can heap the blame on Truman and Acheson, they seem ready and even eager to embrace any calamity. And correspondingly they vilify any and all, regardless of party or conviction, who work constructively for stability.

CHURCHILL ON WAR

We'll let the man who woke up this country to the Soviet menace with his Fulton, Mo., speech of March 1946, Winston Churchill, write an editorial for us today, with a reprint of a passage from his The Gathering Storm. Says this modern man of war, in some reflections about Munich:

"Those who are prone by temperament and character to seek sharp and clear-cut solutions of difficult and obscure problems, who are ready to fight whenever some challenge comes from a foreign power, have not always been right. On the other hand, those whose inclination is to bow their heads, to seek patiently and faithfully for peaceful compromise, are not always wrong. On the contrary, in the majority of instances they may be right, not only morally but from a practical standpoint. How many wars have been averted by patience and persisting good will. Religion and virtue alike lend their sanctions to meekness and humility, not only between men but between nations. How many wars have been precipitated by firebrands. How many misunderstandings which led to wars could have been removed by temporizing. How often have countries fought cruel wars and then after a few years of peace found themselves not only friends but allies.

"The Sermon on the Mount is the last word in Christian ethics. Everyone respects the Quakers. Still, it is not on these terms that ministers assume their responsibilities of guiding states. Their duty is first so to deal with other nations as to avoid strife and war and to eschew aggression in all its forms, whether for nationalistic or ideological objects. But the safety of the state, the lives and freedom of their own fellow countrymen, to whom they owe their position, make it right and imperative in the last resort, or when a final and definite conviction has been reached, that the use of force should not be excluded. If the circumstances are such as to warrant it, force may be used.

"And if this be so, it should be used under the conditions which are most favorable. There is no merit in putting off a war for a year if, when it comes, it is a far worse war or one much harder to win. These are the tormenting dilemmas upon which mankind has throughout its history been so frequently impaled. Final judgment upon them can only be recorded by history in relation to the facts of the case as known to the parties at the time, and also as subsequently proved."

Great Man Fired for Standing by America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Port Jervis Union Gazette on the only topic the American people are interested in—the so-called firing of General MacArthur:

GREAT MAN FIRED FOR STANDING BY AMERICA

To say that most Americans were astounded this morning on learning that the President had fired General MacArthur from four or five big jobs, is putting it mildly, although this action had been foreseen for some time. It was long known that the man on the spot was having trouble trying to get the Truman, Acheson, Hiss-loving crowd at the White House to really see what was needed if the UN (mostly American) forces were to be kept from annihilation in the Far East.

Ever since General Marshall advocated the selling of the Chiang Nationalists down the river and thus letting the Reds, backed by Russia, take over the celestial millions, it has been known that little was to be done to save the Far East from communism. Of course the little police action in Korea could be fought by a few thousand soldiers, and let China be overrun if necessary.

There must be joy as well as Joe at the Kremlin today, for even Joe himself could not have won a bigger victory for himself than the UN, mostly British and French, have won for him. It will eventually turn out to have been another Yalta or Potsdam.

While we have been shelling out money to protect and save Europe, we have been sending men over to Korea, and although MacArthur has continually asked for more men and munitions and quick help, the White House has listened to the Europeans and given what they wished, letting the Far East sink deeper into Red hands.

Just what caused the sudden midnight action at the White House may never be known by the general public until years later. The American people want to know what sort of shenanigans have been going on lately, and if the United States is again to be the sucker for someone else. The man who likes to talk of hitting people on the nose has a real problem facing him.

Our candidate for the Presidency next year is a man named MacArthur. America needs him, and he is now free.

General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, the great New York Times, on Sunday, April 15, ran the following weekly summary of the dispute occasioned by the dismissal of General MacArthur:

GREATER DEBATE ON MACARTHUR AND POLICY

The great debate—which had ended the week before with Congress' endorsement of the dispatch of American troops to defend Europe—was succeeded last week by the "greater debate." It was touched off by one of the most dramatic incidents in American history.

On Tuesday General of the Army Douglas MacArthur, 71, held the offices of Supreme Commander, United Nations Forces in Korea; Supreme Commander for Allied Powers, Japan; Commander in Chief, Far East.

On Wednesday Douglas MacArthur was a general without a command. His President and Commander in Chief, Harry S. Truman, had dismissed him for insubordination, for openly and repeatedly clashing with the administration on basic matters of foreign policy.

The dismissal of General MacArthur brought into acute focus three issues:

1. The issue of the President's use of his constitutional authority to maintain civilian supremacy over the military.

2. The issue of where to concentrate the west's power in the world struggle against communism—in Europe or in Asia.

3. The issue of whether to keep fighting a limited war in Korea or to take the risk of a big war in trying to force a decision against the Chinese Communists.

The debate over these issues came immediately. In many parts of the Nation there was an outcry of protest against the MacArthur ouster. President Truman went on the air to explain his position to the people. Leading Republicans, hotly denouncing him, flung down a challenge to the fundamentals of the administration's foreign policy.

This week the debate moves into a spectacular phase. General MacArthur returns to set foot on the soil of the continental United States for the first time in 14 years.

THE BACKGROUND

Douglas MacArthur had from his youth a feeling that he was to be a man of destiny, that in Shakespeare's words, he was "not born to sue, but to command." He was graduated from West Point with the highest 4-year average (98.14) in history; he was the youngest division commander in France in World War I; then the youngest Chief of Staff; then youngest four-star general since Grant. In World War II, in his sixties, he led 11 landings personally.

His theatrical flair caught the imagination (his famous statement upon landing at Leyte in 1944, "I have returned. By the Grace of Almighty God, our forces stand again on Philippine soil. * * * Rally to me. * * * Let no heart be faint"). His imperious manner rubbed many people the wrong way. His communiqués referred to "my air force," "my navy." Yet even his critics, after an interview with him, would come away impressed by his personality. In the Japanese occupation headquarters in Tokyo General MacArthur was surrounded by aides who almost idolized him. In his office in Tokyo's Dai Ichi building hung the framed story of a Roman general who said, "We shall pay no attention to any counsel but such as shall be framed within our camp."

CHAPTERS OF DISPUTE

The direct controversy between General MacArthur and President Truman took the form of a long series of disputes. Some are public knowledge; others are recorded in documents that are still in secret files.

These were outstanding chapters in the controversy:

Chapter I took place when the Korean War was in its beachhead phase. There were reports of Chinese Communist divisions massing in Manchuria. A prime concern of the administration was to keep Communist China, if possible, from intervening in the war. In August General MacArthur sent a statement to an encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars in Chicago. He recommended strongly that the United States hold on to Formosa—the sanctuary of Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalist Government—as a base vital to American security in the Pacific. President Truman saw an advance copy of the statement; he ordered it withdrawn but it got into print anyway. Then the President, in a fireside chat, said: "We do not want Formosa or any part of Asia for ourselves. We believe that the future of Formosa * * * should be settled peaceably * * * by international action."

Chapter II took place when the UN troops—ordered into an "end-the-war" offensive by General MacArthur—were sent reeling back by Chinese Communist forces in North Korea. There were hurried and delicate negotiations between the United States and its Allies on what to do about the Chinese aggression. The decision was to fight on but to leave the door open to negotiations with Communist China. On December 1 General MacArthur said that because he was not given authority to bomb Communist China, he faced "an enormous handicap, without precedent in military history." On December 6 the Joint Chiefs of Staff sent to General MacArthur copies of a Presidential memo applying to officials of the executive branch. It said: "No speech, press release, or other public statement concerning foreign policy should be released until it has received clearance from the Department of State; no [such statement] concerning military policy should be released until it has received clearance from the Department of Defense."

Chapter III took place during the UN's attrition offensive—the offensive that slowly pushed the Chinese Communists back toward parallel 38. Intelligence reports had it that the Chinese Communists were massing in North Kora and Manchuria for a big push. Fourteen UN countries with troops fighting in Korea were working on a restatement of their aims. They hoped that Mao Tse-tung could be induced to reconsider the refusals he had made in the past to UN truce proposals.

On March 20 the Joint Chiefs of Staff sent General MacArthur a message which said: "State planning Presidential announcement shortly that, with clearing of bulk of South Korea of aggressors, United Nations now prepared to discuss conditions of settlement in Korea."

Four days later General MacArthur, without consulting Washington, offered to meet on the field of battle with the Chinese Communist military commander and talk truce. He coupled the offer with an implied threat. He said: "The enemy must * * * be painfully aware that a decision of the United Nations to depart from its tolerant effort to contain the war to the area of Korea through expansion of our military operations to his coastal areas and interior bases would doom Red China * * *."

TRUMAN WAS FURIOUS

The MacArthur statement caused dismay and anger at the UN and in Washington. President Truman was described by his intimates as furious. At his direction the Joint Chiefs of Staff sent General MacArthur a message sternly recalling the December 6 document advising him and all other commanders to steer away from foreign and military policy statements until they had been cleared by Washington.

Chapter IV opened at 3:04 p. m., Thursday, April 5. A news ticker in a White House office tapped out a bulletin from Capitol Hill reporting that House Republican JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., had read in Congress a letter from General MacArthur calling for a new United States foreign policy: The landing of Chiang Kai-shek's Formosa-based troops on the mainland to open a second front against the Chinese Communists and the concentration of power in Asia rather than Europe. There followed quickly additional bulletins, and the text of the general's letter, which read, in part: "It seems strangely difficult for some to realize that here in Asia is where the Communist conspirators have elected to make their play for global conquest, and that we have joined the issue thus raised on the battlefield; that here we fight Europe's war with arms while the diplomats there still fight it with words."

An assistant White House press secretary tore the yellow sheet of copy from the ticker and within minutes handed it to the President. Mr. Truman read it quickly. Then and there he made up his mind:

MacArthur must go.

For 5 days after reaching his decision—alone—President Truman weighed the best way to carry it out, the question of who should succeed General MacArthur, and the timing of the announcement. Only a very few, through those days, knew that he had made up his mind. It was one of the best-kept secrets in Washington history.

On April 6, a week ago Friday, at the close of a Cabinet meeting, Mr. Truman asked Defense Secretary George C. Marshall and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Omar Bradley to stay behind. The President informed them of the decision. The machinery for the dismissal of General MacArthur was set in motion.

Such was the prelude to the high drama of last week.

WEEK OF DRAMA

Over last week-end there grew in Washington a feeling that something was up. The scuttlebut was that Mr. Truman probably would deliver a direct rebuke to General MacArthur, but nothing more.

On Monday the President met with his congressional leaders. The question of General MacArthur came up. But even then he did not make it quite clear that he had reached an irrevocable decision.

On Tuesday morning Mr. Truman ordered the assembly of documentary material for the order dismissing General MacArthur. A small group, including General Bradley, Assistant Secretary of State Dean Rusk, Matthew Connelly, Secretary to the President, and Joseph Short, White House Press Secretary, started to work in the Cabinet room. At around 10 p. m. they went to Blair House with the assembled documents. The President approved the papers with a few changes.

UPROAR ANTICIPATED

At this Blair House meeting there was discussion of probable reaction. The conferees figured—accurately—that there would be an uproar in Congress and that the first response from the public would be adverse. But the President said: "If your decision is right you must go ahead with it even if you know there will be a storm of disapproval. If you are right," he said, "the American people will in time support you."

That evening the White House correspondents went home at the usual time. At midnight telephone calls from the White House routed them out of bed; they were summoned to a press conference. At 12:05 a. m. Wednesday, the Associated Press sent out this alert to papers throughout the country:

"EDITORS: The White House has called in reporters for an announcement at 1 a. m. eastern standard time. There is no indication of the subject matter."

At 1 a. m. Press Secretary Short greeted 50 sleepy-eyed reporters. The President had already gone to bed. The conference lasted 5 minutes. Mr. Short read out the Presidential statement. It said:

"With deep regret I have concluded that General of the Army Douglas MacArthur is unable to give his wholehearted support to the policies of the United States Government and of the United Nations in matters pertaining to his official duties. * * * I have decided that I must make a change of command in the Far East. I have, therefore, relieved General MacArthur of his commands and have designated Lieut. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway as his successor."

At the same time an order went out from Secretary Marshall to General Ridgway, notifying him of his promotion and of his replacement as Eighth Army commander by Lt. Gen. James A. Van Fleet.

It was 3 p. m. in Tokyo. At his American Embassy residence, General MacArthur had just finished luncheon with friends. An aide delivered a brown envelope marked "Flash." Inside was the dismissal notice from President Truman. General MacArthur did not change expression as he read it.

MAC ARTHUR'S STAFF INCENSED

His aides showed hot anger at the news. One, reading the order, which gave the general authority "to have issued such orders as are necessary to complete desired travel to such place as you select," said bitterly, "Why didn't Truman say 'To Elba'?"

The news reached General Ridgway at a command post near the Korean battle front where he was escorting Secretary of the Army Frank Pace, Jr., on an inspection tour. The general said, "This thing just hit me." The next day he and Mr. Pace flew to Tokyo for a talk with General MacArthur. General Van Fleet was in Florida when he got word of his new assignment; he flew immediately to Washington and from there to Korea.

By mid-Wednesday the reaction in the United States to Mr. Truman's bold decision was boiling up. The volume of protest was extraordinary. Letters, telegrams, and telephone calls by the tens of thousands poured into the White House, congressional offices, and newspapers. Across the country demonstrators carried signs saying, "Oust Truman" and "Out with Acheson." In at least one town, in California, the President was burned in effigy.

In Washington, House and Senate Republican leaders held a tense strategy conference. During the meeting Representative MARTIN telephoned Tokyo and spoke to a MacArthur aide. Afterward he announced that the GOP would move to have General MacArthur invited to address a joint session of Congress. "Impeachments," he said, had been "discussed." In using the plural he apparently had both Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson in mind.

At the same time the President's staff was hastily drafting a radio and television address to state his case to the public. Mr. Truman delivered it at 10:30 p. m.

By Thursday General MacArthur was packing for his homeward journey. In the United States it was announced that he had accepted a job as an official for Remington-Rand, Inc. In a speech in New York that night Senator ROBERT A. TAFT served notice that the main line of Republican attack on the President will be the charge that General MacArthur's dismissal means appeasement of communism in the Far East.

INVITATION BY CONGRESS

On Friday decisions were made for a full inquiry into the dispute. The Democrats cleared the way for an official invitation for General MacArthur to address the Members of Congress. Mr. Truman announced he was "happy" that Congress planned to "bestow this honor" on the general. At the same time the Senate Armed Services Committee voted unanimously to investigate General MacArthur's dismissal and invited him to be one of the first witnesses.

In New York Mayor Impellitteri announced that the city would honor the general with the traditional ticker-tape parade and ceremonies accorded returning heroes and special visitors. The major cabled the general the invitation along with New York's cordial greetings.

Yesterday from Tokyo, General MacArthur cabled his acceptance and said he would arrive in New York this Thursday. He also notified the Senate Armed Services Committee he thought it inappropriate for him to appear as a committee witness while Congress was considering the invitation to him to address Congress as a whole. He said he wanted to talk to Congress in general terms.

THE ISSUES

Out of the events of the week there emerged sharply the three issues of the greater debate.

As for the first issue—the employment of the President's authority over his military commander—these views have been set out: Some said that it was the politicians who had encroached on General MacArthur's realm, and not he on the politicians. This school feels that the general knows far more about the true situation in the Orient than anyone in Washington. But on the other side was the traditional argument that in a democracy, the soldier—as General Eisenhower said—"accepts certain inhibitions" when he puts on the uniform. His job is to carry out policy, and his views on what it should be must be conveyed through channels and not voiced in public.

As for the second issue—whether to concentrate on Europe or Asia—these are the main arguments: Those who hold the MacArthur view believe world war III has already started, that the Russians have chosen Asia as their battlefield, that a fight to a decision must be pressed against Communist China. On the other side are those who argue that Western Europe, with its industries, is the prime Russian target. They say that the Kremlin would like nothing better than to have the west's major forces committed in Asia, leaving the Russians free to move into the vacuum in Europe. This school believes a world war may still be avoided if the West builds strong enough forces in Europe to make aggression costly.

As for the third issue—policy on the Korean war—these are the conflicting positions: General MacArthur and his supporters hold that the only way to avoid an endless and bloody stalemate is to bomb Chinese bases and land Chiang Kai-shek's troops on the mainland. The administration school says this would lead Peiping to invoke the Sino-Soviet mutual-aid pact, the Russians might come in, and world war III would be on. The UN's job, this group argues, is to halt the aggressor, and then try to get a negotiated peace.

We Have a Better Answer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. McGUIRE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include in the RECORD the prize-winning oration for boys by Gerald Ottenheimer, of Georgetown Prep, in the twentieth annual oratorical contest sponsored by the Catholic University Conference of Clerics and Religious held at the Catholic University Gymnasium on April 15. The judges of this contest were my charming colleague, the Honorable Edna F. Kelley, of the Tenth New York Congressional District, the Honorable Stephen Jackson, from the Department of Defense, and the Honorable Edward A. Tamm, judge of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, and I had the honor to be the presiding chairman:

WE HAVE A BETTER ANSWER

Just recently we were offered the strange, sad picture of a United States Senator weeping over the Nation, weeping over the decay of morals which is eating at the vitals of the country he loves. Strange, this picture? Yes; for when have we ever seen the like before? Sad? Yes; because there are so few who realize the conditions that bring tears to his eyes. Although he may not have known it, the Senator was weeping over a condition brought about by the two great demigods of the twentieth century, the Divinity of the Dollar and the Goddess of Sense Satisfaction.

Let us consider what the first demigod has given us. When a student athlete betrays his college for the tinkle of a coin, when a California orange grower doubles his prices after a hurricane in Florida and calls it the law of supply and demand, when a sewer rat pollutes the souls of innocent children by peddling dope, when a quisling betrays his democratic nation to an atheistic tyrant, and worst of all, when the Christian population is so unconcerned that well it may be said of it—it fiddles while Rome burns—then, perhaps, the Senator has some cause to weep.

The second demigod is sense satisfaction. The warped mind that constantly craves to gratify every whim of passion is like the maddened vulture that gnawed out Titius' liver time and time again. When purity is flayed alive and sex becomes a science, when the blessings of a family are neglected for the purchase of a Cadillac, when the bond of marriage is regarded as a temporary spree, when the filth of a pagan feast is portrayed behind the colorful jacket of a best seller, then, perhaps, the Senator has reason to weep.

But, fellow students, is weeping the answer? Is that all we are going to do? No; we know better than that. We know that our religion is a brave optimism that hopes in man because it believes in God. What are we going to do? We will fulfill our responsibilities by living as best we know how in the mystical body of Christ. For the mystical body is at the heart of all true Catholic action. I shall give three ways by which, I think, we students may really live in the mystical body of Christ.

First, we must realize that the sacrifice of the Mass is not just a Sunday morning prayer meeting where we donate a quarter and ardently hope that Father won't talk too long. It is not a devotion at which we take a merely passive interest in the age-old drama being enacted on the altar. But it is a living sacrifice in which we, the congregation, the priest, and Christ, offer the divine victim to God. Remember that at every moment, somewhere throughout the world, a sanctus bell chimes, a ray of light in all the darkness, and the faithful offer God to God.

But, fellow students, this is attending Mass; we must live the Mass. Look at the motley crew at the first sacrifice—Calvary. He died for them. Some of us are not even willing to live with them. We must not grade a man on the color of his skin but by the metal of his soul. We must think, pray, and live in the plural of we, us, our, and not in the narrow selfish—I, my, mine. This, fellow students, is living the Mass.

Our second responsibility is expressed in the words of St. Ignatius, "Age quod agis"—"Do what you are doing." At present our task is to get an education. Each man's soul is a container ranging in size from a thimble to a 500-gallon tank; our task is to fill that container. Some of us are thimbles, some tanks, and the fortunate are just middle-sized buckets. But remember that the full thimble is more precious to Christ than the half-filled tank.

By constant application to study we shall train ourselves so that one day Catholic truth and Catholic ideals may penetrate every corridor of life. We have enough so-called great men on whose tombstone could well be inscribed:

"Here lie the bones of Dr. Smythe,
He knew everything but the purpose of life."

We must prepare ourselves so that in the silently approaching future we are capable of fulfilling our mission—spreading and preaching Catholic action—as a lawyer, doctor, housewife, janitor, or farmer—the love and knowledge of Christ are needed everywhere. Well might we keep in mind the old words, "Learn as if you were to live always."

Our third obligation is to resist the temptations of these twentieth century demigods—the dollar bill and sense satisfaction.

A 32-inch television screen, a flashy sport coat, a souped-up hot rod, these are all very flattering to our ego. And a peacock-feathered hat, provided the feather be long enough, might possibly help us brush the gates of heaven, but it will never open them. For money is a means, not an end. If we use it to gain our heavenly goal, it is one of the greatest gifts we have. However if we use it merely to fill our wardrobe or our stomach, it were better we never owned a cent. We must not succumb to that modern heresy that the dollar is divine but must place our capital in the bank of Heaven—there will be no crash there.

The second demi-god is sense satisfaction. The sixth and ninth commandments were never so ignored as they are today. If we follow the maxim of eat, drink and be merry, it is not tomorrow we die—we are already dead. Will we trade in the peaceful quiet behind the sanctuary lamp for the voluptuous gaiety behind the neon one? Are we to exchange the majestic harmony of the liturgical chant for the impassioned downbeat of night club jazz? Will we, can we abandon the blue veil of Our Lady's purity for the black rags of modern vice?

Fellow students, you and only you can answer these questions. There is no middle road. For—

"To every man there opens
A high way and a low;
And some take the high way
And some men take the low;
And in between on the misty flats
The crowd moves to and fro.
But to every man there opens
A high way and a low;
And you must choose the way
You want your soul to go."

HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, may I direct attention of the House to two thought-provoking columns in the Washington Post of Sunday, April 15; one by Mr. Andre Visson, and one by Mr. Stewart Alsop:

[From the Washington Post of April 15, 1951]

DIVISION OVER MACARTHUR

(By Andre Visson)

QUESTION OF STRATEGY

The dramatic dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur has stirred up such violent emotions that it has become almost impossible to analyze the sensational developments calmly and objectively. This, however, must be done if we want to evaluate its political impact on the future of this country and of the free world.

The first, natural reaction of the people in this country was to approach the MacArthur drama on either a partisan or human level. This was perhaps inevitable, since MacArthur and Truman are both standard-bearers of their respective parties. Moreover, MacArthur is one of the most striking personalities of our time.

Other great American generals—Eisenhower, Marshall, Bradley—are both leaders and common Americans. MacArthur is the only general—the only living American—who for millions of his countrymen has become the symbol of their Nation outside its borders. He is the only living American who has become the object of hero worship. He has been absent from this country for 15 years, but he has remained present in millions of American hearts.

His personality has many typically American characteristics. He is bold, fighting, uncompromising, impatient, and has an exceptional penchant for drama. All this, added to his striking physical appearance, has made him the great national hero. And if his military prestige has been somewhat impaired by the defeat at the Yalu River last November, following the imprudent announcement attributed to him that the boys would be "back for Christmas," he has now probably acquired the new prestige of a martyr.

All men of outstanding personality who cannot find their place in the conventional structure of modern society inevitably become controversial figures. France recently had a similar experience with General de Gaulle, and in the late nineteenth century with General Boulanger. But it is especially unfortunate when such men divide their nation as deeply as General MacArthur has done.

All thinking, patriotic Americans, whether Democrats or Republicans, are extremely unhappy over this division. But as human beings they find it hard to control their emotions. And when it comes to politics, they have a natural desire to turn this great national drama to their party's advantage.

The Democrats, even those who reproach President Truman for having waited until this dramatic denouncement became inevitable, are trying to present a united front in support of the President. The Republicans, even those who do not agree with all MacArthur's strategic conceptions, are trying to present a united front in support of MacArthur. But behind these human emotions and partisan passions are fundamental and vital issues. And these issues cannot be aproached on an emotional plane.

The first fundamental issue is the supremacy of the civilian over the military in the American democracy. On this point, the overwhelming majority of Americans, if they could make themselves forget that the "civilian" is Truman, and the "military" is MacArthur, would undoubtedly agree that "of course, in our democracy the military must be subordinate to civilian authority." This is the view not only of civilians, but of all great American military leaders.

The second fundamental issue is the kind of strategy best suited at the present time to American interests and American possibilities. Here the views are divided.

MacArthur's strategy has been stated by him both privately and publicly: the strategic priority of Asia; the strengthening and defense of Formosa; the use of the Chinese Nationalist forces; the blockade of China; the bombing of Manchuria and, if necessary, other Chinese provinces. In other words, MacArthur—and his strategic views are shared by a certain fraction of Republicans—sincerely believes that the struggle against communism should be decided in Asia, even at the risk of an all-out war with China, and if need be with Soviet Russia.

The strategy of the administration has been different. And it is necessary to emphasize that this is not Mr. Truman's personal strategy. It is the strategy worked out by both his political advisers in the State Department and his military advisers in the Pentagon. It can be summed up as follows: The strategic priority of Europe; the containment of Communist expansion everywhere; fighting Communist aggression wherever possible, but trying to avoid an all-out war until Western Europe is strong enough to resist, with American aid, a Communist attack. As for Formosa, the view of the Pentagon has been that in a war it should be denied to the enemy, but that it is not strategically vital enough to start a world war for it.

Since these two strategies are in opposition, the conflict was inevitable. President Truman has emphasized that General MacArthur was dismissed because his strategy could lead to a world war. It can be assumed that this risk has now been reduced. But for how long? The answer can be given only by the Kremlin. What will be the next Communist move? Now that they have conclusive evidence of our desire not to carry the war to China, will they be willing to work out a compromise? Or, feeling secure in Manchuria, will they not make a new move in Indochina—a much richer prize than Korea?

Western Europe is relieved by MacArthur's dismissal. But responsible circles in Washington have the unhappy feeling that the end of fighting in Asia is not yet in sight.

[From the Washington Post of April 15, 1951]

MATTER OF FACT

(By Stewart Alsop)

THE TIMING FAVORS MACARTHUR

It may well be that in choosing this particular time to dismiss General MacArthur, President Truman has chosen the best possible time—for MacArthur. It may even be that General MacArthur had just this in mind when he decided to force the issue. For it is clear that the outcome of the battle between the President and the general will be determined, in the end, not in Washington, but in Korea.

In dismissing MacArthur, President Truman has, of course, risked his political life. In the most unlikely event that the attempts to reach an acceptable settlement with the Chinese and their Soviet masters now succeed, and the fighting ends, Truman will enjoy a great historic triumph. If there is no settlement, but the expected Communist offensive is contained, the stalemate on the battlefield will be reflected in a stalemate between Truman and MacArthur.

But if the Communists again break through our lines; if this time the breakthrough is successfully exploited, and if our forces are seriously endangered, then disaster in Korea will be disaster also for Truman. For then the demand for attacking targets in China proper, for using Nationalist troops, and for fighting the war in Asia, which MacArthur wants, will become irresistible.

MacArthur will seem triumphantly vindicated, while Truman will appear the architect of national disaster. And as both Truman and MacArthur are certainly fully aware, the danger of a successful Communist offensive in Korea is now as great as it has ever been.

The best way to explain why the danger is now considered so serious is, oddly enough, to quote from a report cabled from Korea by this reporter's partner some months ago:

"The recurrent crises in the fighting here always took the form of a great hole being torn in our lines, and then being stopped by our mobile reserves being moved up before the walking enemy could exploit the break-through. But even two enemy intruder fighters, attacking the interminable lines of our transport * * * would have been enough to produce a 24-hour tangle. Then the holes in our line could not have been stopped in time. The break-throughs would then have been fully exploited. And we should have lost our foothold in Korea."

This pattern has held throughout the Korea fighting. Sheer weight of manpower has made possible numerous Communist breakthroughs, the most serious being the near-defeat after the Chinese intervention. But the Communist breakthroughs have never in the end been fully exploited, because the Communists have lacked sufficient heavy weapons and mobility, and above all because they have lacked any offensive air power at all.

That is why reports that the Chinese are for the first time receiving important quantities of heavy weapons and transport from Soviet Siberian stocks are taken with deadly seriousness by the Joint Chiefs of Staff. But what is taken even more seriously is the report that an offensive Communist air force is now being organized.

This force is believed to consist of about 500 Russian fighters and light bombers, manned by intensively trained Chinese and North Koreans. Such a force could not seriously challenge American air superiority. But given cloud cover during the Korean rainy season, and given the interdiction against attacking Manchurian bases, our Air Force cannot possibly prevent strafings and hit-and-run strikes behind our lines.

General Ridgway, who, rather than MacArthur, has actually been in full command of the United Nations forces in Korea for many weeks, is a brilliant field commander, and his troops are more battleworthy than ever before. Yet the danger of a successful enemy offensive is real, and it is a danger which might all but destroy President Truman, as Truman himself must know.

Infinitely more is at stake, of course, than the political fortunes of a Truman or a MacArthur. War, even a small war, has a sullen, imperious logic of its own. If an enemy offensive, supported by air power based in Manchuria, endangered our troops, the logic of war would demand the bombing of the Manchurian bases, however much Truman might wish to localize the conflict. This would logically lead in turn to the bombing of Chinese lines of communications, and cities. Then the Soviets would be forced to intervene openly, or accept the equivalent of an intolerable defeat.

Thus the logic of a small war leads to a great war. This logical progression toward world disaster cannot now be halted by Truman or MacArthur. It can be halted only if the men in the Kremlin decide to cut their losses in Korea, or if Ridgway and his men smash at the outset the offensive which is otherwise in prospect.

Post-Office Workers Should Get a Pay Raise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial which appeared in the April 12 issue of the Cleveland Press, entitled "Post-Office Workers Should Get a Pay Raise."

POST-OFFICE WORKERS SHOULD GET A PAY RAISE

Postal workers are organized into unions but don't have the right to strike because they're Federal employees.

When they want a pay raise they have to appeal to Congress. But they aren't a strong lobby in Washington. They aren't in a position to swing the vote in any key States.

So, unless public opinion is on their side, Congress is likely to pass them up.

The starting wage of the highest-paid post-office employee, a clerk or carrier, is $2,670 a year. After 9 years they get $3,670, and after another 15 years the top-grade worker can earn $3,970.

Despite the pension and security that go with the job, this pay isn't enough to attract, keep, or satisfy the intelligent, reliable kind of employee the post office needs.

Bills have been introduced in the Senate and House to give postal employees a raise. The underpaid workers shouldn't be the goats of the big argument over postal rates and the Department's deficit.

They don't have parity to protect them from climbing living costs. They need and deserve that wage boost.

The MacArthur Ouster

OF
HON. MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article appearing in the April 21 issue of America, national Catholic weekly, entitled "The MacArthur Ouster":

THE MACARTHUR OUSTER

From almost any angle you look at it, the storm now swirling around General MacArthur is deplorable. What remains of our national unity is in danger of being destroyed by the supercharged lightning flashes of emotion generated by personal and political partisanship. We discern but one hopeful ray in the lightning-riven clouds: If the controversy can be brought under control and carried on calmly on the basis of the issues involved, it may become the last great debate on United States foreign policy.

The one Herbert Hoover touched off 6 months ago, apparently settled by the Senate's troops-to-Europe resolution of April 4, dealt largely with our policy for Europe. Our far eastern policy, or lack of it, was not formally debated in the Senate. The MacArthur incident, for better or worse, has made such a discussion inevitable. We can only hope that it will be productive of a renewed national unity.

Already as Walter Lippmann observed in the curious case of Senator TAFT, there is confusion as to what General MacArthur meant in his now celebrated letter to Congressman MARTIN. The general, as the columnist pointed out, wanted more than permission to bomb Red China's Manchurian bases and to use the Formosa forces of Chiang Kai-shek against the Chinese mainland. The general wanted permission to wage all-out war against China. Contending that the global conflict with communism has already begun, the general argued that it could be won by defeating Red China. The way to save Europe, he wrote in effect, is to defeat communism in Asia.

That involves an almost complete reversal of our present policy. The United States and its allies have long since decided to concentrate on Europe while diverting the necessary minimum to prevent a Communist sweep in Asia. The fundamental issue is therefore clear-cut. Shall the United States abandon its present efforts to safeguard Europe and devote its resources chiefly to a full-scale war with Red China?

Those who join General MacArthur in an affirmative answer to this fateful question should not overlook these considerations:

1. If we decide to join the issue in Asia, we shall have to go it alone—our Atlantic allies, the Asian-Arab nations and the Latin-Americans will not support us.

2. Attacking China in the belief the U. S. S. R. will not come to her aid is not a calculated risk—it is the widest sort of gamble.

3. Our big strategic bombers, on which we now rely to deter Russia in the west, will be relatively ineffective in China. If we contemplate using them for atomic bombing, let us reflect that such bombing would have little military value, would infuriate all Asia and might invite Russian retaliation. Thus there is no hope of a short and cheap war.

4. Our long-neglected tactical air force is still woefully unready for a major conflict.

5. Even if Russia did not intervene in China, she would be powerfully tempted to take over an almost defenseless Europe, including Britain, acquiring thereby tremendous war-making potential.

6. If we tempt Russia into a war for which we are still unprepared offensively, we shall expose our people to destruction, since our home defense system, both military and civil, is pitifully incomplete.

7. As the President emphasized in his address to the Nation on April 11, our present policy is designed to avoid world war III. Though it may fail, it furnishes a hope lacking in the MacArthur approach.

If these considerations are put forcibly to the American people, we believe that the last great debate will not be prolonged as its predecessor was, and that our people, finally satisfied that we are on the only course open to us, will then settle down to the supreme task of ensuring their security.

From Where I Stand

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to call to the attention of my colleagues the following column written by Dr. Harry Halpern, which appeared in the April 6, 1951, Bulletin of the East Midwood Jewish Center. It speaks volumes:

FROM WHERE I STAND

As I descended the steps to the subway station, a man walked in front of me carrying a small valise and an overcoat slung across his arm. He fell and I helped him get up. He brushed his clothes and said, "Thank you. It's very nice of you." It needed only a brief look to realize that he was drunk. We waited for the train and he began to talk with the trace of an Irish accent. Obviously he was not a common drunk. With the typical loquaciousness of the inebriate, he told me his life's story. He had taught Latin as a young man and had served in World War I. His quotations in Latin were well chosen and correct.

"It doesn't matter," he said, "whether a man knows how to square X—Y, or whether he talks many languages. It's being human that counts. I'm drunk and I know it. Yet I'm a better man than some lousy guy who hates others because they're black or Jewish or Catholic or anything else. Picking up a man when he falls is the biggest thing in life." He went on and on.

Engrossed in the conversation, I, together with my "friend" boarded the wrong train. We sat down together. Just then a white-bearded Jew approached me. "Does this train go to Utica Avenue?" he asked. I answered him and he sat down near me. "I'm still green here," he said, "and I don't know my way around." My Irish acquaintance gazed upon this patriarchal Jew. He asked me to translate what he was saying. "You know," he said, "that fellow looks like a character out of the Bible."

The old Jew told me how much he admired America. Here in the subway he wasn't lost because he found someone who could speak Yiddish. From the other side of me came the incessant talk of the Latin teacher. "You must be a lawyer," he said. I asked him how he knew. "Well," he said, "if you were a teacher you'd be in school. If you were a physician you'd be carrying your tools. You're not a salesman because you're reading a book on philosophy. So you must be a lawyer." I didn't contradict him.

So we rode together, the Irishman, the old Jew, and I. At Borough Hall the gentleman carrying his valise got up with me, "I'm getting off here," he said, "and you must have a drink on me." I told him I was busy and bid him farewell.

Many people have tried to define the spirit of America. But here was a definition found in no dictionary. The bearded Jew, a son of Erin, and I—this is America, a place where, "picking up a man when he falls" is considered one of the great, if not the greatest thing in life.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, may I call attention of the House to the following excerpts from an article by the famous writer, Mr. Hanson W. Baldwin. The article appeared in the New York Times, Sunday, April 15.

I should also like to call attention to an editorial from the same edition entitled "The MacArthur Storm." The above-mentioned articles follow:

[From the New York Times of April 15, 1951]

GENERAL RIDGWAY TAKES OVER IN A CRITICAL SITUATION—ENEMY IS PREPARING A BIG OFFENSIVE AND JAPANESE PROBLEMS ARE PRESSING

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

In Japan itself, the MacArthur retirement is almost certain to mean major staff changes. The Bataan crowd that has been with General MacArthur so many years is likely to retire; one of the MacArthur stalwarts—Maj. Gen. Courtney Whitney, the general's political and government adviser and close confidant—is returning to the United States with MacArthur and already has applied for retirement. Another controversial figure on the staff, Maj. Gen. Charles A. Willoughby, intelligence officer, had been anxious to retire before the Korean War started, and is now almost certain to do so.

In addition to these and other extensive staff changes, there will be profound changes in methods with General Ridgway as the new Supreme Commander, Allied Powers, in Tokyo. General Ridgway is not a man to isolate and insulate himself, as did General MacArthur. MacArthur concerned himself only with the broadest problems of the occupation and our military policies; he rarely deviated from the beaten path between his Embassy quarters and the Dai Ichi Building; he had very few personal contacts with the Japanese (and only intermittent ones with others than those close to him on the staff) and he had little first-hand knowledge about Japan.

RIDGWAY'S JOB

Ridgway will want to see for himself; he will concern himself particularly with the maintenance of discipline and training in our military forces in Japan—standards which had fallen to a low ebb before Korea; and as a good disciplinarian, he will stamp out rackets and black marketing, which at periods and in places during the occupation flourished unchecked.

General Ridgway's designated relief in command of the Eighth Army, General Van Fleet, is an experienced division and corps commander from World War II, and he comes to Korea after postwar experience in Greece. This experience, where the general had to combine military knowledge with a hard-won appreciation of the intricacies of international and (Greek) domestic politics and of guerrilla warfare, should stand him in good stead in Korea, where both guerrillas and South Korean politics are major factors influencing the military campaign.

Staff changes under General Van Fleet in the Eighth Army are not likely to be major; the new commander will inherit the staff which supported the late Lt. Gen. Walton H. Walker and General Ridgway. There may be some slow infiltration of new blood, but not quickly.

SMOOTHER RELATIONSHIPS

The principal change will be in smoother command and staff relationships with Tokyo. In the MacArthur regime one man was king, and there were no crown princes. MacArthur's staff—and quite possibly the "Old Man" himself—were jealous of too much publicity focused on any of his major subordinates. Moreover, Tokyo knew that Ridgway was a "Pentagon man." Prior to his arrival, Tokyo had been running the Korean War from hundreds of miles away; after his arrival the consolidation of command in Korea and General Ridgway's own quiet forcefulness led to a greater concentration of control in Korea. Undercover friction had, therefore, existed between Tokyo and Korea—though probably not on the MacArthur-Ridgway level—and this will now be largely eliminated.

[From the New York Times of April 15, 1951]

THE MACARTHUR STORM

It is possible that by the time General MacArthur returns to the United States this week some of the initial fury of the storm raised by his dismissal will have blown itself out. From the standpoint of national unity in a time of grave trouble this is greatly to be desired. Calamity will have been added to the tragedy of the MacArthur case if high passion and partisan politics are permitted to turn this necessary disciplinary action into a national rift that cannot be closed in the face of danger. On the other hand, some good purpose will have been served if calm discussion of the really vital issues involved brings out a clearer policy in the United States and in the United Nations in respect to Korea and the rest of the Far East.

We believe that the majority of sober-minded Americans will agree that President Truman's action was justified in the light of the complete difference of opinion on Far Eastern policy between Washington and General MacArthur and the general's demonstrated unwillingness to accede to the decisions of his superiors. Those same Americans may not be willing to agree that the action finally taken by the President was inevitable from the start. They may quite properly hold that wiser courses of action, taken earlier, would have made this final step unnecessary.

Moreover, we believe that most Americans will be unimpressed by the shouts of delight coming from various parts of the world over the general's dismissal. There is, inevitably, the uneasy suspicion in this country that at least some of this expression of joy has arisen from a desire to follow an appeasement policy toward Red China and the knowledge that General MacArthur was adamantly opposed to that appeasement.

The members of the United Nations who have been sighing with relief over the general's recall can justify their attitude only if they take a strong position on the issues which are still before them. If, on the other hand, they use his departure as the occasion to promote fresh and further concessions to the aggressors whom they have named, Americans will be right in their suspicion of motives.

Some of the criticism of General MacArthur has been based on the assumption or misapprehension that it was his personality and his opinions, and those alone, that stood in the way of a prompt settlement of the Korean issues. There has been the repeated implication that once he was out of the way the Chinese Communists and their Russian masters would immediately be ready to sit down in reasonableness and agree to an honorable peace. There is little ground for this sort of optimism. The most recent military news from Korea, indeed, would point in exactly the opposite direction.

It takes two parties to make an agreement. It takes some measure of good will and some desire for peace on both sides to have peace. The United Nations has repeatedly affirmed its desire for peace and its essential good will. Thus far there has been no sign that these sentiments are reciprocated. It is difficult to see how General MacArthur's departure will bring that reciprocity into being.

It is plain, however, that the Chinese Communists are interpreting this action in the case of the general as a sign of weakness and confusion. Since they assume that we are weak and confused, we may expect that their attitude toward a settlement now will be at least as arrogant as it has been in the past. They will demand, as the price for their halting their military attack on the United Nations, that they be rewarded by the grant of the island of Formosa and honored by an invitation to membership in the organization that they have attacked.

The storm that has been raised will, of course, force a reexamination of our far-eastern policies. In that reexamination it will be well for the United States and the United Nations to remember that the choice of peace or war lies now, as it has previously, in hands other than ours. Clarification on that point may be one good thing to come out of the present unhappy situation.

Izaak Walton Director Endorses Hall Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, everybody knows the Izaak Walton League to be one of the foremost outdoor organizations in the country.

Therefore, support of the Hall bill, H. R. 3023, is materially strengthened with receipt of the following letter and resolution from the league's national director, Mr. Burton H. Atwood:

IZAAK WALTON LEAGUE OF AMERICA, INC.,
Winnetka, Ill., April 14, 1951.

Hon. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: May I offer my congratulations for the introduction of H. R. 3023. It is so important to the rights of citizens that it should receive wide support.

Enclosed is a copy of a resolution passed last week at the national convention of the Izaak Walton League. It steals some of your words because they so aptly describe the situation.

However, may I suggest that you give consideration to amending the bill to read "no citizen shall be required to register or license firearms. * * *" Such a change might prevent registration by the subterfuge of licensing.

Very truly yours,
BURTON H. ATWOOD,
National Director.

Resolution 6

Whereas our founding fathers wisely incorporated within the Constitution of the United States the inherent privilege of our citizens to protect their hearths and homes by possessing arms; and

Whereas in the several States the revival of tyranny is asserting itself in the form of proposals to register all legally owned weapons: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Izaak Walton League of America, Inc., in convention assembled at Cincinnati, Ohio, April 5–7, 1951, That no citizen shall be compelled to register, or license, legal firearms which he is in lawful possession of; and be it further

Resolved, That no Federal, State, or local officers shall have the power to seize firearms belonging to private citizens who legally possess and use them.

Are We a Nation of Dopes?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, it seems a tragic shame that Great Britain has been able for so many years, to dictate American foreign policy in the Far East.

The removal of General MacArthur from supreme command in the Pacific gives the Communists more cause for rejoicing than the abdication of the Mikado. Everybody knows MacArthur is the symbol of American strength in the Orient.

The British have long feared that MacArthur's program of winning the Korean war would sound the death knell to their flourishing opium trade. Six hundred million Chinese are addicted wholly, or in part, to the use of opium, because Lord Sassoon forced them into opium dens a century ago.

Hong Kong is the dope capital of the world and harbors the dregs of society, ruled over by a handful of little dictators.

The British have a secret deal with Communist China. The Red government will let Lord Sassoon sell his opium to the Chinese, if Britain will throw a monkey wrench into the MacArthur program of victory for America.

Is the United States to be a sovereign Government with an American policy toward the Commies without tthe British telling us to surrender to them? Or should we reenter the British sphere of influence and flood our own markets and submit our own people to the influence of Britain's billion dollar, going concern of opium peddling?

If we give up without a fight, we are a Nation of dopes, stupid from the pipe dreams of British opium clouds.

Farm Conditions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALLEN J. ELLENDER, SR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address I delivered before the annual convention of the National Independent Meat Packers' Association, at Chicago, Ill., April 6, 1951.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY SENATOR ALLEN J. ELLENDER, SR., CHAIRMAN OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY, BEFORE THE ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE NATIONAL INDEPENDENT MEAT PACKERS ASSOCIATION AT CHICAGO, ILL.

I am delighted and honored to meet with you in Chicago today. As independent meat packers you represent both a vital defense industry and an American ideal. Meat packing is essential to building national strength—the strength we must have to meet the challenge to our freedom—the strength we hope will lead to world peace. The American ideal is the free enterprise system under which your industry was made possible and under which it has prospered and developed.

Freedom to make our own decisions—by that I mean independence of thought and action—has been the cornerstone upon which we have built our great community. It was for this freedom that the signers of the Declaration of Independence mutually pledged their lives and the future of the Nation they created. Today we should all make the same pledge, to each other and to America.

Under this freedom our Nation has become great. Under this freedom our people enjoy the greatest blessings on earth. We are the best fed, the most adequately clothed and housed, and the least-governed people on earth. And we have reached such heights through the freedom of our private enterprise system, a system in which initiative is encouraged, not hampered, by government.

The very fact that we have achieved so much, places a tremendous responsibility on our shoulders. We have become the citadel of democracy. All the free peoples of the world look to us to help defend and nourish the freedom we cherish for ourselves and for them. But at least one group is out to destroy our way of life. Through brute force and by the instillation of fear, its leaders seek to stamp out the torch of freedom wherever it burns.

The liberty-loving people of the world should know that all we ask is that in the name of freedom the people of each country should be given the opportunity to have a government of their own free choice.

We all want peace. We are now enlarging our military force in the hope that by becoming strong we will deter further aggression, and as a result bring lasting peace. We hold membership in the United Nations because we believe this organization offers the best and perhaps the only way to peace. The United Nations is yet young and undernourished. It needs the solid food of confidence and trust amongst its members. I feel that our Nation has contributed its share of these. Would that other nations had done as well.

On Sunday, June 25, 1950, the Communist forces of North Korea crossed the thirty-eighth parallel. This open act of aggression challenged the very existence of the United Nations. If we backed down, which country might be next? Would we not be repeating the errors that preceded World War II? What of Manchuria, Ethiopia, and Poland? When do you put out a fire? Do you try to get it under control while it is small or wait until it is burning the roof over your head? We learned the answer the hard way, and a million American casualties will prove it.

The Korean situation may yet result in a blessing in disguise. It shocked us into the realization that the Communists are determined to stamp out the concept of freedom from the mind of man. It awakened us to our own weaknesses and pointed out sharply our basic unpreparedness. We had drifted into the old American brand of complacency and we were laying ourselves wide open to attack. Like Rip Van Winkle, we slumbered without realizing it. But now, finally awakened, we have set out to build our national strength, having learned that force is the only language understood in the Kremlin. We are a long way from being out of danger, but we are making exceptional progress. We are still confronted with the problem of some countries allied with us but continuing to supply Red China with war material. That must be stopped if the free peoples of the world are to prevail.

Even here in this country we are divided as to just how our strength should be used. When the decision was made to stand up to the Communists in Korea there was a shout of "bravo." "It's about time," was the comment everywhere. But a few months later, when reverses set us back, the doubters began to cry that we should never have gone into Korea. We should get out and come back home. Let the other freedom-loving people of the world stand by themselves. Let us violate the pledge made by the United Nations, they said.

If anyone can think of a better way to turn the world over to the Communists than by pulling out of Korea, I'd like to know what it is. The Kremlin expected us to follow the course advocated by the doubters.

All this hesitation and indecision gives just that much more encouragement to the aggressors. We should leave the question of deploying our military forces to military leaders. Check the list: Marshall, Eisenhower, Bradley, Collins, Sherman, Vandenberg, and many others. I have faith in them. They are men who have proved their worth. They led our troops to victory in World War II.

But we cannot stand alone. Other freedom-loving peoples should not expect us to carry the full load. They may not be able to do all that should be done, but if they will do their best, it is all we can ask of them.

I think we should stand up for what we believe to be right and let Russia know that we mean business. We must impress upon her that we are not going to permit further aggressive moves by her satellites. If we warn Russia that we will construe such moves as aggression by the Kremlin itself, then there is a good chance for peace. But backing up and compromising our position on the issues of freedom will only lead to further aggression.

It is indeed fortunate that we are entering this period of great emergency in a strong economic position. When the Korean trouble began last June, all of our major economic groups—agriculture, industry, and labor—were in a comparatively sound and healthy state. Industrial production was high and has since gone even higher, making it possible so far to not only supply our defense needs but at the same time produce an almost normal stream of consumer goods. Unemployment is on the wane.

Agriculture is in an exceptionally strong position. Financially, farmers are in good shape, despite a postwar decline in income, and they have the capital or can obtain it, to finance the increased production that is needed. Several years of intensive conservation programs have greatly strengthened the Nation's farm economy, and the reserves in the soil are bolstered by substantial reserves in our granaries. These grain reserves have been a godsend. They are the direct result of the price-support provisions of the farm program, provisions that have enabled us to store for later use a supply of our basic commodities produced over and above immediate needs.

But we must not take this agricultural strength for granted. You who process meat have a direct stake in the ability of agriculture to produce and to prosper. Not so long ago I had an opportunity to visit the Middle East, and what I saw there made a deep impression on me. Centuries ago the people who lived along the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers undoubtedly felt that nothing could disrupt their agricultural productivity. How wrong they were. And how poor their economy eventually became is apparent throughout the area—and all because of the loss of soil fertility. An area that once supported 25 or 30 million people now gives a bare existence to a scant 3,000,000. Some historians say that ancient Persia could at one time support agriculturally an estimated 105,000,000 people. Now, at most, not over 15,000,000 exist there. Proper conservation practices could have averted this catastrophe.

Surely this experience of an older nation holds a striking lesson for our own people. We cannot take our great heritage of rich soil for granted. It is the basic source of our national strength. The rich and productive soil provides the tremendous quantities of all varieties of food and fiber that are so vital to our existence. We must take all necessary steps to insure its continued productivity.

And right now in our whole agricultural picture, nothing is more important than a continued high level of production of the commodity that you deal in—meat. Meat is the basic ingredient of our Nation's diet. It provides essential quantities of the protein, fat, iron, thiamin, and other important dietary items that make up our high standard of living. Your industry—the packing industry—is a vital link in the chain of our meat supply. It performs the service of processing and moving large quantities of meat on its way to the consumer.

In addition to this, your industry supplies byproducts that are vitally needed, and which today—in this time of emergency—are doubly important. Insulin, for example, the drug that means life to a half million diabetics, comes from meat animals. I was surprised to learn—as even some of you may be—that it requires 20,000 animals to produce 1 pound of this life-saving drug. In addition to insulin, the new healer, ACTH, and scores of other life-giving pharmaceuticals are obtained from various glands of meat animals. From facts such as these, the public can obtain some slight conception of the importance of even this secondary aspect of your industry.

The pituitary glands from 400,000 hogs are required to provide 1 pound of ACTH. Nor does the contribution of the pig, the steer, and the sheep, to our welfare end with a constant flow of these vital miracle drugs from the packer. All of us, in our everyday life, are in almost continuous contact with such well-known products as lard, leather, soaps, gelatin, glycerin, tallow, casings, and fertilizer—which are derived through the packers' operations.

Yes; yours is a great industry—one that has made and will continue to make a great contribution to our country's welfare.

I might add, incidentally, that my own interest in your industry goes back many years. As a young lawyer, in my first trip out through the country, just before World War I, I visited packing plants in Chicago and saw at first hand the operations of these plants as they were carried out at that time. Even before this, as a college student, I worked as a harvest hand in the wheat fields of Oklahoma and other States to the north. I remember my interest in the livestock yards and packing plants at Omaha, and I have a vivid recollection of the large herds of cattle that roamed the ranges of the great cattle States. I have not lost that early and basic interest in this phase of agriculture, and as chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I find that these early experiences give me a better perspective on the varied problems that concern our great agricultural Nation.

One thing that we have learned over the years is that more income in the hands of more and more people means more and more money spent for food. Meat, perhaps to a greater extent than any other agricultural commodity, is directly affected by increased spending power. People will buy meat and more meat if they have the wherewithal to do so. They are buying larger quantities of meat now than 10 years ago, because buying power has been given to millions who, not too many years back, were among the unemployed. Our national buying power has been spread out, and these new income earners are all potential customers for meat. As they get regular work and regular incomes, the demand for meat increases.

The result of all this is that even an estimated 148 pounds of meat available per capita this year will not be enough to prevent inflationary pressures from developing. This means that production must be raised to even higher levels. What is needed is the maximum production of meat animals consistent with available feed and forage supplies.

Fortunately, we have large reserves of grain, particularly corn, that are providing feed for livestock. But we must look ahead to future years, and statistics show that we are currently using up our feeds at a faster rate than we are producing them. To meet this situation, the United States Department of Agriculture is urging farmers to do everything possible to increase corn production this year, and so provide the increased feed supplies that are essential for our meat, dairy, and poultry industries.

As a further step toward bringing feed supplies into better balance with needed livestock production, we must also do everything possible to husband the feed supplies now on hand. Making the most efficient use of these feed supplies is important to all of us. It is important to you as processors because I know that you would be the first to recognize the hardship of a forced liquidation of livestock, brought on by a feed shortage. We must do everything we can to prevent that.

Because production of livestock is vitally important, nothing should be allowed to interfere with it. I have opposed price ceilings on livestock for this reason. I believe that if price ceilings on agricultural commodities are necessary to fight inflation, they should be imposed as near the final product as possible. Any action taken that would result in lowered meat production will come back to haunt us a hundredfold.

I am basically opposed to ceilings on any raw agricultural product when we need increased production. Increased production in itself will solve the problem in time. That can be attained, provided we do not shackle incentive by restrictive regulations. A price ceiling tends to offset incentive, and should be avoided as long as there are other and safer ways of achieving the same effect in fighting inflation. I might add—for your information—that when the time comes to renew the current defense production authority, I intend to take steps to limit the scope of the act with respect to raw agricultural products.

Naturally some controls are needed in the emergency confronting us. But—and this is basic—we don't want to hamstring our economy with a lot of unnecessary controls. I intend to scrutinize closely all new proposals from bureaucrats whose only answer to a difficult problem is to slap on additional governmental regulations.

As I said, some controls are needed in an emergency. During the last war we had a lot of controls in the livestock and meat industry. They seemed to be needed then, and we imposed rationing, price controls, slaughter controls, set-asides, and subsidies. We ended up, however, with black markets. I hope that we have learned a lesson from the troubles we had during that period.

The situation is quite different this time. For one thing, we are starting from a higher level of production and we are not yet engaged in an all-out mobilization effort. In fact, quite the reverse is true, in that we are trying to preserve our strength in preparation for whatever may lie ahead, whether it be a year from now or 10 years hence.

Slaughter controls have already been announced, and I think this is a good move. Such controls, if properly handled, will keep fly-by-night operators out of business. It is essential, too, that consumers everywhere get fair and proper distribution of meat, and slaughter controls are one of the methods that, if properly administered, can help assure this. Furthermore, these controls are designed to keep slaughtering within legitimate channels, so that all of the important byproducts will be recovered and utilized. In substance, I feel that we need some control measures to protect consumers and the economy as a whole, but my underlying philosophy here is: Let us not have any unnecessary regimentation.

Your own industry can help a lot in this situation by instituting a bit of self-policing. For example: if you refuse to take undue advantage of a favorable price situation that will work hardship on others—you may be able to make the case against price ceilings more acceptable to the average consumer. You in the meat industry are in the middle of this problem. Your product has triggered much of the public support for price controls. I'm not going to say that the price rises that brought the demand for controls were solely due to actions of the meat industry, but I do feel that more self-restraint at the proper time might have headed off some of this price pressure.

The Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has been making a study of various food prices. We have gathered some interesting material from figures obtained from retailers and from the Bureau of Labor Statistics and the Bureau of Agricultural Economics. Such statistics as these, for example: Between the latter part of January 1950 and January, 1951, the price of good grade steers (now called choice) increased about 17 percent at Chicago. During the same period, the wholesale price of comparable carcass beef increased 20 percent, and the average price of several retail cuts went up 31 percent in the Washington area and 28 percent in eight representative cities.

During the same period, the part the farmer received of the consumer's dollar spent for beef dropped from 75 cents in January 1950 to 71 cents in January 1951. I might add that material gathered in other fields snowed somewhat the same conclusions.

Along this line I hope that the large packers will not take advantage of the present situation and do anything which would serve to drive smaller packers to the wall. This national crisis must not be used as an opportunity for the big packer to put the small packers out of business. This would be most unfortunate for the welfare of our country. The smaller independent businesses are essential to our free economy. One thing that we all must watch out for is the danger of too much concentration on big operations, whether they are in big business or in big government. There are inherent evils in both. Efficiency, as reflected in big business, can be very attractive, but it can also be dangerous in a democracy such as ours.

We have seen the danger signs of large-scale operations in agricultural production. We have seen communities where the small farmer has been squeezed by mammoth commercial operations, and I want to say that I am in full agreement with statements recently made by the Secretary of Agriculture and his assistants regarding the need for more positive help in maintaining the family-sized farm as a fundamental part of American agriculture.

One hundred years ago about 85 percent of the people in this country tilled the soil, while the remainder lived in towns and cities and were occupied in industry. Today the reverse is true. And this trend away from the farms continues. In part, this movement into the cities is inevitable, the natural result of our tremendous industrial development in the last hundred years. But we must see to it that the industrial growth that has drawn so many of our farm youth to the cities does not eventually take over American farming. Our farms and our farm families are the primary bulwarks of our democracy, and we must insure them against extinction. The tradition of the American farm is part and parcel of the spirit of America.

Back before the First World War my late father was a sugarcane planter. His operations supported many families. In order to operate the farm, about 125 laborers were required during harvest time. He needed 12 wagons with 4 mules each and a large number of cane loaders. Today my brother and a cousin operate this same farm, with 3 tractors and 12 workers. One harvesting machine, operated by 2 men, takes the place of 80 laborers, and 1 cane loading machine, run by 1 man, does the work of 16 cane loaders. It cost my father, before World War I, about a dollar per ton to harvest and load cane on cars, in contrast to the 85 cents per ton that present operations require.

I have a farm of my own, but it is too small to operate mechanically. I grow some sugarcane, and my cost of harvesting is more than double that of my brother. Obviously, I am at a disadvantage to compete with him in these operations. But nonetheless, there must continue to be a place for small operators in American agriculture. The same truth applies, I am sure, to the small packer.

I mentioned the fact earlier that agriculture was in a strong position when this emergency developed. This means much to the Nation, and we should all realize that this didn't happen just by accident. Sound farm programs through the years have built this strength. Certainly it means a lot to your industry, which is so directly dependent on productive agriculture.

I sponsored the basic farm legislation which made our present farm programs possible. I am very proud of that fact. In 1937, when I first came to the Senate, my first major assignment was to serve on a subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, created for the purpose of holding hearings pertaining to our farm problem. It will be recalled that the basic act of 1933 had been declared unconstitutional. In drafting legislation to replace the 1933 act, we decided on a new technique. Instead of having farm leaders come to committee hearings in Washington, we decided to take the hearings to the farmers throughout the country. The hearings that we held at these grass roots formed the basis of our present program.

Ten years later, I was again selected, with others, to make a further study to determine how the program had worked and whether it needed improvement. It was my privilege to again hear as witnesses many of the farmers who had testified 10 years previously, and it warmed my heart to hear them say, almost in unison, everywhere we went, "Senators, we are satisfied with what we have. Unless you can give us something better, let well enough alone."

There has been too much loose talk lately about farmers having an unfair advantage in current defense laws and otherwise. That farmers have an unfair advantage is just not a fact. The farmer is entitled, like everyone else, to a fair price for his products. If prices for certain of his commodities are forced to stay below a fair parity figure, we are inviting trouble in the form of an unbalanced or dislocated production later on. Net income of farm operators dropped from almost $18,000,000,000 in 1947 to sixteen and five-tenths billion in 1948, to fourteen billion in 1949, and to thirteen billion in 1950.

The farmer is asking only for a fair break. In the period just before the Korean attack, no other major segment of our economy went through so severe an economic set-back as did agriculture. Both corporate profits after taxes and hourly earnings of factory workers are well above the 1947 level. Corporate profits, after a small decline, have now climbed up to new records and are running 32 percent above the 1947 figure. Similarly, hourly earnings of factory workers in 1950 were 18 percent above the 1947 level. And yet the farmers, as certain interests would have you believe, is the villain. It just isn't so.

We must continue a sound price-support structure for agriculture. I, for one, will have no part of the thinking that this is the time to do away with these farm programs, or to give up the parity-price concept of fair returns.

The Defense Production Act contains a provision that ceiling prices cannot be placed on agricultural commodities at a level below parity, or below the prices farmers received during the month before Korea—whichever is higher. There have been suggestions that this provision should be removed or modified. There have also been suggestions that the parity level should be frozen as of some definite date, and not permit any adjustments after that date no matter how much prices might increase for the things a farmer has to buy.

In my opinion, it would be a fatal mistake to destroy the parity principle in that way. Parity is the measuring stick of fair returns for farmers. It is the assurance that he can pay his costs of production and stay in business, producing at the high levels demanded by the emergency.

The provisions in the present Defense Production Act are almost identical to those under which OPA operated during World War II. The Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, provided that no maximum prices should be established at less than the higher of parity or prices in a base period. Let us not get stampeded into giving up agriculture's basic protections. The whole economy will suffer if we do. And as a matter of fact, it has been estimated that the cost of living index would go up less than 2 percent if all farm commodities now below parity were automatically brought up to the parity level.

I understand that you men in the meat packing business are still in relatively good shape with regard to materials and facilities needed to continue your operations. Reports show that few requests have been received from your industry for assistance from the National Production Authority. Apparently you have not been having as much trouble as some other industries.

We know, however, that shortages of certain critical materials you use can be expected as we move further along with the national mobilization effort. And we know that you must have repair and replacement parts for grinders, boilers, motors, canning lines—and all the other equipment of a modern packing plant. Shortages of steel—and particularly stainless steel—probably will be felt first.

To prepare for what may lie ahead, the Department of Agriculture has cooperated with the American Meat Institute in working out the requirements of the packing industry for the rest of this year and the first part of 1952. These requirements are presented to the National Production Authority.

The Department of Agriculture acts as a claimant before NPA and other Government agencies, supporting the requests of farmers and the food industry for the scarce items they must have. It does everything it can to head off shortages. It will not be possible, however, for this claimant work to be fully effective until a program similar to the controlled-materials plan of World War II is in operation. Such a plan, which I understand NPA expects to have in effect this summer, will make possible definite allocations of scarce basic materials for various users—including food processors.

Meanwhile, Department officials who are representing agriculture and its related industries before NPA report that they are receiving full cooperation. A good illustration is the recent amendment to the tin order (NPA M-25) which makes tin cans available to perishable-food processors. Under this amendment, cans will be available in unlimited amounts—or at 100 percent of the base period—for almost all canned meats except prepared chicken and scrapple. We must keep driving for this sort of consideration for the vital food production and processing industries.

The emergency we face is very real and very serious. Only the future will reveal the extent to which we will have to expand our economy and tighten our belts on the civilian front. We can and we will win the struggle, however long it may require, if only we protect and encourage our private enterprise system, and avoid throwing needless bureaucratic road blocks in its way. We should provide Government help where it is appropriate and needed, but we must impose only those controls which are necessary.

It is essential that we rely primarily on the democratic system of free enterprise that has made us the greatest productive force on earth.

America's productive might should give any would-be aggressor pause to stop and think. Let us hope that we will not be compelled to expend our energies and our lifeblood in the fighting of another cruel world war. Instead, let us continue to protect, develop, and conserve our resources, and at the same time expand our industrial might. Let us make these United States a better place in which to live, and a source from which the light of freedom can shine undimmed throughout the world.

Proposed Alliance Between Democrats of the South and Republicans of the North

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio interview of myself by Bert Andrews, of the New York Herald Tribune.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Good evening. This is Bert Andrews, reporting from Washington.

A new investigation is about to get under way. It will begin in Jackson, Miss., on Monday, and it will deal with charges that Federal jobs were sold pretty freely there—to people who had the money to pay for them. Some of the jobs were in the new price-control set-up. Some of them were post-office jobs. With me tonight is a member of the subcommittee that will do the investigating—a subcommittee of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. He is Senator KARL MUNDT, Republican, of South Dakota. We're going to talk about the up-coming investigation—and about Senator MUNDT's belief that a true alliance ought to be formed among Republicans—and among Democrats who think the way Republicans do. First, Senator MUNDT, what do you think will be turned up in the hearings that will begin in Jackson, Miss., on Monday?

Senator MUNDT. First, I'd like to point out, Mr. Andrews, that none of the members of the Mississippi delegation in the Senate and the House are involved in any way in these charges. As a matter of fact, all the members of the delegation have been very helpful in bringing evidence before our committee and in suggesting leads for our field investigators in Mississippi—so the investigators could dig out the facts. What we have here is an outgrowth of the presidential campaign of 1948 in which Mississippi cast its electoral votes for the Dixiecrats. That naturally didn't set too well with the Truman administration and the Democratic National Committee here in Washington.

Mr. ANDREWS. And as I understand it, one of the results was that the national Democratic administration did what could be expected in such a case—they decided to cut patronage off from the Dixiecrats.

Senator MUNDT. Yes; and the Administration established a State Democratic patronage committee of its own selection down in Mississippi, with headquarters in Jackson. It wasn't long before rumors began to fly that jobs were being handed out—at a price. And it wasn't much longer before those rumors began to solidify into facts that seemed to warrant a thorough investigation. Our committee first heard of it when Senator EASTLAND and Senator STENNIS—both of Mississippi—put some evidence before us in executive session. They placed evidence and affidavits before us, citing specific cases where jobs had been offered for sale. This evidence came from individuals who—as good honest citizens—refused to try to buy Federal jobs.

Mr. ANDREWS. Can you tell me how many examples of that practice were supplied to the committee, Senator MUNDT?

Senator MUNDT. I presume the initial evidence furnished by the two Senators from Mississippi related to 10 or a dozen cases. Since then, our field investigators have discovered quite a number of additional cases. All of this will be made a matter of public record at the hearings which will open in Jackson on Monday.

Mr. ANDREWS. You emphasized, Senator MUNDT, that the Mississippi Senators and Congressmen were not involved in this matter in any way. But I know enough about politics to assume that any matters dealing with Federal patronage stem in some way from somebody in Washington. Do you have any idea who in Washington may be mentioned in the hearings?

Senator MUNDT. Keep in mind, Mr. Andrews, that the spadework thus far has been done by investigators for the committee, as is the custom in such inquiries. Senator HOEY, of North Carolina, and Senator MCCLELLAN, of Arkansas, and I haven't had the opportunity of studying the field reports as yet. We'll go over them when we get to Jackson—go over with the chief investigator, Mr. Flanigan. Until then, I can only guess as to what names will come out. But I would imagine that we'll run into some of the usual influence peddlers in Washington who are willing to sell their country short even when our boys are dying in Korea. I'll tell you, Mr. Andrews, that if we don't clean up some of these messes our way of life may be destroyed by these slimy creatures who undermine it from within. I think their practices are pretty sickening and before these investigations are over I expect some of them to land where they belong—in the Federal penitentiary.

Mr. ANDREWS. Well, since you're going to head south, Senator MUNDT, let's talk about another subject on which you have expressed some interesting ideas. I mean your suggestion for an alliance between the Republican Party and the Democrats who shy away from the regular Democratic Party. Do you think it's a really workable idea?

Senator MUNDT. I have no doubt at all that the idea of forming a formal alliance between the Democrats of the South who believe in States rights and oppose state socialism—and the Republicans of the North—is feasible. In the main, northern Republicans share many of the basic political and economic convictions of the antiadministration southern Democrats. This is clearly demonstrated by the fact that in the Congress—for the past 15 years—southern Democrats and Republicans have joined together time after time to defeat the major encroachments of big government and many of the moves that would take us down the road to socialism.

Mr. ANDREWS. What would be the primary purpose of this working alliance, Senator MUNDT?

Senator MUNDT. It's primary objective would be to develop a political formula by which the voters who support these Members of Congress who think alike and who vote alike, regardless of party lines, could vote for the same candidate for President. That would give us an administration in the White House and a Congress which could work in harmony for the preservation of private enterprise and States' rights in this country.

Mr. ANDREWS. We were speaking, Senator MUNDT, of your belief that an alliance of Republicans and southern Democrats could be made to work, and could nominate and elect a President of its own choice in 1952. Let's look at it concretely—what is the first step that would have to be taken?

Senator MUNDT. Well, Mr. Andrews, here is what I have proposed in a great many speeches in the South and in several talks in New York, Pennsylvania, and other northern points. First, I think it is a perfectly safe political prediction that the next national Democratic convention will either nominate President Truman for another term or somebody to the left of him—somebody even more inclined to favor socialistic enterprises, the break-down of State's rights, and the build-up of an all-powerful Federal Government. I base this prediction on the fact that those controlling the Democratic Party today have found it politically profitable and successful to write a platform and to nominate a candidate that will appeal to the pressure groups and the big city Democratic machine organizations. They simply ignore the desires and the ideals of southern Democrats in the belief that southern voters will continue to support the Democratic Party regardless.

Mr. ANDREWS. But that isn't quite responsive to my question, Senator MUNDT. My question is: What is the first step that would have to be taken to set up an alliance such as you suggest?

Senator MUNDT. Let me answer that question directly, Mr. Andrews. The first step would be a sort of declaration of independence by southern Democrats such as they engaged in at the 1948 National Democratic Convention. If President Truman or somebody to the left of him is nominated in 1952, I would expect many of them to walk out of the Democratic Convention. That would set the stage for the operation of the alliance I have in mind. I would suggest that a group of southern leaders would then send a committee to the Republican Convention—which, I hope, this time will be held after the Democratic Convention—and suggest a panel of candidates whom they would be willing to support. Candidates recommended from among both Republican and Democratic prospects.

Mr. ANDREWS. Does that mean that holding the Republican Convention after the Democratic Convention is an essential part of your proposal, Senator MUNDT?

Senator MUNDT. Not exactly, Mr. Andrews. I think it would be helpful since it would permit the dissatisfied and unhappy delegates from the Democratic Convention to have a voice in suggesting a panel of acceptable candidates. However, should the Republican National Committee insist on holding its convention first once more, a preconvention caucus or meeting could still be arranged with representatives of the Southern group because by convention time it should be clear as to just what type of Democratic Presidential candidate is likely to emerge from the convention.

Mr. ANDREWS. You spoke of dissatisfied and unhappy Democratic delegates and you were talking about the coming conventions. So you sound as though you were pretty sure that there will be some such Democrats who will be unhappy after their convention and completely dissatisfied. Are you suggesting that they ought to declare themselves now?

Senator MUNDT. Yes; that would certainly be helpful, Mr. Andrews. As a matter of fact, Governor Byrnes, of South Carolina, has rather clearly indicated his dissatisfaction with the trends of the Truman administration. Obviously, Senator BYRD, of Virginia, has done the same. I am hopeful that before convention time a considerable number of courageous leading Democrats from the South—both in and out of public life—will declare themselves as being willing to help formulate an effective alliance between Democrats with their point of view and the Republican effort to stop today's mad march toward the all-powerful state and national socialism.

Mr. ANDREWS. You say you are hopeful, Senator MUNDT; have you received any evidence that such hopes might be realized?

Senator MUNDT. Indeed, I have, Mr. Andrews. My office has received over 500 letters from 39 different States. Fully 360 of these letters have come from the South, and I am frank to say I have been both surpised and gratified at the great support that this movement has in the States south of the Mason and Dixon's line. But as a former reporter, myself, Mr. Andrews, let me throw that question back at you. You have a Democrat on your program one week and a Republican on the next week. You are completely fair in alternating them and in your questions. Do you believe that all Democrats are Truman Democrats or have you detected signs of dissatisfaction among those that you have interviewed?

Mr. ANDREWS. After all, Senator MUNDT, I do the questioning and let the listeners make up their minds. However, since you asked me I would say that there are both Truman and anti-Truman Democrats just as there are pro-Taft and anti-Taft Republicans.

For one final question, Senator MUNDT—do you, as a Republican, really believe that there is danger of this country going down the road to socialism as you said earlier or are you just talking as a Republican?

Senator MUNDT. Mr. Andrews, I am completely serious and sincere in my fear that unless we can elect a national administration that will respect individual enterprise and States rights we may end up with a Socialist government just as was the experience of Great Britain. Britain—as the evidence clearly shows—went Socialist because in that country those opposing it were divided into two different groups just as is the case in America today. For example, had there been no Liberal Party candidates in the field in the last British election, the records show that the anti-Socialists would have elected a majority of 29 in the House of Commons. If that had happened, Britain would never have nationalized steel and, as you know, the nationalization of steel is really the final step to socialism in an economy based on modern industry.

Thomas Jefferson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, April 14, 1951, Washington celebrates with another of its famous Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners.

The following quotation from Thomas Jefferson is most appropriate today:

Reading, reflection, and time have convinced me that the interests of society require the observation of those moral precepts only in which all religions agree (for all forbid us to murder, steal, plunder, or bear false witness), and that we should not intermeddle with the particular dogmas in which all religions differ, and which are totally unconnected with morality. In all of them we see good men, and as many in one as another. The varieties in the structure and action of the human mind as in those of the body, are the work of our Creator, against which it cannot be a religious duty to erect the standard of uniformity.

Assignment of American Ground Troops to Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. IRVING M. IVES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an address on the subject It's Not War; It's Not Peace, delivered by me at a meeting of the League of Women Voters in New York City on Saturday, April 14, 1951, and broadcast over the facilities of the Columbia Broadcasting System.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Last week's action by the United States Senate in finally determining Senate policy with regard to the assignment of American ground troops to Europe would demonstrate that the title of my remarks today was a potent factor in the Senate's deliberations.

One group in the Senate has seemed to argue that we are at peace because no declaration of war has been made by the Congress and that, regardless of any amount of fighting which may be involved, no condition of war can exist until a formal declaration to that effect has been made by the Congress. Another Senate group has seemed to argue just as ardently that war itself is a condition and a fact and that when this condition and this fact exist, there is war, regardless of congressional attitude concerning the matter.

Today we seem to be at peace only to the extent that Soviet Russia has not yet seen fit to make a direct attack upon us or our allies, and that a declaration of war itself has not been made by ourselves or by our allies or by Soviet Russia. In every other way, the evidence points strongly to an actual condition of war at the present time.

Surely the violent fighting which has occurred in Korea and the heavy casualties we have suffered there over the past 9 or 10 months cannot be construed by any stretch of the imagination to be acts of peace. Whether or not the United States forces are fighting there as a component part of the forces of the United Nations in a so-called police action, they are fighting, nevertheless, in our own interest and for our own defense against the armies of Red China. Very large numbers of Americans—in the air, on the sea, and on the land—have been and are participating in a growing war for the defense of ourselves and the protection of our free institutions, as well as for the defense of other free nations and free institutions everywhere. The fact that, as a member of the United Nations, we are thus participating in war, makes war itself no less a reality.

In the European theater, Russian strategy thus far has not called for a hot war. The difference between a cold war and a hot war is merely a difference of degree and severity. The motive, the intent, the purpose, and the objective in both types of war are identical.

The very fact that, during the period since the close of World War II, Soviet Russia has been devoting her chief effort to the building of armament and the raising of armies, while the free world has been disarming and struggling to rehabilitate its peoples and to restore its economies as preliminary steps to the restoration of peace and freedom everywhere, is indicative of the sinster purpose of the Soviets. The very fact that, during this same period, through intrigue and subterfuge and infiltration, Soviet Russia has been pursuing a course of aggression and conquest among her neighbors, provides further conclusive evidence of her diabolical intent. The very fact that, by obstructive tactics, Soviet Russia has conspired with her satellites to make the United Nations virtually impotent and to frustrate its every effort to preserve peace and to establish security against aggression and attack for every nation on earth, offers undeniable proof that Soviet Russia intends to conquer the world and to destroy all freedom and to employ to this end every effective device at her command.

And so, for the sake of self-preservation, the free nations of the world have been forced to take defensive action. The Marshall plan was undertaken and the North Atlantic Treaty was effectuated. And now, under the terms of that treaty, the United States is in the process of implementing it by sending additional Armed Forces to Europe.

There may be some who regard these activities as belonging to a regime of peace, but in a very real sense they are a planned maneuver against the armed attack which threatens. There may be some who regard these military operations as belonging to the ways of peace and I wish that this were so, and I pray that it may be so. But no longer can there be doubt that these defensive maneuvers are calculated to provide an effective fighting resistance if and when the freedom and independence of our European allies are challenged by Soviet Russia through the medium of armed conflict.

As long as there remains in the world an aggressor as powerful and ruthless as is Soviet Russia, there can be no peace. Periods of comparative calm, when there is little or no fighting, must not delude us and our allies into thinking that peace has come. Indeed, such a delusion can be our greatest danger as we proceed in preparations for defense. This delusion can be the Achilles' heel of the western world. More than anything else, it can cause our ultimate downfall and destruction.

This year and the years immediately ahead are likely to be for America among the most trying years in our whole history. As a free people, we hate regimentation and controls in any form and under any conditions. They are wholly contrary to American life in time of peace, but they are essential to American life in time of war, and they are essential to American life right now if we are to be able to avoid all-out war or if, not avoiding all-out war, we are to be able to survive it when it may come.

I realize, of course, that a substantial number of the American people are most reluctant to entrust President Truman with the powers which are essential to the Presidency if our preparedness program is to be completed on time. Lack of a definite foreign policy—in fact, almost no foreign policy at all—and unsavory disclosures concerning State Department personnel and activities have occasioned a public distrust, which borders on outright hostility, toward those responsible for our foreign affairs. The confusion, incompetence, and questionable practices, which so patently exist in certain administrative agencies, have served further to reduce public confidence in the administration. The lack of leadership on the part of the President himself and his personal shortcomings, including his unfortunate displays of temper, have still further aggravated the situation. His action in removing General MacArthur from the position of supreme commander in the Far East is the latest incident to cause public indignation toward Mr. Truman.

The President's defiance of the Congress has resulted in the worst kind of relationship between our national legislative body and our Chief Executive. This impasse has served to intensify the growing demand that the Congress take over the direction and operation of the Government.

I can well appreciate the provocation for this attitude, but I must point out that, even were the Congress able—legally and constitutionally—to grasp such control and to assume such responsibility, it is not geared to do so. Five hundred and thirty-one persons, influenced by varying pressures and local interests, can never effectively direct or administer functions of Government which require immediate decision and swift action. The fact that the Senate alone has just consumed 87 days—almost 3 months, in reaching a conclusion regarding the matter of congressional policy with respect to the assignment of American ground troops to Europe, is compelling evidence of the inability of a legislative body to act in an executive capacity.

Recognizing, as I do, the weaknesses of the President and his administration, but recognizing, most of all, the grave crisis which now confronts the country, I believe that the Congress should insist upon exercising its basic function as the over-all policymaking body in those fields of activity which constitutionally are within the domain of the Congress. At the same time, I believe that the Congress should not seek to usurp the prerogatives of the Chief Executive; rather, it should endeavor to cooperate with him and to support him in every reasonable and necessary effort affecting the safety and defense of the country. The President's refusal to reciprocate can never excuse the Congress from failing to do its share in its relationship with him. Angry as many of us may be because of overt actions by the President, we cannot afford to lose our perspective. Only through reason and common sense and rationality can the Nation, in the present circumstances, prepare to meet whatever eventuality may impend.

So I say to you today: Call present conditions what we will—peace or war—we must prepare for the worst. And we must have the courage and faith and conviction to continue in this preparation and defense as long as we and the free world are threatened by powerful forces of aggression. Upon our capacity temporarily to endure privation and sacrifice depends our ultimate survival as a free people. May God grant to us the strength of character to do the job that must be done.

Challenge to Mr. Truman To Follow MacArthur's Advice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OWEN BREWSTER

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, last fall, as chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee, I introduced Hon. Harold E. Stassen, president of the University of Pennsylvania, for a radio address. In asking that the address be printed in the RECORD at this time, I wish to point out that in this concise, straightforward address, delivered 6 months ago, Governor Stassen brilliantly analyzed with remarkable accuracy the mistakes and blunders of the foreign policy of this administration in the Far East, and warned of the dangers toward which those mistakes were leading us, resulting, as they have, in the high-handed dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

This address constitutes a prophetic, concise, and specific evaluation of the circumstances that have brought our far eastern foreign policy to its current tragic crisis.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF STASSEN'S BROADCAST CHALLENGING TRUMAN TO FOLLOW MACARTHUR'S ADVICE ON ASIA

My fellow citizens, President Truman has just returned from a meeting with General MacArthur at Wake Island. I am glad he went. I am glad the conference took place. Gen. Douglas MacArthur is one of the greatest generals in all of history. He has demonstrated over and over again his brilliant knowledge of military strategy, his magnificent execution of well-conceived plans, his understanding of all related factors of people and of materials and of terrain, and his inspiring courage in the face of danger.

Any impartial observer must agree that General MacArthur is the best informed American with regard to the entire Asiatic situation.

It is very clear that if President Truman had asked and accepted General MacArthur's advice 5 years ago China would not today be under Communist leadership.

If President Truman had asked and accepted General MacArthur's advice 4 years ago, the Communists would not today be worried about what would happen next in Burma.

If the President had asked and accepted General MacArthur's advice 2 years ago, the United States would not today be reading casualty lists of the youth of our Nation killed and wounded in Korea.

If the President had asked and accepted General MacArthur's advice 1 year ago the United Nations would not now be concerned about what to do next in Formosa.

SOME KEY QUESTIONS

Therefore, I believe that the key question on the lips of the American people, the direct question which they would ask President Truman as he reports to the Nation tomorrow night is this:

"Will you now accept General MacArthur's advice in Asia and in the western Pacific?"

To be more exact, the people ask of the President:

"Will you now accept General MacArthur's advice as to the United States position in the United Nations with reference to Communist China?

"Will you now accept General MacArthur's advice as to the United States position in the United Nations on the question of Formosa?"

"Will you now accept General MacArthur's advice as to the United States' position with reference to Indochina?

And in view of the fact that General MacArthur has been right through these years, and the President and the State Department have been wrong, I believe the people of America are further entitled to say to the President that if he is not willing to commit himself at this late date to follow General MacArthur's advice, then he should explain in detail to the people why not.

The courageous fighting and heavy sacrifice of our men in uniform, and the brilliant leadership of General MacArthur, have combined to pull the United States and the United Nations out of a very bad hole in Korea through a hard-won military victory. They have redeemed in blood the postwar blunders of diplomacy in this one spot in the world.

There are a large number of other blunders in Asia which are still unredeemed. The big question of the future is whether able leadership and competent advice is to have a chance to redeem them before they too must be redeemed at such high cost and in the most precious of all payments—American blood.

CITES OPPOSITION

A review of the 5-year postwar record in the far Pacific sounds almost unbelievable today. Time after time, since that dramatic ceremony on the U. S. S. Missouri ending the Japanese War, the administration and the State Department have endeavored to undermine and weaken General MacArthur.

In the fighting he had command of all the forces in that far Pacific area. But after his forces won the victory, China was promptly taken out of his jurisdiction, Formosa was taken out of his jurisdiction, the Philippines were taken out of his jurisdiction, Indochina was taken out of his jurisdiction, and even Korea was taken away from his supervision.

In Japan itself, in instance after instance, the State Department tried to weaken and confuse and depreciate his efforts. On the twentieth day of September 1945, a direct and outrageous effort was made to slap him down when it was stated by the then Acting Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, that General MacArthur was wrong to announce policy with regard to occupation troops and that the Truman administration and not the Occupation Command in Japan would decide the policies.

In December 1945, he was not consulted about the Moscow Conference on Far East decisions.

Then as recently as August 26, 1950, he was summarily told to withdraw a message to the Veterans of Foreign Wars which sincerely stated his views of the United States military strategy in the Pacific in response to a request.

Great soldier and statesman and patriot that he is, he overlooked all of these things without ever complaining. He did the greatest occupation job in all history. He successfully administered the rebuilding of a nation of 70 million people in a brief space of 5 years, and won the friendship of the Japanese population notwithstanding the terrific defeat which he himself had supervised in World War II.

ASSIGNMENT IN KOREA

With this same great spirit he accepted the sudden assignment to defend Korea, an assignment which up to the time of that order on June 27, 1950, after the fighting had started, had not been in his jurisdiction and had not been his responsibility. In spite of the weakened and partially armed units which were available due to the mismanagement of affairs in Washington, he rapidly brought together a magnificent fighting force which is winning the victories in Korea.

It is indeed strange that in these five long years, the Commander in Chief has never invited this great general to come to the National Capital to there receive the recognition and acclaim of a grateful Nation.

But be all that as it may, in the very critical dangerous world situation now confronting America, I am pleased that at long last the President has talked to General MacArthur.

If the President will now appoint him supreme commander of American military interests in all of the Asiatic-Pacific area, we will acclaim the President for that action.

We will acclaim him for that action just as we have in the past commended him for the appointment of Paul Hoffman, Administrator of the Marshall plan, under bipartisan supervision; and just as we have in the past commended him for the appointment of George C. Marshall as Secretary of Defense, with bipartisan approval.

Such action on his part would result in strong, bipartisan support in Asia and the backing of all of the people of America. If the President will do this I believe the United Nations Assembly would soon appoint General MacArthur as the United Nations supreme commander of all of their military forces and strategy in the Asiatic-Pacific area.

A MAC ARTHUR PLAN

From such action there would rapidly develop a MacArthur plan for Asia, which would do for that vast and important area and for its billions of peoples the parallel of what the Marshall plan and the Atlantic Pact have done for Europe.

Such action would immediately make it clear to the Communist rulers in the Russian Kremlin that they could no longer look to profit from the blunders and the weakness of American policy in Asia.

Such action would do more to stop the Soviet Union's drift toward war and to lead to genuine moves by Premier Stalin and the Politburo for a just world peace than any other single move that could now be made.

Under our political system, no one person can really speak for the Republican Party when it is in the minority in the National Government. But I am confident that I can speak for the Republican Party in this one thing. If the President will place General MacArthur in supreme command of American military policy and interests in all of the Asiatic-Pacific area and will follow his advice, the President will have the united enthusiastic backing of the Republican Party in this action.

But if, on the other hand, the President returns from this long and dramatic journey, occurring as it does on the eve of the senatorial and congressional elections, and if he by careful staging speaks from one of the crucial States in that election—California—and if he poses for numerous photographs with his personal candidates for the senatorship and governship of California—and if he says nothing more to the people than vague talk about Korea and defense which could have been written up before he ever left Washington, and if he talks about agreement with General MacArthur over Korea and Japan in matters in which there could be no real disagreement as the United Nations has already acted in Korea, and General MacArthur is already in military command in Korea and Japan, and if he glosses over or evades these key and difficult and dangerous Asiatic policy questions of China and Formosa and Asiatic communism on which he and America desperately need General MacArthur's advice and leadership, then the Republicans and the American people will conclude that the flight to the Pacific has not been a sincere statesmanlike journey, but rather a sinful political escapade.

There is a very disquieting report here in Washington. It is a report that this flight to the far Pacific did not arise from any conferences with the President's diplomatic or defense officials. The report is that it arose in a conference with his Missouri political friends during the evening hour on board his yacht in Chesapeake Bay.

WHERE THE CREDIT WENT

According to this report one of his political friends told the President that his senatorial and congressional candidates were in a bad way throughout the country because of the feeling that things had been badly handled in Washington, and that the people were giving all of the credit for the Korean victories to General MacArthur and the marines and the Army and the Air Force and the Navy.

This adviser said, according to the report, that the President had to share the headlines with General MacArthur, and that the way to do this was to fly out to see the general, and then to translate that into political assistance for the embattled candidates for Senators and Congressmen in the key States before the November 7 election.

The report continues that this political observer pointed out that the great strength of the unusually able group of Republican candidates who are before the people in the key States of the Nation, Gov. Thomas E. Dewey in New York, Governor Taft in Ohio, James Duff in Pennsylvania, Eugene Millikin in Colorado, John Lodge and Prescott Bush and Joseph Talbot in Connecticut, Governor Youngdahl in Minnesota, Governor Kelly in Michigan, Walter Kohler in Wisconsin, Val Peterson in Nebraska, Joseph Martin and his associates, and a host of others, including many young veterans of World War II as new candidates, could well lead to a devastating defeat on November 7.

DANGER AT HOME

According to this report the subject of the conversation on the President's yacht when the decision to make the MacArthur flight occurred was not the dangers to our country of an Asiatic Communist advance, but rather the danger to the President's political friends of an American Republican advance.

The only way to judge whether this report is true, or whether the President is sincerely endeavoring to work out Asiatic policy in his visit to General MacArthur, will be to observe the circumstances and actions of his journey and of his conduct after he returns.

If this whole effort is an attempt to bask in the luster of this great military leader and his hard-fighting, deeply wounded but victorious forces, and then to reflect a portion of that luster to the political advantage of candidates who have themselves in many instances opposed everything that the general and his fighting forces stand for, then the Nation will say to its President—for shame.

DISQUIETING CIRCUMSTANCES

There are a number of circumstances that are rather disquieting to the people in connection with the trip.

The fact that General acArthur did not know about it until after it was announced sounds more like politics and less like statesmanship.

The fact that the top officials of defense and diplomacy did not know about it until after it was decided sounds more like politics and less like statesmanship.

The fact that one of the largest airplanes built is used to take along a full load of motion picture cameramen and photographers and writers sounds more like politics and less like statesmanship.

The fact that he talks about the unification of the services and their joint operation under General MacArthur without acknowledging that the Unification Act was passed by the Eightieth Congress with a Republican majority sounds more like politics and less like statesmanship.

The fact that the report to the people upon return is to be made from the hot election State of California rather than the nonelection Capital at Washington sounds more like politics and less like statesmanship.

It is a fact that the candidate for Senator in California whom he will be supporting, and with whom the Vice President was extensively photographed as they paraded around Los Angeles last Monday, voted against many of the key laws which have been passed to strengthen the fight for freedom and against communism.

This candidate voted against the law which now permits the key defense departments to discharge poor security risks, even though the law passed overwhelmingly with solid Republican votes and considerable Democratic votes for a total of 327 to 14.

This candidate also voted against the program for aid to Greece and Turkey in their fight against Communists.

This candidate voted against selective service in 1948, without which General MacArthur would have had even fewer forces at his command for the Korean fight.

This candidate voted against the appropriation for the Un-American Activities Committee as recently as March 23, 1950, even though it passed with a solid vote of Republicans and a substantial vote of Democrats.

HE FORECASTS EVENTS

If it is politics that he is playing, then it will further show itself in appearances on one pretext or another in Illinois and Ohio and Connecticut and Pennsylvania and New York and Indiana.

If it is politics that he is playing then in these last days before election we can look for additional dramatic moves, such as the appointment of Chief Justice Vinson as Secretary of State and the appointment of Dean Acheson as Chief Justice; such as the announcement of intention to appoint General Eisenhower as commander of Western Europe, but without actually making the appointment; and such as the announcement of the intention to roll back the consumer prices, but without actually starting the roll-back, knowing full well that it is too late to effectively carry out a roll-back.

A soldier's mother said to me that as she thinks of the tragic price we have paid in Korea for the errors at the end of World War II, and thinks of the sadness and anxiety in so many homes in America tonight, and thinks of the young lives that have been disrupted or destroyed, she has a sense of indignation at the circus celebration atmosphere of this multi-camera escorted journey of the President.

A young veteran commented to me that the President is riding his airplane all the way to Wake Island in order that he can ride General MacArthur's coattail all the way to November 7. I sincerely hope this comment proves to be unfounded. I say that with deep feeling, because what our America and the cause of freedom needs in these weeks and months immediatey ahead is not clever politics, but, rather, great statesmanship.

AWAITS THE REPORT

The President, and only the President, can appoint the top leadership in the broad strategic commands in Western Europe and in Asia that are so essential to our future security and the prospects of freedom.

The President, and only the President, can clean up the all-time record high of corruption and of gambling and of vice sordidly peeping out into view in the great cities of our country by taking forthright action of the type that cleaned out the Capone gang and other hoodlums of the prohibition period.

Let me close with this solemn pledge: That whatsoever may be the strength of the Republicans after the people make their decision on November 7, we will support the President in every measure of rearming and in every measure for economic stability and in every measure of world policy in which he leads in a frank and open and American manner.

As an earnest of that we can point to the remarkable record in the Eightieth Congress with its Republican majority and its many key decisions under Senator VANDENBERG'S leadership; and before that to the constructive service of our Republican Party in strengthening the Dumbarton Oaks Charter and developing the clauses which in recent years have saved the United Nations from veto strangulation; and before that in steadfastly backing lend-lease and similar steps in the fight for freedom in the 1940's.

My fellow citizens, we await the report of the President.

Better Medical Care in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a most illuminating address delivered by Dr. Norman H. Gemmill to his colleagues of the York County, Pa., Medical Society. In his address Dr. Gemmill asks his fellow doctors to take the same constructive approach to winning the good will of the American people that I have urged on the American Medical Association for many years. Specifically, he points out that if the doctors themselves were to undertake first to discover and then to meet the real needs of the American people for better medical care, they "would not be expending the millions of dollars that they are today, through lobbying and the channels of advertisement, in order to buy ourselves back into the good graces of the public."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this address, as reported in the columns of the Gazette and Daily of York, Pa., for March 15, 1951, together with a follow-up editorial on Dr. Gemmill's remarks, which appeared in the same paper on Friday, March 23, be included at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address and editorial were ordered to be printed to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the York (Pa.) Gazette and Daily of March 15, 1951]

PHYSICIANS REBUKED FOR IGNORING PUBLIC, AND EXCESSIVE FEES

(Dr. Norman H. Gemmill, retiring president of York County Medical Society, tells colleagues some doctors charge excessive fees and are indifferent to night and Thursday calls. If profession was not in "public disfavor" it would not be spending millions through lobbying and advertising "in order to buy ourselves back into the good graces of the public," Dr. Gemmill declares.)

Excessive cost of medical care, physicians' indifference to night and Thursday calls and to "good doctor-patient relationship" draw criticism in the parting message of Dr. Norman H. Gemmill, Stewartstown, retiring president of the York County Medical Society.

The medical profession, Dr. Gemmill declared, is in public disfavor for these reasons.

"If we were not held in this public disfavor at the present time (and there's no use kidding ourselves that it doesn't exist)," he said, "I daresay we would not be expending the millions of dollars that we are today, through lobbying and the channels of advertisement, in order to buy ourselves back into the good graces of the public."

Dr. Gemmill yesterday gave the Gazette and Daily permission to use the text of his message, which was delivered as an address before the medical society at its annual banquet last month at the Country Club of York, and will be reprinted in the society's March bulletin.

Throughout the speech, he noted that his criticisms did not apply to all doctors.

Text follows:

There are several pleas I would like to leave with you as I relinquish my position as President of our medical society.

ASKS DEEPER CONSECRATION

The first is a plea for a deeper consecration on the part of all of us to the noble profession we represent, viz medicine, and an honest effort by each of us to try to regain some of the high esteem and respect of the people which our profession has lost in the past decade. The time has arrived when we, as a profession, should pause and take inventory of ourselves because never before have we experienced such poor public relations at a time when we urgently need good public relations.

If we were not held in this public disfavor at the present time (and there's no use kidding ourselves it doesn't exist) I dare say we would not be expending the millions of dollars that we are today through lobbying and the channels of advertisement, in order to buy ourselves back into the good graces of the public.

To what can we attribute this change in attitude by the public toward our profession?

BLAMES DOCTORS FOR DISFAVOR

Can all the blame be placed on the so-called left wingers or "pinks" throughout our country who we know advocate a program of socialized medicine? No, I dare say not. Is it because patients have changed? No, I believe not. Although they may be more exacting and demanding of the physician today, due to their increased medical knowledge obtained through the sources of the radio, newspapers, and certain magazine articles, they still represent sick people, approaching the doctor in a friendly spirit, choosing him in whom they have the most confidence to give them relief from their physical and mental sufferings.

Therefore, we must conclude that doctors themselves have made some "changes for the worse" during the past years. Not in regards to their professional competence, for medical education and training is infinitely better today than it was in my student days, but in regards to their relationship with mankind. Might we say that some of use have gained such a lofty opinion of ourselves as to regard ourselves "masters of the universe" rather than "servants of humanity" which God intended us to be as physicians.

Let us consider what I believe myself to represent some of these "changes for the worse" which may have crept into our profession.

CITES HIGH HOSPITAL COST

Certainly the cost of medical care is excessive today. Especially in the case of hospitalization over which, of course, we as physicians can exert very little control. But this high cost is also due in part to exorbitant fees charged by a minority in general practice and in the fields of specialization.

If every pre-medical student were asked why he had chosen medicine as a profession, I am afraid a great many of these young men, by their answers, would visualize themselves in a fairly high income bracket, living a somewhat smug and comfortable life without the expenditure of too much time and effort, while the motive of service should have been uppermost in their minds in enabling them to have arrived at such an important decision in their life. And this "profit motive," in too many cases, is carried down with them through medical college, hospital training, and into private practice.

If we want to determine whether this profit motive activates any of us today we can do so by our answer to several questions.

Do we manifest as deep an interest in those patients who cannot pay as in those patients whom we know will pay us well? And do we readily agree to accept house visits to new patients without first being assured they will pay for the service?

Another change for the worse, on the part of doctors, is our indifference and independence, on the part of some of us, to accept calls at any hour of the day or night or on any day of the week. (Sweet oil for the child's earache or paregoric for his bellyache until morning.) Or worst of all when your local telephone exchange can't locate a doctor on a Thursday or a holiday in the case of an emergency.

RECALLS PAST

In the younger days of our fellow practitioners who have received their 50-year service medal, and others in this age group who will soon have this signal honor conferred upon them, I dare say this was a thing unheard of, for I am certain their patient's interests came before their own, and many a vacation was given up due to a seriously ill patient or expectant mother. Night calls were no more agreeable in those horse-and-buggy days than they are today. And yet they cheerfully accepted them as a necessary part of their profession and even though the call may have come in at night they didn't charge a double fee for such service.

True, it is still the right of every American doctor to determine how hard he will work and what he will charge for doing his work. But the abuse of this right by some of us has not improved public relations one bit.

I ofttimes wonder if hospital staff and dispensary members realize their golden opportunity to help improve public relations. I dare say this is too frequently overlooked. Institutional care oft becomes so mechanical with us that we frequently forget the personal equation. It must be difficult to be on your guard at all times and render the same service and attention to all patients, irrespective of their race, creed, or whether it is an indigent case. And yet there should be no difference.

ADVICE TO YOUNG DOCTORS

The young man who is just entering private practice can do much to endear himself in the hearts of his clientele and thus help rekindle a burning fire of warmth toward the medical profession. You must remember that although you are far better equipped and trained than we were, the world still doesn't owe you a living until you can justify it.

The moment you enter private practice you are confronted with responsibilities and complex problems which you never encountered before as an intern or resident. It behooves each one of you, especially those who desert the larger cities for the smaller communities, to study the social and economic structure of that community which you have chosen in order that your relationship with the public at large will not be overlooked and neglected while at the same time you are concentrating so much on building up good doctor-patient relationship.

SERVICE TO HUMANITY

In other words what I am trying to say is that the success of any of us is not measured by the wealth we accumulate nor the luxury in which we live, nor by the number of patients we can boast of seeing in our office each day, but rather should we be judged by the service we render to humanity and to the community in which we live.

So much for public relations. The thoughts expressed are not necessarily new to you, but it is good for us to keep turning them over in our minds, and, if guilty as charged, let's try to improve ourselves.

In conclusion, my final plea is for increased tolerance and less professional jealousy among the members of our profession. (And I direct these remarks to the profession as a whole and not just our own local group.) If we can't get along with ourselves, how can we hope to get along with society?

As we meet on such formal occasions as these, with a few cocktails to add to the merriment, an outsider would gather the impression we are one happy, harmonious family. And yet we may no sooner leave this room or building ere someone stabs us in the back.

How quick we are to see and condemn the faults of others while at the same time we consider ourselves above reproach. As the Moffat translation puts it, "Why are we so quick to see the splinter in our brother's eye and so often fail to see the plank in our own eye?"

Or as Kipling states it in that great poem of his, If: "When being lied about, don't deal in lies," if you would be called, "A Man."

Therefore, it behooves us at all times to be guarded in our criticism of a fellow practitioner, lest what we say, when repeated by the other fellow, is misconstrued, or misrepresented. How often I have been misquoted to any of my brother practitioners, by some patients who dislike me, I do not know. We all experience some of these unpleasant relationships.

QUOTES SCRIPTURE

Wouldn't we all be far better off, if, when such stories of criticism are carried back to our ears by the way of the grapevine, that rather than assume that tit-for-tat attitude (an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth) we would let our minds revert to those passages of Scripture as recorded in Paul's Epistle to the Romans, the twelfth chapter, where we read these words: "Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves but rather give way unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore, if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink; for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good."

In the December issue of a booklet on daily devotions called Today, I ran across these verses which presented a challenge that I thought was well worth passing on to you and would be a splendid New Year resolution for each one of us to make. And I quote:

"I asked the New Year for some message sweet,
Some rule of life with which to guide my feet.
I asked, and paused, He answered soft and low,
God's will to know.

"Will knowledge then suffice, 'New Year,' I cried;
And ere the question into silence died,
The answer came, Nay, but remember, too,
God's will to do.

"Once more I asked, 'Is there nothing more to tell?'
And once again the answer sweetly fell,
'Yes,' this thing, all other things above,
God's will to love."

If each of us were to search our hearts to discover God's will for us (and surely He has a plan for each of our lives) and once we discover it, would attempt to carry it out, irrespective of the self-denial and sacrifice it would entail, and above all, to have in our hearts a burning love for our fellow men, even as God loves us, then the relationship between us would be such as to enable us to be that one happy, harmonious family which I stated earlier in my remarks does not exist today. And this goal is one which each of us should earnestly desire and strive to attain.

[From the York (Pa.) Gazette and Daily, March 23, 1951]

HEALTH AND DOCTORS

When Dr. Norman H. Gemmill, retiring president of the county medical society, told his colleagues recently that they should reform in certain ways in order to "regain the high esteem and respect of the people," he hit upon a very important point.

It was this. Dr. Gemmill, remarking that the profession was in disfavor, said frankly that the millions being spent "through lobbying and the channels of advertisement" by the AMA (American Medical Association) are being spent "to buy ourselves back into the good graces of the public."

Dr. Gemmill, of course, was a professional man speaking to brother professionals when he made the remark. Perhaps that is why he put the case so bluntly. It should be noted, however, that the AMA, in its messages to the public, never lets on that what it is trying to do is purchase a better reputation for doctors.

Not at all. The theme of the AMA is that its campaign, costing an amount estimated by Senator JAMES MURRAY at $20,000,000, is in the public, not the doctor's, interest. The AMA is spending the millions collected at the rate of $25 per from individual doctors, and in huge contributions from drug-trade associations and insurance companies, to tell the people that their health care is in good hands, that Federal health insurance is not only unnecessary but an actual menace to the well-being of United States citizens.

If Dr. Gemmill's references to the AMA campaign can be assumed to reflect the opinions of the medical profession, the doctors' organization is engaged upon a very dubious enterprise. It is informing the people that what it chooses to call "socialized medicine" is a threat to their independent selection of doctors and methods of health care. But the real threat of socialized medicine, if one goes by the implications of what Dr. Gemmill had to say, is not to the people at all but to the privilege of the medical profession to think of themselves first and the health of the people second.

This is not to say that all doctors are so minded. But according to Dr. Gemmill there are many that are. He very honestly deplored the fact and he urged his listeners to become once again "'servants of humanity,' as God intended us to be as physicians." He told the doctors that high fees, disregard for patients of low income, unwillingness to accept night calls, and so forth, were indications that the profit motive had come to dominate elements of the profession. He called for a return to the ideal of service to the people.

No one would argue with him on that score. His analysis of the failings of certain doctors, his recommendations to his colleagues, were impressive and forthright. But might it not be possible for Dr. Gemmill and other enlightened representatives of his profession to turn their attention also to the professional standards and ethics of the AMA? Could it be that in employing the AMA phrase, socialized medicine, Dr. Gemmill, without realizing it, is adopting standards in the field of propaganda which he would scorn in the field of science?

As matters stand, not one doctor in York County has ever taken the public position that the facts about the Nation's health and the facts about a proposed system of Federal health insurance be discussed in a rational and democratic fashion. Would not such a position, taken, say, by the medical society itself, be the best possible means for local practitioners as a group to reestablish, in the words of Dr. Gemmill, their relationship with mankind?

Research Into Causes and Treatment of Asthma

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a communication with respect to the need for an all-out effort to find the causes and cures of one of our most widespread health problems.

I am very glad to be able to inform the writer that through the National Institutes of Health created by the Congress, and sponsored by all members of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, such research as my correspondent mentions is now being carried on. The work is being done both at the Bethesda institutes, and through grants made by the institutes to research workers in universities and medical centers throughout the United States. It is limited only by the necessity consequently faced by the Congress of determining what amounts of money can be made available by the people of the United States for such life-saving work, as against the amounts which, through the machinations of Communist Soviet Russia, we are forced to expend in creating instruments of death and destruction.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POMONA, N. Y., March 27, 1951.

DEAR HON. SENATOR MURRAY: I trust you receive this card. The Good Book states, "Seek and ye shall find." So why can't some real smart doctor with ability discover a cure for asthma? Some can work miracles with the heart, eyes, brain, etc., but asthmatics painfully almost choke to death and a great many have. Like many, I cannot find any real lasting relief. What is asthma? Is it smarter than doctors? Bah. Time, life, and science march on, yes, for better bombs, aircraft, better this and that as we read, hear, and see. But asthma, a great basic health enemy, is still with us in the millions throughout the United States of America. Why? A cure for asthma is urgently needed—not pity or a truckload of someone's old Christmas cards. It's about time now to hear about a safe, lasting, reliable, effective treatment or a Senate national health-investigating committee on why asthma is still smarter than doctors. The great many that have died, the dying that can't write, and the asthmatics still praying in hope—with these facts, prompt me on to a national crusade to bring about a cure for asthma, so help me God.

As a humane interest of public service, I beg of you to kindly voice my above sincere letter into the RECORD before the Senate and Congress, also release my letter to the press for publication, please.

God bless you and yours.

S. G. LYMAN.

Maine's National Oratory Champ

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OWEN BREWSTER
OF MAINE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Maine's National Oratory Champ Would 'Stump' for Governor Payne," which appeared in the Portland Press-Herald on April 6, 1951.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUSTA, April 6.—A 17-year-old Milo High School senior who earlier this week was asked to assist Vice President BARKLEY in the art of public speaking agreed today to mount the stump for his State's Governor.

And John G. Decker is qualified to assist either man. He won a national oratorical contest this week, a $4,000 scholarship and an extra $1,000 for Milo High School.

Handsome and quiet, the youth who from all appearances takes celebrities in his stride today, received his initial introduction to Maine's governmental set-up.

He was vigorously applauded when introduced to both the Maine Senate and House of Representatives. In the next breath he told Gov. Frederick G. Payne he would answer his call to pinch-hit on a speaking engagement or two.

"Do you think you might like to enter public life, John?" Payne asked the youth.

"Well, I'm thinking of taking engineering in college," he replied.

"I may send you a note asking you to go out and make a few speeches for me, O. K.?" the Governor asked.

"Sure, if I can help," was the answer.

The dark-haired, dark-eyed Decker arrived here yesterday morning after winning the national competition at Columbia University, New York, last Tuesday night.

He had visited New York City and Washington, D. C., where he received congratulations of Vice President BARKLEY and Maine Senators MARGARET CHASE SMITH and OWEN BREWSTER.

"Live Safely, Live Happily" was the title of Decker's winning speech. He participated in observances in connection with New York City's safety week.

On the trip with John was his teacher at Milo High, Mrs. Pauline Kealiher, who says she "had John under my wing for just this year."

To her goes much credit for his success, John says.

Just after the Governor and State Senator Carroll McKusick, Republican, of Parkman, had praised the youth for his ability and for the fame he has brought his State, Decker was asked in an interview:

"What is your reaction to this sort of thing, to meeting such persons as the Vice President, your State's Senators in Washington, and the Governor? Make you nervous?"

"Gee, it might if they weren't such swell people to meet," he replied, "nobody could get nervous with them. They put you at ease. They're swell."

Official Inspection Trip of Commissioner F. A. Delgado in Different Provinces of the Philippines

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL STEFAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me, I enclose a report of a very interesting inspection trip made in the Philippine Islands by our former colleague the Honorable F. A. Delgado, a member of the United States Philippines War Damage Commission, which I include also with my remarks regarding the distinguished career of our former colleague:

OFFICIAL INSPECTION TRIP OF COMMISSIONER F. A. DELGADO IN DIFFERENT PROVINCES OF THE PHILIPPINES

"By resolution of the United States Philippine War Damage Commission of December 8, 1950, a final inspection of the different provinces was authorized. Accordingly, Commissioner Francisco A. Delgado, accompanied by Engineer Jose Garrido of the Bureau of Public Claims and Examiner Vicente Roco of the Bureau of Private Claims made a tour of inspection through almost all the provinces of the Philippine Archipelago beginning December 26, 1950, and ending on January 22, 1951. The trips were made by plane and by automobile.

"Starting in the Province of Laguna, Sta. Cruz, the capital of the province, and the municipality of Pagsanjan, were visited. In passing the different municipalities from Sta. Cruz to Pagsanjan were inspected.

"The inspection proceeded to the Province of Quezon, through many municipalities of the Province of Laguna and the Province of Quezon, which were also inspected in passing. Lucena, the capital of the Province of Quezon, was visited.

"The next trip took the party to the Mountain Province and the City of Baguio, and thence to La Union Province, inspecting on the way the municipalities of both provinces through which they passed. San Fernando City, capital of La Union Province, was also visited.

"Baguio was made the headquarters of the party while in northern Luzon and from there they proceeded to Lingayen, capital of Pangasinan Province, visiting on the way the municipalities of the adjoining provinces through which they passed.

"The next tour of inspection was to the Visayan Islands and Mindanao. From Manila the party proceeded to Iloilo City and Iloilo Province; thence to Bacolod City and Province of Occidental Negros; thence to the province and city of Cebu; thence to the province and city of Zamboanga via Dipolog; and thence to the City of Dumaguete and Province of Negros Oriental.

"Upon their return to Manila the party proceeded to the Bicol region, visiting the Provinces of Camarines Sur, Albay, and Camarines Norte, the cities of Naga and Legaspi, and the municipalities of the said provinces accessible by automobile.

"The last tour of the party was in central Luzon, visiting the Provinces of Batangas, Pampanga, and Bulacan, their respective capitals, and other municipalities.

"In all the provincial capitals, cities, and towns visited, the members of the party were met and otherwise shown every courtesy by the respective provincial governors, members of the provincial board, city and district engineers, city mayors, municipal mayors, and other provincial, city, and municipal officials, as well as by the officers of civic organizations such as the Jaycees, the Rotary, and Lions Clubs, and other prominent citizens.

"In all the places visited the party held conferences and an open forum in which everybody was given a chance to speak his mind in connection with public and private war-damage claims. Explanations of the work and procedures of the Commission were made and the doubts and misgivings in connection with the private claims brought to the attention of the party were explained away.

"As regards the public claims in the different provinces and cities inspected, the party has found that all the public projects to which the Commission has made awards have been completed with the exception of some details which cannot be completed because of the insufficiency of the funds allocated. There were projects, however, which looked even better than the original ones. The party also found out that the great majority of the municipalities inspected badly needed barrio schools, municipal buildings, public markets and other public buildings, hospital, dispensaries, and school equipment which were destroyed during the last world war and which could not be rehabilitated for lack of funds.

"Provincial, city and municipal officials in the different provinces, cities, and municipalities inspected were unanimous in clamoring for additional funds to complete the rehabilitation of the uncompleted projects and to rehabilitate the many buildings and equipment for which no awards were made.

"As regards the private claims, the feeling was also unanimous that the Commission has acted with fairness and justice to all private claimants but that a third payment, at least sufficient to complete the 75 percent of the approved amount promised in the Philippine Rehabilitation Act of 1946, is needed if the good work already started is to attain at least a practicable rehabilitation of the economy of the provinces and the individual citizens thereof.

"Commissioner Delgado has had the previous opportunity during 1947 and 1948 to go through most of the provinces visited in his final inspection and for this reason he was most profoundly impressed with a deep feeling of satisfaction to have observed the extent of the rehabilitation accomplished by the Philippine War Damage Commission, with the limited funds at its disposal, throughout the entire Philippine Archipelago. He found out that every provincial capital and town now presents, so to speak, a "new look," at least in the center of the "poblacion." Also that provincial capitals, hospitals, high schools, trade schools, central schools, dispensaries, other school buildings, and some barrio schools looked normal and as in the prewar days of peace and prosperity in the Philippines. Indeed, in many cases, the reconstructed buildings were by far better in appearance and usefulness than their prewar counterparts. Withal, it was also obviously apparent that much more still remains to be done, specially in the case of barrio schools, hospitals, dispensaries, waterworks, municipal and market buildings, equipment, etc. It is, therefore, no wonder that the feeling is absolutely unanimous among officials and private citizens of all classes of the absolute need of further assistance. All realize the great good accomplished by the aid thus far rendered and are profoundly grateful therefor to the American Government and people. But they also feel that there is urgent and essential need for more assistance. The feeling is general that the Commission has acted fairly and justly with the limited funds under its disposal, and that the work of the Commission has greatly enhanced the traditional good will and friendship of the Filipino people for the American people, their ideals and their way of life.

"In view of the foregoing, Commissioner Delgado's only recommendation in his report to the Commission was that the latter, or at least the individual members thereof, do all they can toward the immediate consideration and approval of the Kefauver bill or some other measure which would authorize the appropriation of an additional $100,000,000, at least, for further war damage compensation in the Philippines.

"Acting with rapidity apparently hitherto unknown in agencies of government, the United States Philippine War Damage Commission has concluded the task assigned to it by the Philippine Rehabilitation Act of 1946. It has finished its work prior to the legal deadline fixed by the Congress and at less than the legislatively prescribed cost.

"The Philippine Rehabilitation Act was a nonpartisan measure. It was enacted shortly before the Philippines was granted independence by the United States, after having been under this Nation's tutelage for nearly 50 years. A strong mutual friendship had existed between our two peoples during this half century. The Philippine people fought side by side with us during the war and remained loyal to democratic ideals and to the United States during the grim days of the occupation. When it came time to grant them independence, their country had been ravaged by war. Their finances had been depleted sorely; individuals had suffered terrific personal losses and were in dire need of aid.

"As a partial measure of assistance, and so that our friends would not be granted independence as a free nation when they were not in a financial position to start on such a grave, new venture, the Congress adopted the Philippine Rehabilitation Act. This law provided for payment in part of war-damage claims arising out of the destruction to, or loss of, private property, as well as for partial rehabilitation of damaged public property. At the time of the adoption of the law, it was almost impossible to determine the exact amount of money that would be needed to finance reconstruction, but the Congress authorized the expenditure of $400,000,000 for the payment of private claims and administrative expenses relating thereto. This fund was placed under the jurisdiction of the War Damage Commission, as was an additional $57,000,000 for the payment of claims for damage to public property.

"The Rehabilitation Act, in itself, was unprecedented in that no nation previously had undertaken to pay war damages in another country in a similar manner or on such a scale. The Commission, therefore, had no precedents to follow. Yet, today, its work is completed. First, the law required it to end its operations relating to the adjudication of public property claims by June 30, 1950. This was done and, when the Commission concluded this part of its activities, the benefits of its public property rehabilitation awards included classroom facilities for 3,200,000 students, hospital beds for 3,200 patients, water for 6,700,000 people, direct employment for 20,000 workmen, and extensive office accommodations for the executives and staffs of the national, provincial, and municipal governments.

"In addition, the law required the Commission to complete its entire operation not later than April 30, 1951. It has been finished ahead of schedule. The Commission was allowed $12,000,000 for administrative expenses attendant to the adjudication and payment of private claims. Actually, $10,350,000, or only 2.6 percent of the total appropriation, was expended and the savings are being returned to the Treasury of the United States. The Commission, prior to its closing, had adjudicated approximately 1,250,000 private claims and had paid the beneficiaries almost $390,000,000. Industry, business, and agriculture, as well as the individual, have benefited substantially although the appropriated funds have not permitted the full payments authorized by the Rehabilitation Act. There are many people who believe the United States should appropriate additional funds so that the commitments of the act would be met fully. Others believe we should give even more extensive aid to the Philippines. This is not the medium through which to espouse either of these proposals, regardless of one's sympathies. There will be other times and instruments for that."

Mr. Speaker, Commissioner Delgado has occupied the unique position during his service with the Commission of being the only foreign national to be nominated to a post on a United States Government agency and to have had that nomination confirmed by the United States Senate. Prior to his appointment he had a long and illustrious record. He attended Compton High School, Compton, Calif., as one of the first group of Filipino students to study in the United States. He pursued his education at the University of Indiana, where he received his degrees of bachelor of laws and doctor of laws. He received his master of laws, cum laude, from Yale in 1908. After a distinguished career in the Philippines, which included service as a member of the Philippine House of Representatives, he served in the United States House of Representatives as Resident Commissioner of the Philippines to the United States. He has been a justice of the Philippine Court of Appeals, and declined a nomination to the Supreme Court of the Philippines. He is president of the Philippine Bar Association. He was a delegate of the Philippine Commonwealth to the International Committee of Jurists at Washington, April 1945, which prepared the draft of the Statute of the International Court of Justice of the United Nations. He was a member of the Philippine delegation to the United Nations Conference at San Francisco in 1945, and was nominated to the International Court of Justice of the United Nations in 1946 by the Philippine Government.

A distinguished jurist and statesman, Commissioner Francisco A. Delgado has concluded his occupancy of a high post in the United States Government after serving in it for almost 5 years. In that period, as always, he has been vitally concerned with the welfare of his own people but has scrupulously acted in the interests of the United States, for which he has constantly maintained a deep and abiding friendship. It has been said that no man can serve two masters. In Commissioner Delgado we have an illustrous public servant of the Philippines and of the United States serving both at the same time on the highest plane, giving to each the full benefit of his ability and integrity. For this notable achievement and for his outstanding contribution to the lasting, harmonious relationship between our two nations, I can but extend to him the most infinite praise.

Kefauver Committee Hearings

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following very interesting item from Mr. Clement Norton, well-known Boston newspaperman, that appeared in the Lynn Telegram-News, Sunday, April 1, 1951, concerning the Kefauver Crime Investigation Committee:

KEFAUVER

The biggest political shock of the day, was the smash hit of television in the Kefauver committee hearings. Politicians are still running and ducking and whispering trying to find out what it all means. What it all adds up to. For, if millions of people can watch them, many of them are done. They might as well throw in the towel and quit, in the language of the ring.

And, if you were to select from all the Congress a cast, you could not have selected a better one, than the Kefauver group for the curtain opener, in which millions of Americans saw and heard their first congressional hearing. The puritanical, honest New England TOBEY, crying like a child twice. I liked him. The able Senator O'CONOR. The 48-year-old chairman, Senator CAREY ESTES KEFAUVER, a Chattanooga, Tenn., lawyer and Yale law grad, televised well. He was clean-cut and good-looking, and best of all, he gave every one of the millions of people who saw and heard him, a first-class lesson in basic culture, in innate kindness, in everyday charitableness. In understanding and in social sensitivity to the rights of others. His equable, calm, warm, resonant, low, well-spaced words with just a hint of a delightful southern drawl, calmed the troubled waters time and time again.

It was one of the greatest lessons ever taught to the largest class in history, and I'm sure, that as a result of it, thousands of judges will go back on the bench and be more considerate to unfortunates, and millions of people will quietly but surely improve their manners, after being subjected to the terrific impact of seeing and hearing the cultured Senator KEFAUVER with his innately fair technique.

MIGHT

The Senator might have sat up there and lorded it over everybody. He might have yelled and roared and bellowed at the gangsters and been applauded by the multitude. He might have literally strutted sitting down for he was in a position that no person in American politics had ever been before, and he fully realized all this, and deliberately decided to be himself—to be natural. In short, to be innately kind and considerate to everybody. He did not try to hog the show, but would let other Senators and committee attorneys take over. He might have jumped on Frank Costello and waved the flag and Bible, a sure-fire hit, but no, he was gentle and kind to Costello.

I like that kind of conduct. It showed that KEFAUVER had real class. Real culture in his make-up. It made me feel that my country, my Government, never can go down, so long as such outstanding men are on guard in Washington. And I was pleased to find that everybody had a good word for Senator KEFAUVER that I asked in my poll. The man out of the bar, the college professor, the department store clerk, the barber.

And then, I could stand up and cheer for KEFAUVER, when I found that on his Washington office wall are the scribbled drawings of his 7-year-old daughter. That he had two children and wanted a third, and thought that this was impossible, so he adopted a third child, and now, to his joy, a third child has been born into the family, making four children, all told. KEFAUVER has fought monopolies, has fought for public housing for the underprivileged, and has, on the whole, a grand record of standing for the people against powerful entrenched interests.

I'm completely sold on Senator KEFAUVER. That television performance was terrific. Science has brought something new and something better into our lives.

Food Aid for India—On-the-Spot Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 13, 1951

I

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, without reading political implications into the bill for food aid to India, it is nevertheless proper to understand the impact upon government stability of famine there. The best evidence on this situation is an on-the-spot report from Dr. Frank Laubach, special counselor and representative of the committee on world literacy and Christian literature, Foreign Missions Conference of North America, showing the Communist menace in the various famine-affected areas in India. This letter is Dr. Laubach's normal report to his own committee dated March 4, 1951, and received here the end of March, and transmitted to me by Executive Secretary Alfred D. Moore, of the committee, with permission to insert pertinent excerpts from it:

BOMBAY, INDIA, March 4, 1951.

I was asked in America to collect material about the Christian answer to communism in India. I am here with 30 of the leading Indian Christians of all India. I told them about this request and asked them to be frank. The result appalled me. Communism is far more menacing than even I had dreamed.

The delegate from Amritsar close to Pakistan said the Communists are very active, persuading millions to believe that they must kill the rich and take what they have. As minister, he wanted to know how to stem the tide.

The delegates from Telengana (Hyderabad State) said that the Communists have so swept that pathetically hungry state that if a Communist army marched in, 99 percent of the people would welcome it. Hyderabad in the past has been the most terrible example of enormous wealth and terrible poverty side by side, in all India. The Communists took many rich landowners out and cut them to pieces with the hearty approval of the poor.

The delegate from Madras state said the Communists have workers everywhere, and that they go and read to the people, who being ignorant and hating their landlords are rapidly becoming Communists. They tell the people, "We are going to kill the big landowners and distribute the land." The tenants, the robber castes, and the idle ex-servicemen are falling for it.

Another delegate from Madras says the people are told that Nehru is backing the rich who run the government, and so all the poor are being turned against Nehru. The new government, when it took over from England, promised to right the wrongs allowed by the British, but the poor still have little or nothing more than they had before.

Communist teachers are converting their students, and there are fifth-columns in all colleges. The Communists say they are the only people in India who really try to emancipate the poor. They constantly threaten to kill Christian pastors unless they become Communists. They are getting many Christians to adopt what they call "Christian communism."

One delegate from the center of the greatest violence in Telengana (Hyderabad) said: "I believe God sent communism to destroy the wicked rich; 75 percent of the rich were murdered by the Communists and the other 25 percent are now repentent and good. The Communists said to the masses: 'You built the roads, but you cannot ride on them. You built the houses, but you cannot live in decent houses.' "

In the March 1 Times of India, the leading article says that not even in Telengana has the Communist menace assumed such dangerous proportions as in Assam, among the most backward and impoverished tribal people.

The delegate from Calcutta is very reticent to say even one word, but did say that the people there are just waiting for the Communists to come and liberate them.

I must not write a long letter, but these delegates agree that India is rapidly going Communist in every state and province. They say that every day the American Congress either criticizes the Indian Government, or delays helping the starving in India, millions of Indians are going Communist, believing that only the Communists can liberate them from poverty. Before many months it will be another "too little too late."

I was told that some Congressmen are coming to India. They should come soon and they should listen, welcome frank truth, and not do all the talking. I was told by missionaries recently from China that a Congressman I shall not name, called them together in Shanghai, talked to them for 4 hours and went away without listening to them. I suggest that they consult not missionaries nor Indian officials, but Christian native pastors.

A recent shipment of only 12,000 tons of Russian grain to India brought the bitter newspaper comment: "It begins to be evident who it is that is concerned about the people of India."

Very sincerely yours with my prayer,
FRANK LAUBACH.

II

Mr. Speaker, there is also attached appended an on-the-spot report contained in an editorial by Norman Cousins in the Saturday Review of Literature of March 31, 1951. This editorial was also the subject of full-page advertisements in New York and other papers, sponsored by Freedom House:

NEW DELHI.—Once you have seen the look of hunger on the face of a man it is difficult to put it out of your mind. I have seen the look of hunger on the faces of thousands of men, and I know I shall never forget it.

I first saw the hungry in a jail on the island of Ceylon. They were illegal immigrants fleeing the famine in the south of India, and the Government of Ceylon was detaining them in a prison in Jaffna until arrangements could be worked out for their return to India. They had come by small boat, landing during the night on the north coast of Ceylon, where some of them had been picked up by the police. No one knew how many Indians had fled to Ceylon in this summer.

In the jail at Jaffna I spoke to a woman of 55 who looked closer to 90. I doubt that she weighed 80 pounds. Her face was little more than a bare skull out of which small eyes glowed feverishly. She had come to Ceylon to join her married daughter, who had escaped successfully 2 months earlier. This much she was willing to tell, but she would not tell the police where her daughter might be found, even though it meant she herself would be returned to India alone.

I next saw the hungry in the south of India, where the suffering is most acute. I saw them against a background of parched and browned fields, with pale stubbles where rich rice paddies should have been. The reason for it was that the rains never came this year. They didn't come last year either or the year before that or the year before that.

"Four years, no monsoon," one of the elders in a village 40 miles from Madras told me. "The older people have thought hard but they do not remember when before the fields have been so dry. The wells are very low."

He looked up at the scudding clouds. "Clouds like this used to bring rain. Now they go out to sea and drop their rain where there is no need of it. The old people can eat little. If they are thin it is no great harm. Ghandi was thin. But the children are thin and they become sick quickly. Smallpox has killed many of them. Thirty had smallpox in this village. Sixteen died.

"We send men into the cities to work so they can buy rice to bring back to the village. But there is so little rice and the rations have been cut again, and what they bring back cannot fill the bowls of many persons. We eat what we can—bananas and some coconuts—but very many people here are starving."

I next saw the faces of the hungry on the streets of Calcutta. Many of them were homeless. They had lost their homes during the partition of India when Pakistan was created. They were Hindus who feared the Moslems, and they had abandoned their homes in Pakistan and crossed over into India. In India there are perhaps eight or ten million such refugees—it might be millions more; no one knows exactly how many. Thousands of them came into Calcutta, the world's largest city, looking for food and homes. They slept in the streets. Wherever you went at night, on the main thoroughfares or in the alleys or in the hallways, you could see the human forms huddled together against the cool night. During the day they waited in lines for government food or they begged.

Near the luxurious Grand Hotel in Calcutta was a child of 8 or 9, with not enough clothes to conceal the bloated, empty belly of hunger. He was looking in the streets for scraps of food. Nearby was a young woman of about twenty, her body covered by the rags of what once must have been a handsome sari. A child of 2 was on her hip. The child was badly undernourished, and his head rested on his mother's shoulder. His face was empty and expressionless. I also saw the hungry of Bangalore. They sat against the walls of buildings and waited.

Then I saw them in Delhi. There are more of the hungry and homeless in Delhi than in any other city in the world. As in Calcutta, many of them are refugees—maybe 500,000 or 600,000—and they have crowded into the city, setting up crude wood-and-straw shelters, most of them closet size. And every day the dead are carried out by men who are little more than half alive themselves. I stood on the corner of a busy street in Delhi and watched the refugees as they passed. Out of the thousands who passed by only two would be considered plump by American standards.

The Indians are reluctant to talk about themselves or about their hardships. I was able, however, to win the confidence of the attendant assigned to my room. He told me about his 6-year-old son, the one with tuberculosis. He said his son had been praying a great deal recently, much more than usual, and he had asked his son what he had been praying for. "My son was praying that he might die. He wanted to die and he wanted God to make him into a crow. I had told him about the crows that fly into the open windows of the hotel rooms and pick up food on the tables and then carry the food off. My son said he wanted to be a crow so he could fly wherever there was food and bring it back to our family."

Then the attendant, whose name was Arun, turned away from me and knelt down to fix the fire. "India has been hungry for many months," he said. "They are saying that America has known about this need and that America has not wished to send us food."

I replied that what he had been told was not true. What had happened was that we had been too slow in responding to India's need, and that was bad enough. Americans had to operate through their Government and often democratic government is slow in doing what has to be done promptly. I asked him to believe that millions of Americans were deeply concerned and were prodding our Government to action.

Then he mentioned the report he had read in the newspapers about the American Senators who wanted to punish India because India did not agree with the United States in the United Nations.

"It is true is it not, sir, that we may not get the food because we do not say what you wish us to say?"

I had to think a little while before replying, because I wasn't too sure that what he had feared might not turn out to be true. Should I have told him that it might take many days before the wheat bill might pass during which time he would have to watch his youngsters continue to eat out of partially filled bowls?

Finally, I told him that there was no real answer to his question, except to say that we would do our best, our very best, and that the American people would be angry if any attempt were made to deprive other people of food because we might disagree with their leaders.

Arun finished making the fire and left. It occurred to me that what ought to be done was to take Arun to the United States on the very next plane and bring him before the Senate of the United States.

If the Congressmen don't want to give wheat to Arun and countless millions of his countrymen, then they ought to tell it to Arun directly. Let them answer Arun's questions—if they can. Let them hear about Arun's children and then tell him exactly why a Nation which has a surplus of wheat does not feel that it wants to put politics to one side when people are starving.

Then, after telling Arun why he will get no wheat, let us finish the job. Let us recall the appropriation for the Voice of America and for all our information services abroad. Let us shut down all our efforts to combat Communist propaganda against us. There is no point telling our story to the world if there is nothing for us to say. All the Voice of America can do is to try to provide a real, true account of what is happening in America. What we say can and should be a reflection of what we do.

We have heard a great deal in recent years about the need to speak to peoples and only to governments. The most powerful language in the world today is food. It is clearly understood. It builds bridges mightier by far than radio broadcasts or published material, especially when people have no radios or cannot read.

My purpose in coming to India was to try to tell the Indian people about America and to try to answer the many lies being told about us. Those lies are aimed at splitting America off from the rest of the world. Yet there is nothing Soviet propaganda can say about us that can do nearly the harm that we can do to ourselves if we should turn our back today not only on India but on the meaning of America itself.

General MacArthur's Greatness Cannot Be Subdued by Truman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, the rising flood of indignation from average citizens all over this Nation is pouring into Washington in support of Gen. Douglas MacArthur and in protest against the action of President Truman in summarily dismissing General MacArthur.

Never before in history have the people so strongly protested the action of a Chief Executive. Never before have the American people completely lost confidence in the administration elected by them to office, and viewed with suspicion and distrust the motivation behind the acts of the President and the Secretary of State.

Angry demands for drastic action have been voiced by an outraged citizenry which fears that a continuation of the senseless blundering mistakes of the President and his administration will bring disaster to the United States.

The people today look to the Congress to rise to its responsibilities and develop a leadership which the Nation can trust to consider the welfare and security of the United States of America, and to take such steps as are possible to prevent further blunders and mismanagement in the administration.

From all parts of the country editorial writers have voiced their regret that the President chose to remove General MacArthur from his command. The following is one of the most eloquent and direct reviews of the MacArthur dismissal which appeared in a recent edition of the Tidings, published in Los Angeles, Calif.:

The symbol of hope becomes the legend of despair. The Nation reels in stunned dismay with the MacArthur dismissal. Resentment flares in a fateful hour. The spokesman of Christian values and American ideals in the Orient, whose towering courage won the respect of friend and erstwhile foe and steeled them both against a newer menace, is abruptly silenced and humbled while Acheson's design of disaster sweeps inexorably toward deeper disgrace and newer infamy.

There has been torment for General MacArthur since a decade ago when the goading of diplomacy outstripped military preparedness and brought about the fiasco of the Philippines. Even in the tragedy of Corregidor, when he was narrowly spared the death march of Bataan, he kept alive the hope of freedom in Asia by vowing victory and return. Slowed by a lack of matériel in what then too was considered a secondary theater of operations, he nevertheless by a brilliant series of tactical surprises in hedgehopping maneuvers finally sloshed ashore at Leyte and readied the final thrust at the enemy mainland. Victory hovered even before Hiroshima.

He pursued his undeviating way ignoring the petty jealousy of President, circumventing diplomat playing at strategy, unheedful of the biting carp and cant of the liberal fringe peddling the planted alien propaganda that could not diminish his stature or deflect his resolve not only to defeat the enemy but to thwart the pretensions of supposed friends. He knew the caliber of our dubious allies and like General Patton, whose spirit was also seared by the foreign flame, tried to alert America to the sinister peril that shaped. Who can deny that if the views of these two God-fearing men and eminent military strategists had prevailed, we would not now be in dread with apprehensions of doom?

General MacArthur was nowhere more magnificent than amid the ruins of Seoul leading his men in the Lord's Prayer even as the United Nations planned the sell-out of American valor and sacrifice. His was the responsibility for American lives in Korea, and in the welter of conflicting directives and tactical restrictions he knew the danger that massed against our soldiers in the privileged sanctuary of Manchuria. With 60,000 casualties in Korea, he could be pardoned if he was compelled to speak yet again when he was not heard before.

His long experience in the Orient ranked him as an observer of American interests in the Far East far more qualified in the sequence of events than Lattimore, Acheson, Service, Carter, and Jessup, and he recognized that an Asia in chains boded ill for the future of freedom in Europe as well. But there was never even the will to measure his views in the unfolding series of diplomatic blunders.

It is our tradition both in peace and war that the military bows before the higher word of the Executive. This has been a workable policy insuring unity of direction in a common effort. The repeated remonstrances of General MacArthur revealed deep-seated divergence with the views in Washington. Yet who will say in the days we see that Acheson is right and MacArthur wrong? The mandate of the people last November should have given point and meaning to the unfortunate episode.

It is regrettable that Mr. Truman resolved the impasse by summary dismissal. He might have understood with more patience the anguish of a commander in the field, with death and devastation all around, hindered and hampered by diplomacy in a situation without precedent like the Korean incident. He might, if he considered removal justifiable, have brought a show of unity to the land and preserved the respect of the world by appointing a noble American to higher honors in other avenues of service. The country in this hour has need of men of the character and integrity of MacArthur. This is no time to invite suspicion and deeper distrust by the callous disregard of one who has served America faithfully, wisely, and well.

National Disunity Worst Effect of MacArthur's Dismissal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following from the New York Herald Tribune of Tuesday, April 17, 1951:

NATIONAL DISUNITY WORST EFFECT OF MACARTHUR'S DISMISSAL

(By David Lawrence)

WASHINGTON, April 16.—President Truman his split America. He has stirred up such dissension and division among the American people that the disunity which prevails today transcends in importance even the issues which led to his dismissal of General MacArthur.

From all over the country the evidence is piling up that Mr. Truman has stirred up bitterness such as has not been noted since the days before the Civil War. The emotional reaction to the dismissal of General MacArthur has not been lessened by the strangely partisan behavior that has developed in Congress itself.

Thus, the Democrats at first resented the idea of a joint meeting to hear General MacArthur. Only upon further reflection did they decide to go along with plans to welcome the general.

Then came the sniping and the inuendoes. Mr. Truman, who told the Democrats gathered at the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner last Saturday night to put the national interest above personal interest, promptly followed his own political impulses and started off another wave of bitterness by his innuendo against General MacArthur.

VAUGHAN TO BE GREETER

Within the last 24 hours another incident has brought more irritation. It has been announced that, when General MacArthur returns to Washington after an absence of 14 years spent fighting for his country, the only man who is to be sent to the airport by the White House to greet him is General Vaughan.

No more stupid way of belittling the visit of General MacArthur could have been dreamed up at the White House. If this is a sample of the political judgment of the President or of his advisers, it indicates that the poor strategy which led to the peremptory firing of MacArthur has not been followed by any better understanding of the public temper.

There were half a dozen ways by which the President could have relieved General MacArthur of his command. There were many ways by which the split in this country could have been avoided. But what is much worse is that the Democratic Party in Congress has lined up solidly against General MacArthur and in defense of President Truman's arbitrary action. Conversely, the Republicans, seeing the whole thing taking on a political flavor, have themselves lined up in self-defense and in defense of General MacArthur.

TRAGEDY FOR AMERICA

Thus has the most important issue before the country—how to prevent a big-scale war—been turned over to political handling. This cannot bring a bipartisan approach to world policy. It cannot bring a united spirit behind any program of the administration. It is about the worst tragedy that could have befallen America.

President Truman must accept full responsibility for the blunder. He did not tell the party leaders in advance what he intended to do or how he intended to do it. He asked opinions from a few of the leaders, to be sure, and indicated that he had to do something. But it was one-man Government that finally functioned. One man in the White House, in a sudden decision late last Tuesday, decided to dismiss a general who had served his country well and to announce that decision to the press. One-man Government treated with contempt not only the valiant service of a great general but also the principle of affording a hearing to an important official engaged in an important assignment 8,000 miles away from home—a mission of civil as well as military management of an occupied country.

Mr. Truman could have sent for General MacArthur and could have threshed out the differences. If they could not have been resolved, Mr. Truman could have given MacArthur the choice of retiring or of being relieved forthwith.

FALSE ISSUE TRUMPED UP

A false issue is now being trumped up. It is an argument being advanced by the President that MacArthur wants to bring on a large-scale war and that Mr. Truman wants peace. Nothing could be more illustrative of the narrowness of vision that prevails in Washington today. For General MacArthur is sincerely convinced that the proposals he has championed mean peace. Many observers—not in the Military Establishment—believe an appeasement policy by the President and the Department of State will bring on a third world war with all its horrible consequences.

General MacArthur has been reported as opposing peace at any price. Actually he has not been doing any more than asking for a vigorous prosecution of a war in which 60,000 casualties already have been suffered by the United States—more casualties in 9 months than in the first full year of World War II for this country.

The effort to misrepresent MacArthur's position has begun. All the engines of publicity of the administration have been started. The President's gibe at MacArthur at the political dinner Saturday night was the beginning. Already the Democrats are getting ready to turn on the smears. These are sad days for America.

Attempted Regulation in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I submit for the RECORD a very pointed and powerful editorial which appeared in the Fox Valley Mirror, published at Carpentersville, Ill., and edited by a two-fisted American citizen, Leonard Fowler.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THESE AMERICANS ARE NOT BASTARDS; THEY ARE OUR SONS

Something more than a week ago the newspapers read by most of us here in the Middle West flung into our faces, in big, black type across their first pages, this imperiously insolent phrase:

"Aids at Washington consider edict to curb business profits."

Who is it that thus dares to speak of "edict"—when addressed to free American citizens?

Are they so woefully ignorant of the seignorial estate of an American's citizenship?

"Edict!" Do they know not the meaning of this abominable word?

An "edict," however, and whenever used, signifies a directive of supreme command; a rigid law, enunciated by an autocrat before whom all must bow and obey.

How dare, then, do these negligent writers speak of "edict"?

An "edict' is a rule of conduct imposed by an absolute monarch upon his subjects. It is a word that may be addressed solely to bondmen or to slaves.

From the terms of an "edict" there can be no manumission. "Edict" is the merciless tool of the relentless tyrant.

How foolhardy have these traitorous servants of ours grown?

"Whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad."

Must these war-mad, power-drunk servants of ours force us to spurn their meretricious dominion?

If that be true it is time that we repudiate the authority of this mutinous crew of predacious politicians who have seized upon the riches of our treasure and now pretend to assert a dictator's supremacy.

There are 145,000,000 sovereigns in this great land of ours, and not one owns the prerogative to speak for any other.

Before the law all Americans rightfully stand equal—rightfully so.

"Edict." I abhor the word.

How did they dare venture to employ so hateful a term?

Even though used with the utmost discretion, words are tricky tools, ambiguous and cunning; they deceive the unwary. Honeyed and melting, they bring us to the pitiless place of appeasement at Yalta, Potsdam, Tehran.

It is the lying words of beguiling pretenders that have ambushed us so that our fine young men fall by thousands to lie in windrows, at the harsh command of political tricksters. It is they—skilled in the wily use of our mother tongue—that have melted our emotions to provide fortunes for the Double Dealers so safely seated in their morass of chicane politics. They have lured us to our possible destruction because—

The supine and most corrupt amongst us have been given the authority to set up a monopoly of labor—the purchase price of labor's vote, turned into an illegal power to enforce greater excesses for their own gain and against the common weal.

Through the most fantastic injustices this same sordid crew at Washington, that would fix the prices of the products of man's labor, would deny an equal justice in dealing with capital, management, and material, without which not even labor can function.

They have snatched our boys from their schools and their books. In the infancy of their maturity our youth have been conscripted to form an army to fight the battles of other nations in Asia—10,000 miles from their homes. If permitted to continue, we shall be bankrupt in resources, broken in manpower, destitute of initiative. We shall rear a despondent generation—already surrendered to the bitter embrace of despair.

The newspapers suppress some of the more wanton facts, but the backwash of the news reeks with rumors of the perverts in the State Department, traitors dyed red with treason, who have sought to destroy this Nation and all that home and country stand for. That they may gratify their own whispered indulgences in the lewdness of lechery, they laugh at those who would pursue the pathway to the peaks of glory. Hence this wave of crime against women and children. Sensualists; corrupt weaklings, of the most dissolute depravity and lascivious tongue are drowning in their own slime the pure vision of home, the safety of woman's virtue, and man's sacred obligation to his children.

To march against, to destroy these, death itself would be a sweet sacrifice.

In the whole of Korea—not too much greater in size than the State of Illinois—there are 20 of those yellow devils to 1 of our own brave youngsters.

Even though each American lad be armed with a machine gun, that far land's 23,000,000 barbarians could stone our boys to death—were their rock pile big enough.

In the days when so few of us at Boston were dumping British tea, brought by British ships into Boston Harbor, held by the British Army, there was in the House of Commons, in England's Parliament, a brave man. History has named him "Mr. Pitt."

Pick out all the other Pitts, and there were many of them, but you will find in the annals of those who served Britain only one "Mr. Pitt." When he protested against the enforcement of the Stamp Act; when he decried the use of arms at Concord; when he condemned all harsh measures against the Americans, Mr. Pitt, all alone, had the courage to stand, shaking his finger at the King's bench, and send forth his clarion denunciation:

"Those Americans are not bastards; they are our sons."

Where, in this great Nation; in what place between these broad oceans, lives there another Mr. Pitt?

Pan American Day, 1951

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM C. LANTAFF
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. LANTAFF. Mr. Speaker, it has been our custom for many years to celebrate April 14 as Pan American Day. It affords an opportunity to demonstrate anew the friendship existing among the 21 American Republics, a friendship which has been cemented for more than half a century by the agreements signed at the various inter-American conferences. These agreements have formed the basis for the inter-American system. Of special importance are three of these, namely the Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance, commonly called the Rio Pact, which was signed at Rio de Janeiro in 1947; the Organization of American States; and the American Treaty on Pacific Settlement. The two latter were the result of negotiations at Bogotá in 1948. Great progress in Pan American relations is evidenced by the signing of these treaties which should be of great assistance in keeping peace in the Western Hemisphere and even throughout the world. The successful application of the Rio treaty in disputes in the Caribbean area has already given promise of a more peaceful future.

It is not only in political affairs that the American States have drawn closer together. The idea of the "good neighbor" has been extended to many other fields. As early as 1936 at the Inter-American Conference for the Maintenance of Peace, held at Buenos Aires, a treaty was drawn up for the exchange of professors, students, and teachers among the American nations. This treaty was called the Convention for the Promotion of Inter-American Cultural Relations and was subsequently ratified by 17 of the American Republics. The convention provides that every other year professors shall be exchanged, while every year each government will exchange two students selected according to an established procedure with each of the other countries. In addition to the United States, the participating countries are: Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, and Venezuela. Under this program and subsequent arrangements many students have learned the real meaning of inter-American friendship.

One of the most active organizations for inter-American cooperation is the Institute of Inter-American Affairs, whose activities are based on technical and scientific cooperation with the other nations of the hemisphere in order to strengthen the foundation of their freedom and ours. The programs of the Institute are developmental programs in which technicians from the United States work abroad with the technicians of the cooperating countries to increase the productivity of the farmers, wipe out disease, and to reduce ignorance. These cooperative programs have been outstandingly successful and each of the other participating governments has requested continuance of the programs and has progressively increased the proportion of its contribution. They have been helpful in strengthening democratic institutions and in counteracting the spread of communism throughout the Americas.

While inter-American treaties between the governments are desirable and essential and have brought about a system of cooperation unequaled elsewhere in any region of the world, it is interesting to note other ways by which good relations between the United States and Latin America have been cultivated and promoted.

In these days of almost universal air travel, many persons fly to the various Latin-American countries from the United States and conversely, many persons come to the United States from the States to the south of us. Miami, Fla., in my district, is a central point of departure or arrival for great numbers of these travelers. It is one of the largest air terminals in the United States. Its international airport is the most important serving the Caribbean area and Central and South America. Moreover, it probably serves more vacation travelers than any other airfield. It covers 2,555 acres, has hundreds of buildings, and employs many thousands of people. It has four runways, each of which is approximately 7,000 feet in length and all are 150 feet wide and hard-surfaced. It serves 14 scheduled air carriers and 44 nonscheduled. Probably no other airport takes care of as many unscheduled carriers; and many of these operate between the United States and the Latin-American and Caribbean areas.

English is the prevailing language at the International Airport but Spanish is almost as common. Signs in restaurants, shops, rest rooms, and other facilities appear in both languages. Arrivals and departures are announced in the two tongues. It is not unusual to hear Portuguese or any other half a dozen tongues in the waiting room.

Not only do many passengers arrive and depart from Miami International Airport but tons of mail and even greater tonnage of cargo are handled each year. Much of this is from or bound to some Latin-American country. It has been designated an airport of entry by the Treasury Department. In 1949 customs agents collected more duty on airborne goods here than at all the other airports in the Nation combined. A separate postal station has been set up since the war to handle the postal business. Mail going out of the country is sorted and quickly sent on its way without having to go through the regular Miami post office.

Pan American World Airways has its overhaul and maintenance shops here. They are the largest in the world. Pan American planes fly to all the nations of Latin America, affording quick and reliable transportation. There is no doubt that this has done much to further inter-American understanding since it has made it possible for many people from all of these nations to visit the United States and for Americans to travel southward with great ease and speed.

Florida was originally settled by the Spanish and many Florida inhabitants are descended from these early settlers. Naturally, therefore, the people of my State have a warm affinity for our neighbors in Latin America, many of whom are also descended from these early explorers. They have many common interests and Spanish-speaking peoples are given a cordial welcome in Florida.

A number of inter-American centers were established in various parts of the United States in the early forties under the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs. These centers proved to be of great benefit in implementing the good neighbor policy. They afforded an opportunity for citizens of one American country to learn more about the history, culture, geography, and trade of the other American nations. Such a cultural and trade center has been established at Miami, which is already the focus for so much inter-American activity. There is no doubt that this center when completed will further promote the cordial friendship among the American nations.

We of south Florida salute our American neighbors on this Pan-American Day and join in the hope that the fellowship and friendship existing between the freedom loving nations of the Western Hemisphere will serve as an inspiration to the other nations of the world.

Jefferson-Jackson Day Dinner Speech

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD BOLLING
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, the following address was delivered by Mrs. India Edwards, vice chairman, Democratic National Committee, and director, women's division, at the National Guard Armory, Washington, D. C., on April 14, 1951:

Tonight I am the representative of the millions upon millions of women who four times voted for Franklin D. Roosevelt for President and who 3 years ago voted for Harry Truman to continue to be our President. Women who voted Democratic in 1948 were not, to put it bluntly, buying a pig in a poke for President Truman had been demonstrating his brand of leadership ever since he took office in 1945 when Roosevelt died.

Women who voted Democratic in 1948 knew they were voting for a President who courageously would carry on the fight for peace and a better life for all, which is the goal of every woman, be she white, yellow or black, a college graduate or illiterate, whatever her status, occupation or profession.

Remember that the great statues of peace, justice, law and order are the faces and forms of women; that the great torch of liberty is held aloft in the hands of a woman. I have never had the misfortune to meet a woman who did not abhor war, who did not feel that wars never have settled anything. But this does not mean that women are idealistically impractical or that they are appeasers. No, they know that when evil forces are at large, they must be destroyed and sometimes it is necessary to use force to destroy them. But women know that if our civilization is to survive we must wage peace with the same energy and crusading devotion with which we have waged war when it has been thrust upon us. Women know that President Truman has the same abhorrence of war, the same desire to avoid a third world war that they have.

I believe that women all over this land were encouraged when they heard the President simply and solemnly state the far-eastern policy of the United States last Wednesday night. Women everywhere, even in Russia and the other countries behind the iron curtain, if the Voice of America could reach of them, must have been impressed with his sincerity and the rational policy he was enunciating. Let us hope that the Voice of America soon will be a strong voice, clearly heard behind the iron curtain and that we, as a unified people, will use every means within our power to make the Russian people believe that we honestly want true peace, that we do not seek war and that we would rather use our vast resources and power to build a decent world than to destroy any part of the world.

The President made it clear Wednesday night that the United States and the United Nations will not take action that might start a third world war, but that they will resist aggression. They are fighting in Korea as a warning to the Communists that the free nations will and can defend free people. Fighting in Korea may have averted a third world war; it could be that the reason we can meet here tonight, unafraid that enemy planes might drop bombs on us while we dine, is because our President had the courage to send our troops into Korea and because he has the courage to refuse to allow a military commander to take action that might inflame the Communists into starting a third world war.

On Wednesday night, President Truman warned that the Communist rulers may take further action which will spread the conflict. "They have that choice," he said, "and with it the awful responsibility for what may follow."

So, I say to you, Mr. President, and the 5,000 other Democrats who are here tonight, women everywhere can have renewed hope for eventual peace because you, as the Chief Executive and the Commander in Chief of the Nation have the same profound devotion to peace—peace with honor, peace not just for our time but for all time.

We thank God that we have a President who will fight for peace, who will not be swayed by those who place politics above our national security; who will not be intimidated by those who would sacrifice peace for their own political ambitions.

Tonight, as we pay honor to the founders of the Democratic Party, Jefferson and Jackson, let us salute our great President who is carrying out the principles of Jefferson and Jackson.

Our children and grandchildren will be free to assemble as we are assembled tonight because we had Roosevelt in the White House for 12 years and because we have had Harry Truman there for 6 of the most perilous years in our history. And we will have him there for 5 more, please God.

A Tribute to Gen. Douglas MacArthur by Alfonso Mirabal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON
OF COLORADO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a tribute to Gen. Douglas MacArthur by my friend Alfonso Mirabal.

There being no objection, the tribute was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A TRIBUTE TO GEN. DOUGLAS MACARTHUR
(By Alfonso Mirabal)

It is proper and appropriate that at the termination of a lifelong service rendered our country by a famous contemporary personality that a tribute be paid him.

Words seem very inadequate, inept and ineffectual to fully honor the leadership and aspiration that this great military leader and statesman gave to all Americans throughout the years of ordeal and wars, in which he devoted his life, and to which so willingly he served his fellowmen.

A brief review of his life is a review of "Americana."

Douglas MacArthur was born at Little Rock, Ark., on January 26, 1880.

His military career began with his graduation from the United States Military Academy at West Point, where he graduated with the highest honors in 1903.

The first assignment was with the Engineers Corps in the Philippine Islands. It was in these islands MacArthur many years later led one of the most dramatic defenses in military history.

In 1914 MacArthur made a creditable and fine record in an expedition to Mexico.

He was selected as Chief of the Censorship Division when the United States entered World War I. His work was of such high merits that he was promoted to the rank of colonel in August of 1917. He asked for active duty and soon became Chief of Staff of the noted Rainbow Division in October, 1917. This division was one of the roughest, hard-hitting forces in the war area. In February of 1918 he received a citation for gallantry from the commander of the French Seventh Army, and the next June he was promoted to brigadier general. He was placed in command of the Eighty-fourth Infantry Brigade, which broke the Kriembilde line north of Verdun in October; he next commanded the Rainbow Division. He led it through the Meuse-Argonne offensive and in the advance of Sedan, and later took it to the Rhine as part of the Army of Occupation.

In June, 1919, he became the youngest officer ever to be honored with the superintendency of the Military Academy at West Point.

In 1922 he was assigned to command the Manila District.

He was made a Major General in 1925—being the youngest with that rank in the Army. So, again in 1930, when he was selected as Chief of Staff, United States Army, with the temporary rank of General, he was the youngest man ever appointed to that post. As Chief of Staff he was military adviser to several presidents.

In 1935 he was granted leave to help the Philippine Commonwealth prepare its national defenses.

At his own request he retired in 1937. His retirement, however, was not for long, as his knowledge of military strategy was widely recognized as unsurpassed. He was recalled to duty with the appointment of commander general of all United States troops in the Far East and promoted to the rank of lieutenant general. He became a full general in December of 1941. In March of 1942 he received the Congressional Medal of Honor.

Perhaps one of the most notable events, still fresh in the minds of Americans, occurred in March 1942, when General MacArthur on the direct orders of President Roosevelt relinquished his post on Bataan and made a dramatic 2,000-mile trip by plane, submarine, and motor torpedo boat to Australia, where he assumed the supreme command of the land, sea and air forces of the United Nations in the southwest Pacific during World War II. He was accompanied on this most historic trip by his wife and young son Arthur. It is now history how he conquered one island after another to fulfill his dramatic vow to return to the Philippines and forcefully retake it from the enemy. While the whole world of free, liberty-loving nations prayed, he led the troops in hand-to-hand combat into Leyte. At the head of his troops he waded through the surf in that famous battle. Even grade-school youngsters today can relate how MacArthur, after taking the Philippines as commander of the allied forces, spearheaded the war against Japan. Aboard the battleship Missouri he in company with our other military leaders signed the formal surrender in Tokyo Bay. Over and over again he has set aside any regard for his personal safety by going to the front in the battles in Korea as was his custom in the two World Wars.

In the present Far East war, MacArthur had a fourfold duty. He was supreme allied occupation commander in Japan, United Nations commander in chief for Korea, United States commander in chief for the Far East, and commanding general of the United States Army in the Far East.

Jefferson-Jackson Day Dinner Speech

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD BOLLING
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, the following address was delivered by the Honorable William M. Boyle, Jr., chairman of the Democratic National Committee, at the National Guard Armory, Washington, D. C., on April 14, 1951:

On behalf of the Democratic National Committee I welcome you to the 1951 Jefferson-Jackson dinner. I thank each one of you for your attendance—for your enthusiasm, and for your party loyalty.

I extend special thanks to the members of the dinner committee for the long hours and hard work that have made this occasion so outstandingly successful under the chairmanship of a distinguished Democrat, the former Secretary of the Navy, John L. Sullivan, and the equally distinguished cochairman, the charming wife of the Secretary of Agriculture, Mrs. Charles F. Brannan, and under the stewardship of our able treasurer, the Honorable Sidney Salomon, Jr.

Because of their efforts and your constant and loyal support, my job as chairman has been made a pleasant one.

We are meeting tonight at a serious and solemn hour. We are gathered to rededicate ourselves to the principles of two great Americans—Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson.

However, we do not meet solely as partisan members of a political party. Instead, we gather together as Americans to join hands with all other Americans—to pray—to work—to fight for the security of our country.

Your meeting here in a spirit of patriotism and unity is a tribute to the courage and leadership of our great President, Harry S. Truman.

At no time in the history of this Nation have the words "Let us unite with one heart and one mind" meant so much as they do today. These were the words of Jefferson 150 years ago. These are the sentiments of our great leader, President Harry S. Truman.

Thus we gather not merely to celebrate—not merely to achieve political aims—not as representatives of any partisan group—but as Americans who are concerned with the problems which confront our Nation and the world.

This is the hour in which we proudly point to our heritage as Americans. The founders of this Nation proved ready and willing to make any sacrifice for the good of the Nation and its people.

No sacrifice will be too great. We in our generation must meet whatever demands are made for the sake of our country, for the patriotic citizens to make for the security of the Nation.

When the security of this Nation is at stake there is no time for partisan politics.

Patriotism must come before politics.

The hour has passed when men may think in terms of pettiness. Selfishness, envy, and greed must not be part of the thinking of mankind if we are to save America, preserve our freedom, and give hope to a troubled world.

We need a single-minded unity in our determination to preserve our national integrity and our American way of life.

We have repeatedly asked for unity for all patriotic Americans regardless of political affiliations to work together for the security of our country and we continue to ask for unity.

We have borne with patience and, if necessary, we will continue to bear the abuse, slander, smears, and lies which some members of the minority party resort to in order to further their own selfish purposes.

These irresponsible attacks are not in the interest of America. President Truman has dedicated his very life toward the attainment of world peace—and he, like Andrew Jackson, Woodrow Wilson, and Franklin D. Roosevelt in their days, has had to endure the attacks of the powerful interests who use devious and underhanded means designed to mislead and confuse the American public.

But the American people have repeatedly proven themselves to be too well informed to be misled by such tactics.

In politics as in life itself, right will prevail. The American people know that the Democratic Party stands for what is right.

We must refuse to listen to the shrill voices of discontent and disunity. Those individuals who seek to sow seeds of distrust and to divide our people should feel the full weight of public condemnation.

The Democratic Party will hold intact the progress we have made for the benefit of the farmers, the workers, business and professional men and women, and for all the people in this country.

The Democratic Party will continue to be the party of the people as it has since the days of Jefferson and Jackson.

It has advanced under the stirring leadership of Woodrow Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt, and Harry Truman.

The fundamental issue of our time is the fight between freedom and Communist slavery. In this fight our country by the grace of God stands a free, prosperous, and strong Nation—we intend to keep it that way—and we will under the leadership of our great President, Harry S. Truman.

This is an hour in which men with firm convictions renew their belief in the democratic way of life—indeed in their faith in Almighty God. The faith of our fathers must be found in our hearts—in our minds and souls—as we stand steadfast today in support of our leaders.

In this hour of peril we who are part of the Democratic Party have no desire for partisan political advantage and we ask all patriotic Americans to join with us to give to America its greatest strength and thereby bring about world peace.

America will win through this period of danger. I pray God that the day will soon come when the blessings of peace and prosperity will be made secure to every person in this land, and when the bountiful production of all the great industries of the world will be fully available for the peaceful advancement of mankind instead of for destruction.

These are our objectives. I ask all Americans to join with us tonight in support of our great leader in this fight to save the world.

Proposed Grant of $150,000,000 to Israel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, the Louisville Times of April 4 published an editorial entitled "Israel Deserves Our Assistance in Its Time of Trouble." This is a very fine editorial, from an outstanding newspaper. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ISRAEL DESERVES OUR ASSISTANCE IN ITS TIME OF TROUBLE

The bill introduced in the House of Representatives this week to grant $150,000,000 to Israel points up again for us far removed from the scene (those who are there need no reminder) how desperate is the situation in that newest and most hopeful of countries. Surrounded by hostile peoples, overpopulated in relation to production, suffering from an inflation which makes ours look mild and torn internally by conflicting viewpoints, Israel is in a serious condition.

The bill granting the $150,000,000 was introduced by Representative MCCORMACK, House Democratic leader, and thus presumably is an administration measure. But even its passage would go only a short way toward solving Israel's trouble. Some idea of the magnitude of that problem can be gained from the fact that the Israeli government is seeking in the next 3 years a development fund of $1,500,000,000, including a $500,000,000 bond issue in this country.

According to Moshe Brilliant in a New York Times dispatch early this year, Israel's principal economic problems, "the gap between consumption and production, the adverse balance of trade and the threat of inflation," result largely from the doubling of the country's population (to 1,350,000) in 2½ years, the growth of the Arab minority through territorial expansion and the fact that Israel's neighbors are hostile.

It is the population expansion which particularly interests us because, in a sense, Israel was formed to give homeless Jews a home. This she has done and is doing. In 1950 alone, 170,000 persons entered the country. At the end of the year 40,000 were living in immigrant camps, dependent on the Jewish Agency while awaiting work and living accommodations.

Even in a naturally rich country expansion at this rate would create enormous problems. But Israel is not rich. Hal Lehrman, writing in Commentary some time ago, said: "The simple truth, to begin with, is that no more than a quarter to a third of Israel's economy can be agricultural. This country must sell abroad in order to buy food; in the long run, it must export or die." But in order to export it needs to import raw materials, machines, and money. It needs money to develop new territories, new industries, new factories, new housing accommodations.

As a result of the current economic instability, private sources of money are drying up. Lehrman, in the article mentioned previously, said, "The high costs of labor, fuel, electric power and transport, the low level of mechanization, the Israeli pound's lopsided rate of exchange all go into the making of a headache which many prospective foreign Jewish investors show themselves reluctant to chance for the sake of uncertain and slender profits."

With Israel importing about seven times as much as she exports and with private capital becoming reluctant to invest in those fundamentals which would ease that imbalance, it is no wonder that Israel has been seeking assistance from the United States Government. Nor is there any doubt that we should give all the help we can to aid that country for whose founding we are partly responsible.

The Anglo-American Partnership

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. IRVING M. IVES
OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject, the Anglo-American partnership, by Lawrence Hunt, of New York City, at the fifty-fifth annual convention of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, in Philadelphia, on Saturday, April 7, 1951.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, members of the academy, ladies and gentlemen, I am highly honored and deeply grateful for the opportunity to address the annual convention of this great institution about some of the questions for which we are seeking honest and sensible answers.

One of the major lessons from Asia and the chief lesson of our times is the supreme necessity, for the survival of the free world, of our Anglo-American partnership.

Today Russia has a great hope and a great objective—that Britain and America will fail to win the battle for freedom throughout the world. Her leaders shrewdly count, not only on their own skill, but on our follies, to disunite us; they count on the reactionaries who never learn; they count perhaps even more on the pseudo intellectuals, the doctrinaires, and the perverse perfectionists with their frantic lust for self-deception. The Communists today, like the Nazis yesterday, know that if they can divide Britain and America they can conquer the world. To divide Britain and America—that is their supreme hope, as it is the supreme hope of all the enemies of man's freedom.

Will the Russian Communists succeed?

If the outcome depended on our frustrated and glamour-seeking politicians and our pseudo intellectuals, the answer would be "Yes." There is no use denying that they have done some harm and will do much more harm if they can. But those people do not speak for America.

It is true that there is an extreme but very small left-wing group in Britain which does not like the Anglo-American partnership and is unfairly critical of America. But the responsible leaders of both the Labor government and the Conservative opposition have repudiated these extremists and have expressed, again and again and again, inside and outside of Parliament, their understanding and appreciation of America's efforts to protect the free nations against Soviet imperialism. They have expressed, again and again and again, the British people's gratitude for the help of their American partner.

Here in America we have been deluged in recent months with a constant stream of propaganda about Brition trading with the enemy, Britain's appeasement of China, and about the British dragging their feet. There has been no serious effort here, comparable to that in England, by the responsible leaders of both our parties, to refute this vilification and abuse which can only give aid and comfort to Soviet communism; no real attempt by our leaders in or out of politics to tell the American people the truth about our British partner, to urge understanding and fair play, even when there are differences in methods about meeting the menace of Soviet imperialism.

The upshot of it all is that the thinking of many honest people has become confused, their nerves jangled and their emotions jaded. Even supposedly intelligent people—even lawyers—frequently stop thinking these days and mentally go to sleep with a slogan or a catch phrase.

The chief purpose of my remarks today is to suggest briefly that we question some of these abusive criticisms, and, however painful to the prejudices or disturbing to the ignorance of some Americans, that we try—really try—to be fair to our British partner. Without fair play toward others, we shall become a mentally corrupt people. Without fair play, our Anglo-American partnership will ultimately fail. Without fair play, our civilization will go down in ruin.

Of course I do not mean that there should be any suppression of honest differences among the members of our English-speaking family. Advice to other nations has always been the greatest American export, in volume if not in value, and we must expect and even welcome a fair balance of trade in that respect, as in others. But in these days of high tension we have what Anthony Eden calls "the responsibility to choose our words." Our propagandists for world war III are perversely imitating the Russian tactics of vilification and abuse, even toward our stanchest ally, about comparatively minor differences. These Russian tactics have not been persuasive with the free peoples of the world, and their imitation by people in this country obscures America's finest purposes and tends to thwart her best efforts to avoid another war.

Now about Britain "trading with the enemy." That accusation is chiefly concerned with Hong Kong's trade with China and Russia. Let's face the facts. Hong Kong applies the same controls to trade with China as are applied by Britain. This trade is nearly all in goods and materials produced in many other countries. The export to Communist countries of nearly 300 articles, including munitions, chemicals, machine tools, etc., is absolutely forbidden, and the export of another hundred articles is carefully restricted, and the export of still another hundred articles is subject to the constant supervision of the British Government.

Many of the free nations are receiving in this trade with Russia and China materials necessary to their own economic strength and essential to their ability to rearm and defend themselves against Communist aggression. It is helpful to note that the occupying authorities in Japan recently accepted Chinese conditions for the continuation of the import of coke coal from certain mines in north China in exchange for the equal value of Japanese cotton yarn on a barter basis. Such an exchange makes sense under present world conditions; is this "trading with the enemy"?

Let's face the facts.

About one-third of Hong Kong's trade is with China. In the first 11 months of 1950 about $340,000,000 in trade went to China and about $144,000,000 to the United States. There are now about two and one-half to three million inhabitants of Hong Kong as compared with 600,000 in 1945. If that crowded little island, an outpost of democratic civilization, is not permitted to conduct legitimate trade, the consequent economic collapse and civil strife would make almost certain its conquest from within. It is true that Russia is buying some rubber from the rubber producing countries, including some of the British Commonwealth countries. But the United States is taking eight times as much of the total world rubber production as Russia and 10 times what China purchased last year.

Again I say, let's face the facts.

Britain and America are not at war with China or Russia. Our policy is to avoid war with them. That is what our political leaders are constantly telling us and the rest of the world. We must assume that they are telling the truth. It is true that a few noisy fanatics, possibly some stock speculators who are worried about a peace scare, and some strangely perverse folk with the gruesome faith that the atom bomb will solve the major problems of a turbulent world, actually think that a third world war is imminent and inevitable, and even desirable. But the American people don't want another world war, and they do want their Government to avoid such a war.

An economic blockade of China would be a major act of war, an act which would assume that war with China, a world war, had begun. Our British partner does not believe that such a blockade could be effective, and it would, of course, create more difficulties than it would solve. Would such a blockade try to prevent Indian cotton and Pakistan jute and Indonesian rubber from getting to China's ports? Would we sink Indian ships carrying goods and materials? Would such a blockade make China more or less dependent upon Russia's aid and support?

One of the hardest tasts of statesmanship is to keep local wars from becoming major conflicts; to end local wars, not extend them. That is what all the free peoples, including the American people, desperately want. But we Americans must make our actions fit our words, or the Voice of America will be a monumental sham.

Whatever we do, let's stop talking nonsense about Britain trading with the enemy, and let's try to use some of the common sense which we are so sure we possess.

Our propagandists for a third world war and many self-deluded perfectionists are denouncing Britain's so-called appeasement of China, particularly because Britain has recognized the Communist Chinese Government and has supported the admission of Communist China to the United Nations. Again I say, let's face the facts, painful though they be. The fact is, much as we and Britain dislike it, that the Communist Chinese Government is in control, as far as any Chinese Government ever has been, of the mainland of China. America recognizes, as Britain recognizes, the governments of Russia; of Poland, whose United Nations representative is on our program; of other Russian satellite countries; of Yugoslavia, which boasts that its communism is purer than the Russian brand; of Spain, Argentina, and other governments with an unpleasant odor. Why not China? Diplomatic recognition, as our British friends point out, does not mean approval, but simply means the recognition of a fact—even an unpleasant fact.

Russia and her satellites, and some other nations we do not like or admire, are members of the United Nations, which is a world organization embracing all kinds of nations, and not a defensive alliance such as the Atlantic Pact. If Russia and its satellites are members of the United Nations, why not Communist China?

Our British partner has no illusions about the Communists in China nor any hope that tomorrow, or next week, or next month, Communist China will become a democracy or will sever her present ties with Russia. But the British do believe—and I submit that we Americans should also believe—that in the long run there is a chance that China will become less dependent on Russia and that her national interests in the future, as in the past, will keep her from becoming a vast Russian satellite without a life of her own—another Russian slave state. Hard as it may be, we should try to take the long view and not resort or succumb to the slogans and catchphrases of our propagandists for world war III.

But the most unscrupulous and the most malicious accusation by these propagandists is that the British are dragging their feet.

Again I say, let's face the facts.

In proportion to her population—one-third of ours—Britain has today as many men in her armed forces combating or restraining Communist aggression as has the United States. Her forces are fighting or are on guard at 19 key points throughout the world. Anthony Eden has pointed out in the April issue of Foreign Affairs that these British forces are stretched in relation to the availability of trained men and modern arms more tautly than those of any other country, ally, or enemy. The British were fighting in Malaya for 2 years before the Communist aggression in Korea last June. Britain has had universal military training for men 18 to 26 since 1947. We are still talking about it. The British people, for more than 10 years, have voluntarily submitted to a rationing system, in some respects severer today than ever before, unknown and perhaps even unbearable in this country. And why? To repair the awful damage of war, to enable their country to pay its own way, to meet its obligations, and to play its part in the defense of the freedom of mankind. One egg and 8 pence worth of meat a week.

Who are dragging their feet?

The results of this self-restraint and self-sacrifice on the part of the British people should be reassuring to their friends and astounding to future historians. Our partner has achieved solvency at least for the moment. She has raised her industrial production 50 percent and her exports 70 percent above the prewar level. Proportionately, she is doing at least as much as America in meeting the menace of Soviet communism.

Nor is this the whole story. It is much easier for a rich man to contribute 15 percent of his income to worthy causes than it is for a man of modest means. In the one case there may be the sacrifice of some luxuries, in the other of bare necessities. The true test is how much a man is doing as compared with what he can do.

Who are dragging their feet?

You can't expect a Republican like me to sing hosannas to the British Labor Party. Many of us Americans have grave doubts about the doctor's prescription now being administered to the British people, but I have not the slightest doubt that they will survive both the malady and the remedy. Moreover, we must admit, again in the spirit of fair play, that many of the measures adopted by the British Labor Government during the past 6 years would also have been adopted in substance by the Conservatives. And as regards the main problems of foreign policy, the British people are united. As Winston Churchill remarked in the House of Commons on the eve of Prime Minister Attlee's recent visit to America—"Here in Britain, and I doubt not throughout the British Empire and Commonwealth of Nations, we always follow a very simple rule which has helped us in maintaining the safety of this country—the worse things get the more we stand together."

Armament is not enough to save the world. That is one of the chief lessons from Asia. Our British partner knows that, and despite all the sacrifices and hardships of her people, Great Britain and the other members of the Commonwealth are already making, under the Colombo plan, the most constructive and statesmanlike effort of our generation to preserve and to develop the democratic way of life in Asia.

The Colombo plan, as you know, is a comprehensve 6-year program for economic development in South and South East Asia which was drawn up by seven nations of the Commonwealth—Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Ceylon, India, and Pakistan. The plan was first proposed in January 1950, and after several other meetings was finally announced last November. It covers an area of 570,000,000 people—one-quarter of the world's population. Its aim is to put 13,000,000 more acres under cultivation, to increase grain production by 10 percent, and electricity generating capacity by 67 percent. The total 6-year cost is estimated at about $5,500,000,000, of which $2,200,000,000 will be raised within the Commonwealth countries in Asia, exclusive of their sterling balances, and $3,300,000,000 will be raised by external financial aid, including sterling releases and outright gifts. Britain has already pledged $40,000,000, including sterling releases of nearly $700,000,000 dollars, and will probably make an outright gift in the near future of $150,000,000. A central agency known as the Council for Technical Cooperation, has alreardy begun operations at its headquarters in Colombo, Ceylon. Representatives from other Asiatic countries such as Burma, Indonecia, Thailand and Indochina are working in close cooperation with the Commonwealth countries. What have we done? We are appropriating about $35,000,000 for our point 4 program.

Who are "dragg ng their feet"?

We could participate in the Colombo plan on a bilateral or a multilateral basis and contribute the balance necessary to achieve its goal. Or we could, in a spirit of partnership with the British Commonwealth, work out some feasible plan for dovetailing a greatly expanded point 4 program with the Colombo plan. What the American people must realize is the urgent need for such a great undertaking. The problems of Asia can't be solved by radio broadcasts, by dropping atomic bombs, or by letting hundreds of thousands of people starve to death because American politicians are piqued by the failure of Indian politicians to agree at all times as to the best methods of preserving a free and democratic world. The magnificent American effort under the Marshall plan helped save Europe from communism and helped restore her war-damaged economy. In Asia, the Anglo-American partnership must work literally "from the ground up" to prevent hundreds of millions of human beings from sinking even lower in the scale of living and from becoming a prey to Communist propaganda. Our British partner and her sister nations in the Commonwealth are leading the way to meet the most pressing problems of Asia. What will we do?

Perhaps we can get a suggestion from Thomas Jefferson.

You will remember that President Monroe wrote to Jefferson asking his advice about the British suggestion for what later became known as the Monroe Doctrine. On October 23, 1823, the author of the Declaration of Independence wrote to Monroe as follows:

"The question presented by the letters you have sent me is the most momentous which has ever been offered to my contemplation since that of Independence. * * * One nation, most of all, could disturb us in this proceeding; she now offers to lead, aid, and accompany us in it. By acceding to her proposition, we * * * bring her mighty weight into the scale of free government, and emancipate a continent at one stroke, which might otherwise linger long in doubt and difficulty. * * * With her on our side we need not fear the whole world."

"Emancipate a continent." With our British partner we did emancipate the South American Continent from the menace of the holy alliance. In the last war the Anglo-American partnership emancipated the continent of Europe. Together America and Britain, in these next few years, can emancipate the continent of Asia, including perhaps even China.

The skeptics and scoffers will again talk about rat holes. But they are not the kind kind of people who will save their own country or the world from disaster. They do not know, or do not want to know, the facts of life in the year of our Lord 1951.

What Britain and the other nations of the Commonwealth are doing is not charity or a mere stopgap measure to feed people one year and let them starve the next, but a program of self-help which, in terms of the objects to be achieved and the needs which must be met, will cost very little. If we are willing in one form or another to play our part, it will cost us less than one-tenth—less than one-twentieth—of what we propose to spend on armament during the next 2 years. Are we willing now, as Jefferson proposed long ago, to join our British partner in the emancipation of a continent? Or shall we Americans drag our feet?

We need not only a Voice of America but a voice to America—a voice which will tell us that the desperately hungry peoples of the world must have the means to earn their daily bread, that the starving masses of Asia cannot eat the Constitution, that noisy boasts of American democracy do not satisfy the empty bellies of children, that we cannot long enjoy a paradise inside of America with hell outside.

The task will not be easy. We Americans will continue to be denounced as "greedy imperialists." We are finding that criticism a little hard to bear, because it's not true and possibly because it was once the favorite epithet of many Americans when Britain alone was doing the thankless jobs of the world. At any rate, our British friends can assure us that the first hundred years are the hardest.

When you hear or read any more malicious nonsense about the British "dragging their feet," I suggest that you look at the record of yesterday as well as at the facts of today.

Much as some Americans would like to forget it, the record shows that, in the first 2 years of the last World War, we were a mentally confused and spiritually sick people. Our right-wing isolationists thought we could do business with Hitler, our left-wing isolationists thought it was an "imperialist war" until Russia was attacked, and most Americans hardly knew what to think. Even after the invasion of Holland and Belgium and the slaughter of Rotterdam, even after the fall of France, even after the Battle of Britain, even while nearly the whole European Continent writhed under the torture of German tyranny, even while the British Commonwealth stood utterly alone, even then both the candidates for the Presidency in the election of 1940, despite their obvious sympathies, deemed it politically necessary to assure the people, in the most fervent terms, that the United States would not enter the war "except in the case of attack."

And yet, throughout that dismal period of doubt and delay, the American people did slowly but surely come to realize their danger and their need of Britain for their very salvation. We knew, deep down, that if Britain were conquered, the very soul of western civilization would be gone forever. British courage gave us good cheer and strengthened our hearts. Dunkerque, Britain's greatest defeat, helped us on the hard road to moral recovery. So did the Battle of Britain, her greatest victory. The blitz helped. The fires of London rekindled the American conscience.

Yes, we also did a magnificent job. I simply suggest that we look at both the record of yesterday and the facts of today so that we can understand and appreciate the kind of partner we shall have in the long, hard days ahead.

In the future, there will be world conferences, and many of them will fail. There will be all kinds of international formulas and they will fade away. There will be glittering slogans and they will be forgotten.

But if the American and the British peoples have faith in each other's purpose, hope in each other's future, and charity toward each other's shortcomings, then, as friends, as partners, and as allies, they can go forward together into the future, as far as the human eye can see, in dignity, in freedom, and, let us hope, in peace.

Jefferson-Jackson Day Dinner Speech

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD BOLLING
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, the following address was delivered by the Honorable John L. Sullivan, chairman of the Jefferson-Jackson Day Dinner Committee, at the National Guard Armory, Washington, D. C., on April 14, 1951:

It is for me a very great honor to welcome so many real Democrats to the 1951 Jefferson-Jackson Day Dinner in Washington. We meet here on the day after the two hundred and eighth anniversary of the birth of one of America's greatest Presidents, Thomas Jefferson. He and Andrew Jackson—the other great President in whose memory we meet tonight—for more than 100 years have furnished a great part of the inspiration, the courage, and the vision which has lighted the way for a greater America and a far better world.

It is a real thrill for a man from New Hampshire to see over 5,000 Democrats gathered under one roof. We don't have Democratic crowds quite this size in the Granite State. But we have just as much enthusiasm and just as much courage.

Before proceeding to introduce the distinguished guests at this head table there is one thought that I would like to give this audience.

For the past several months in the newspapers, on the radio, and through all the media of communications, the American people have witnessed a constant barrage of charges and countercharges involving varying derelictions of duty by Federal employees and former employees. Some of these incidents have been displeasing and repugnant to us all. However large the organization of Government becomes, any deficiency of malfeasance in the discharge of a public trust by even the least of our public officials or employees is a matter of concern to us all. Insofar as such derelictions are proved, they must be punished, and the offenders removed from the Government. In public affairs, public self-criticism is the mark of a progressive, dynamic democracy. Today such self-criticism and searching examination is very properly being carried on at great lengths. Whenever it is motivated by a desire for improvement it is all to the good.

It would be well, however, for us to cultivate a sense of proportion, and to evaluate the relative importance of these incidents. We must remind ourselves and our friends of the truly great issues which face the world today, of the truly great progress that has been achieved in the last few years toward preventing the outbreak of world war III and preserving the peace of the world. We must do this frequently lest these issues that are of paramount importance to us all, and which will determine the kind of world in which our children and our children's children will live, become obscured in the minutiae of the moment.

I ask you to turn your minds back 4 years to March 1947. At that time the most optimistic among us felt that Greece had been lost to the free world, that Turkey was in dire jeopardy, that Italy was ready to fall into the hands of the Communists. Yugoslavia was the brightest satellite in the Communist crown, and the future of freedom and democracy in France was most uncertain to say the best. What a difference has come over the face of Western Europe in these few short years because of changes in the viewpoint, in the hope of the people of those five countries. Great comfort and new courage was born to all the freedom-loving peoples on both sides of the iron curtain. This was not just an accident. This new birth of freedom and hope from the Bosporus to the English Channel in very large part was due to the vision, courage, determination, and the leadership of the one man who, as head of the greatest nation in the free world today, bears the lion's share of the responsibility of preserving freedom and democracy wherever it now exists—our great President, Harry S. Truman.

The Greek-Turkish-aid program, the Marshall plan and its effective implementation through the Economic Cooperation Administration, the North Atlantic Treaty with its mutual-defense-assistance program are among the things which our President has achieved. These are the things which flow from the Truman doctrine. These are the things that restored hope in the world. They are the things that will be remembered in this world 100 years from tonight.

America's resolute resistance to the blockade in Berlin and our defense of South Korea in the face of cruel aggression prove once and for all that the champions of freedom can and do stand up and fight.

Realizing what Korea is costing us in the lives of fine young men and the disruption of our economy, some people today question the wisdom of our decision to resist aggression in Korea. There will never be any doubt in my mind that this decision was right.

It so happens that I was in Europe when the North Koreans crossed the thirty-eighth parallel. During those 48 hours in which our Government remained silent while going through the procedure of the last-resort provisions of the United Nations Charter, the confidence of Western Europeans in America melted like butter in the noonday sun. On all sides I was told that this was a repetition of our failure to follow through on the League of Nations after World War I. Things looked pretty grim. If the doubt in America's integrity and resolution had contintued for another week, Western Europe would have been lost to democracy for generations, and the cooperation we are now receiving from the Atlantic Pact nations could never have been achieved.

However, 2 days after the invasion of Korea the President of the United States in a ringing statement announced our resistance to aggression in such clear and unmistakable terms that people all over Western Europe were lifted from the depths of despondency to the heights of hope. Well may that decision of the President of the United States be recorded by the historians of the twenty-first century as the turning point in the world conflict between the powers of evil and the friends of freedom.

The people of America, knowing that the fate of civilization, that human freedom, and the dignity of man is at stake, will in my opinion support in 1952 the party that has waged for many long years such a heroic struggle against oppression and aggression, the party that has fought such an enlightened and courageous fight in behalf of all those things that make life worth the living, the party of Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, Woodrow Wilson, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and Harry S. Truman.

Conditions in the Government Departments

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Kansas City Star of April 12, 1951, entitled "It Stinks—Clean It Up."

This editorial has been sent to me by a number of people in my State indicating that it has made a profound impression. They ask: Cannot Congress do something constructive about the deplorable conditions existing in the executive branch of our Government, as shown here?

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IT STINKS—CLEAN IT UP

The furor over dismissal of General MacArthur should not obscure what is, if anything, an even more serious matter.

It is the gross political maneuvering, the wire pulling, the use of influence in dipsensing jobs and favors, the confusion, the inefficiency, and the waste that dominate far too much of the Washington scene right up to the top. It is the evidence of the exceedingly low standards of conduct that govern a good section of the Nation's public life today.

And this at a time when people are being called upon to labor and to sacrifice, to support the program of mobilization and defense, and to be on their guard against any complacency or let-down at a time of stress when the Nation's security is gravely endangered.

The American people are ready to do their full part in mobilization and the rest. They are not ready to tolerate the mismanagement and the rottenness that are presently being laid out before their eyes.

For added to the exposures by the Fulbright committee investigating the RFC, the Kefauver committee investigating the underworld and its political links in the big cities, the revelations of influence peddling, and the work of the 5-percenters along with the scandals in the handling of surplus war materials—added to all that is the amazing account of former Gov. M. E. Thompson, of Georgia, and his experience with the job business in Washington.

Here was a loyal Democrat with a fine record of public service who presumably was being called in to take over a responsible position with the Office of Price Stabilization. Although he was not hard up for a Government job, Thompson responded with a feeling of partiotic duty.

To his consternation he found on reporting to the OPS that he couldn't be seen by Director DiSalle but instead must report to the office of the Democratic National Committee. That political agency evidently was serving as the clearinghouse for important jobs and the proper official agencies were being short-circuited. But after his discovery that another man was being considered for the same job, Thompson agreed to a reshuffle of his supposed duties and then waited for a call to take over.

He waited till the patience of any conscientious man would have been exhausted. He was being paid his salary and $53.48 a day for expenses—yet for 12 weeks had never been consulted or called upon for any official work. His response was to resign and expose the whole mess, denouncing the "deplorable conditions in the national administration" that make party loyalty and patriotism impossible at the same time, and declaring there "are thousands upon thousands" of job holders on the Federal payrolls in Washington and throughout the country who "are rendering no service."

There in the whole shameful record is the grave situation that confronts the American people in a time of stress. It's a call for Nation-wide protest and a demand for correction—if it can be had under the conditions that exist today. In time, if not soon, it will be had. For public indignation will mount until a clean-up has been achieved in the name both of decency and the Nation's well-being.

Public Acclaim for MacArthur—Public Disgust for Truman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, the interests of the American people and the United States have once again been subordinated to the scheming machinations of foreign interests, and Anglophile Americans, led by Secretary of State Dean Acheson and President Truman, and a great American patriot and military leader, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, has been purged from his command.

What manner of administration do we have in America today? Who are these men in the highest positions in the land serving? Have they forgotten their oath of office, which pledges them to represent the people of the United States? Have they ever heard of the Declaration of Independence and the American Revolution which established the sovereignty of the United States?

General MacArthur had the courage as an American citizen and as a professional soldier to face facts realistically in this period of world crisis, and to report bluntly to his Government and to the American people that the time has come to end this state of "war which is not war" in Korea, and either attack the enemy at every point or withdraw.

For his patriotic stand General MacArthur has been dismissed. He has been dismissed because of criticism from a foreign nation, a nation whose first consideration is its own self-interests and now how many American boys are spilling their blood on Korean soil.

The people of America are outraged at this latest Truman blunder, a blunder which may cost far more than anyone can today estimate in American lives and resources. At a time when the administration has again and again stressed the need for unity in our land, Mr. Truman has again demonstrated his elephantine tact by the removal of General MacArthur, the most effective action he could possibly have taken at this time to create Nation-wide disunity in our land.

Wires are pouring into Washington demanding the removal of Truman and Acheson without further delay. Certainly there can no longer be any doubt that President Truman is not capable of holding the high office to which he was, unfortunately, elected. The wave of indignation sweeping this country is without precedent. Never in history have the people demanded the removal of a President and a Secretary of State as they are today demanding the removal of Truman and Acheson.

More than 6 months ago I demanded the impeachment of Truman and Acheson in response to the urgent requests for such action from citizens in all parts of the Nation. Today I believe this action is still needed for the good of the United States.

If Mr. Truman wants unity in America and is willing to make a patriotic sacrifice in the best interests of his country, he would resign from the office where he has failed so miserably and at so great a cost to the United States.

This Nation owes a debt of gratitude to Douglas MacArthur, a brilliant military strategist, a good American. His name will be honored in the history of his country. Those who would humiliate and defile him will be remembered for their infamy.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Who's President?" from the Morgantown (W. Va.) Dominion-News of April 13, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHO'S PRESIDENT?

Most sober, thinking persons, regardless of their political affiliation, subscribe to the statement that in view of all of the circumstances President Truman had no other course than to relieve General MacArthur of his command.

General MacArthur has been a good soldier, but apparently either he or his advisers—or both—believe that he, MacArthur, had become more important than the office of the President of the United States. The American people, as much as they may admire MacArthur as a military man, did not elect him President. They, or a majority of them at least, elected Harry Truman President of the United States.

It makes little difference whether one believes that Harry Truman is a great President or an indifferent President. The real thing to remember is that throughout all of the years of our Republic's life it has been found that it was not safe to permit the military to run the Nation. In fact, our Founding Fathers made considerable effort to avoid this situation and their fears were well based in historical fact.

General MacArthur has no more right to address a joint session of Congress than any other general who has been relieved of his command. Obviously, his address could be nothing more than a defense of his actions as commanding officer of the Far East and if he wishes to defend that action he, no doubt, will be given ample opportunity to do so by the Republican Party that at long last has found a candidate to run for the Presidency.

General MacArthur has a perfect right to run for the Presidency of the United States. That right, if not opportunity, is available to any American citizen, but he doesn't have the right as commander of a military force to take over the duties of the President of the United States. And that is exactly what he has been trying to do—and doing in some respect—for the past several years. He has violated almost all of the rules laid down by the Government for the military even to the extent of using the military wires to funnel some of his "messages" to such sympathetic organizations as the Chicago Tribune and other comparable publications. Instead of informing his Commander in Chief, President Truman, of his actions in many cases, as MacArthur demanded his subordinates do, he communicated directly with JOE MARTIN, the Republican leader in Congress.

So, the issue has been joined. General MacArthur must come home and we certainly hope he runs for the office of President of the United States. Several years ago he dabbled with the idea and figuratively speaking "poked his toe in the water" in one of the Midwestern States' primaries. He failed to finish in the money, to use a phrase. Perhaps he will fare better the next time—and the next time in 1952 because he is the darling of the Chicago Tribune and its vast network of propaganda.

But the important thing is that in 1952 MacArthur will be running as a private citizen for the Presidency and not in the dual role of commander in chief of our far eastern forces as well as a self-appointed king above the Presidency which is, of course, the highest gift in the hands of the American people.

We do not pretend to have any information relative to the consequences of peace in Korea in view of the MacArthur ouster. Neither do we assume to pass upon the manner in which MacArthur had to be removed. We do insist that in view of the repeated acts of defiance to the authority of the Presidency, however, that the only criticism that President Truman justifiably should face is the criticism of waiting too long.

There was a feeling prior to Wednesday amongst many people that MacArthur was too powerful for the President of the United States to either discipline or remove.

There was feeling among some of the MacArthur military clique—and that clique was and is large within the military—that MacArthur was more important than the President. There is a feeling amongst the military too—that part of the military which is by far the most substantial part, that MacArthur was bad for the Armed Forces Establishment in that he took the attitude that whatever he did was right—regardless—while the same thing done by another might well bring on a reprimand or a court martial.

Yes, we hope that MacArthur is the Republican nominee for the Presidency. That will put the issue where it belongs—on the soap boxes—and take it out of the military where it never did belong but where too much of MacArthur's public relations have been for far too long.

Resolution of the City Council of the City of Allegan, Mich.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted, there is printed herewith a resolution adopted by the city council of my home town of Allegan, Mich., together with the letter which accompanied it:

CITY OF ALLEGAN,
Allegan, Mich., April 13, 1951.

Hon. CLARE E. HOFFMAN,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This community, like the rest of the Nation, is stunned by the recent action of the President in the dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

The enclosed resolution expresses the feeling of the city council. I sincerely hope you will make those feelings known to the Congress.

Cordially and sincerely yours,
P. H. BEAUVAIS,
City Manager.

"Whereas it is the judgment of the City Council of the City of Allegan, Allegan County, Mich., that—

"1. Shortly after the cessation of hostilities in World War II it became apparent to most intelligent people that the Communist government of Russia had dedicated itself to the expansion of Communism and the destruction of the free nations of the world.

"2. Despite the necessity of opposing communism by the use of all reasonable and available means and forces in the best interest and security of the United States, President Truman and Secretary of State Dean Acheson did, contrary to our welfare and security, aid and abet communism in China and withheld material aid and support from Nationalist China.

"3. President Truman and Secretary Acheson did, precedent to June of 1950, contrary to a legislative enactment of the Congress of the United States, with apparent intent to circumvent and evade the will of Congress, arbitrarily and willfully refuse to advance to the Government of the Republic of Korea upwards of ten billions of dollars, appropriated by the Congress for the defense of said republic against a possible attack by the Communists of North Korea.

"4. By reason of the direct aid given to Red China and the refusal of our State Department to render aid to Nationalist China, and the refusal to advance the moneys appropriated by the Congress for the defense of South Korea, the Communists of North Korea were enabled to, and did, in June of 1950, launch a successful invasion of South Korea, and in which they were later fortified and assisted by Red Chinese armies.

"5. Immediately thereafter President Truman did, contrary to his constitutional authority, engage these United States in a war, under the guise and pretext that he was acting under authority of the United Nations and engaging solely in a police action.

"6. Having involved this Nation illegally in a war in Korea, the President and the Secretary of State did, in contradiction to the security and welfare of the Armed Forces committed to action in Korea and under his command, arbitrarily refuse authority to Gen. Douglas MacArthur to—

"(a) Bomb the staging areas and sources of supply for the Communist hordes, located across the Korean border in Manchuria.

"(b) Blockade the coast of Red China so as to prevent the shipment of supplies and war matériel to Red China.

"(c) Use the armies of Nationalist China stationed on Formosa.

"(d) Equip and arm an estimated 500,000 South Koreans, able, willing, and anxious to fight.

"7. By reason of the foregoing acts and policies, thousands of our American men have now become casualties of war, to be followed by untold thousands.

"8. General MacArthur did, from bitter experience and first-hand knowledge in the interest of those fighting under him and for the ultimate security of this Nation, properly and openly publicize his request for authority to wage a war as it should be waged, successfully.

"9. President Truman did, we believe at the instigation of Secretary Acheson and by reason of the influence exerted by the British Foreign Office, without justification and contrary to the welfare and security of this nation, which he has sworn to defend, summarily remove General MacArthur from his position of command in the Asiatic theater.

"10. General MacArthur has, insofar as it was within his power to do so, acted in the best interest of those serving under his command and this Nation, and President Truman and Secretary of State Dean Acheson are guilty of gross neglect and incompetence in office and the usurpation of authority to the detriment of and danger to the United States.

"Therefore the city council of the city of Allegan, Allegan County, State of Michigan, memorializes the Congress of the United States to institute an investigation, and if the finding warrant carry out proceedings appropriate to impeach and remove from office the President of the United States, Mr. Harry S. Truman, and the Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson, as we firmly believe such action is necessary for the safety, security, and future welfare of this nation."

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of a resolution made and unanimously adopted by the city council of the city of Allegan, Allegan County, Mich., at a special meeting thereof held on the 12th day of April A. D. 1951.

P. H. BEAUVAIS,
City Clerk.

The President Should Be Supported

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL C. JONES
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. JONES of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, as an answer to some of those critics who have condemned the President for his recent action in relieving General MacArthur, I have requested permission to extend in the Appendix an editorial written by Kent Wilson, editor of the Missouri Cash-Book, one of the leading newspapers of southeast Missouri.

While this editor does not at all times see eye-to-eye with President Truman, and has from time to time been critical of this administration, I believe that in this editorial he has pointed out the fallacy of the argument being used by those who are seeking to use this incident as a rallying point for a political campaign issue in 1952. While, of course, I have received a few—less than a dozen—telegrams and letters condemning the President, it is interesting to note that most of the communications have come from those who have been most critical of everything that this administration has done.

In addition to the letters of condemnation, I have also received messages supporting the President. Typical of these is a letter which states:

I want to express to you my support of the President in his decision to dismiss General MacArthur and I urge you to use your influence in his behalf.

In my opinion MacArthur should have been released from his command long ago. A man who causes disunity in these times when unity of purpose is essential and who puts his personal ambitions before his country and who believes himself to be bigger than his Government has no business being in a place of authority be he general or private.

No doubt the action will arouse a storm of controversy and much abuse will be heaped upon the President, but I think he has proved himself to be of great moral stature and has shown that he is a man of unbounded courage in making this decision and I believe he should be supported.

Herewith follows the editorial from the Missouri Cash-Book:

The following editorial was written Monday night, some 24 hours prior to Gen. Douglas MacArthur's dismissal from all his military commands, which is concrete evidence that this paper endorses President Truman's action.

If the editor was in President Truman's shoes, General MacArthur would have a gag shoved into his big mouth and retired to public life where he could hobnob with the Republican congressional leaders and tear loose on our administration to his heart's content, and we wouldn't fear the results. These Republicans who have suddenly become so hopeful of the discord he would cause in an open fight on our foreign policies should he be retired, would be sorely disappointed. They do not know the public pulse.

The general has been more of an actor in recent years than a soldier, boiling over with ego. The editor of this paper has never talked with a veteran of either of the two last world wars who had a good word for him, and they are too patriotic ever to be swayed by any of his arguments.

MacArthur should at least be relieved of any authority outside of Japan. We at one time thought he was a great soldier, but recent events cause us to doubt this. The Christian Science Monitor says, "A number of GI's remember ruefully that the five-star general was sure the Communist Chinese would not intervene when he spread his troops widely over North Korea, where they took one of the worst defeats in American military history."

To cover up his failures to date in the present strife, MacArthur is strongly demanding that the Chinese Nationalists be urged and aided to invade China. Those who are in a position to know state that China is prepared for such an attack and that when it happens we will be momentarily thrust into world war III. It does not require a military genius to know that such a move would not "take the pressure off American troops in Korea" as the five-star general says, but would bring Russia into the conflict, first by aid of an adequate air and submarine force furnished by Russia which would render our present position untenable. Further, Russia will never sit idly by whenever the defeat of China by the United States appears ever probable.

MacArthur loses sight of another great danger, and that is the mobilization of Russian divisions in great number in East Germany and at several other points in Europe. Should we be drawn into a war with China, just what would happen if we were forced simultaneously to wage war both in Asia and Europe now?

We believe that the administration's present policy is to avoid another world conflict by a delaying action, the purpose being in the interim to use every available means to effect a peace agreement, in order to gain 2 or 3 years to get adequately prepared for defense, if not aggression.

We firmly believe that the ambition of Taft for the presidency far exceeds his love of country, and if we should be suddenly rushed into another world war the responsibility will rest upon the shoulders of the Tafts and the MacArthurs.

Attitude of Great Britain Toward Communist China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK
OF IDAHO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The British Solution," which recently appeared in the Idaho Statesman.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BRITISH SOLUTION

The reported British demand for a major sellout to Communist China, coming at the same time as the MacArthur dismissal, puts a fitting climax on a comedy of errors. Only it's really not so funny.

All that the British foreign office has in mind is turning over Formosa to the Peiping bandits (which would mean wholesale slaughter of thousands of Chiang Kai-shek's followers) and allowing Mao Tze-tung a full voice in formulating a Japanese peace treaty. Next step, logically, would be to admit Red China to the United Nations.

Surely no more craven and unprincipled suggestion has ever passed from one government to another. Its acceptance would once and for all scuttle any hope that the United Nations can be made an instrument to enforce world peace (a pretty dim hope at present) and its reward for brutality would turn into bitter mockery the sacrifices in lives which have been made.

The mere suggestion that the Communist rulers of China should have the least word in drawing up a peace treaty with Japan—a nation where Douglas MacArthur worked mightily to destroy Communist influence—is an insult to the people of the United States. What the men who fought from Guadalcanal to Okinawa would think of any such concession could not be printed.

Obviously the time has come for the United States to ask Britain bluntly if it knows which side in the far-eastern dispute it wants to be on. Certainly American soldiers have little business fighting in Korea if Britain has for its long-range goal a series of lucrative concessions to Red China.

This newspaper has no use for the Anglophobic attitude of some publications, but it can recognize the odor of skunk when it detects it. And that is precisely the smell connected with the latest policy statement of the British Socialist Government—strong enough to turn stomachs thousands of miles away.

Kicking General MacArthur out of command was bad enough. Offering to give Communist China all that it could conceivably want constitutes an act of lunacy, and betrayal.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the round-up of editorial comment on the dismissal of General MacArthur which appeared in the Charleston, W. Va., Gazette of April 14, 1951.

The Charleston Gazette's own front-page editorial on this subject on April 12, entitled "Battlefield Courage: MacArthur Was Dismissed for Doing What He Himself Wouldn't Tolerate," was printed in the Appendix of the RECORD on April 13, upon the request of my distinguished colleague the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY].

There being no objection, the compendium was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRUMAN RIGHT IN FIRING MACARTHUR, OUTSTANDING EDITORIALISTS DECIDE

Sober opinion of most of the Nation's outstanding newspapers reflect the editorial view that President Truman followed the only course left him in dismissing General MacArthur.

Here are excerpts from editorials written after studied reflection in the case:

The New York Times: "Policy with respect to the conduct of a war cannot be made in two places. Under the American system, and specifically under the American Constitution, policy is made by the President of the United States. The policy chosen may prove in any given case to be wise or unwise; it may require a fundamental change on the basis of experience; but the Constitution puts the making of policy in the civilian hands of the Chief Executive, and it is the clear duty of the military to express its doubts or its dissent through proper military channels and not in public debate. We have no doubt, therefore, that the President acted properly."

The Christian Science Monitor: "The situation had become such that the United States was speaking with two voices on national policy and military measures. Moreover, the UN commander in Korea was evidently not in sympathy with UN aims there—poorly defined as they are. The situation could be cleared up only by a decision on one side or the other. Unless the basic policies of the United States and the United Nations were to be overturned, it became necessary for General MacArthur to conform, to resign, or be removed."

The Atlanta Constitution: "There is just one issue: Who is going to give the orders and who is the supreme authority? Is it a general serving in a nation's army, or the government of the nation? General MacArthur is a great general and a great man. But his country is greater than he. Whatever the sacrifice or loss of face or dangers incurred by his dismissal, they must be met. To do otherwise would be to destroy the authority of the Government of our country."

The Baltimore (morning) Sun: "The correct decision, so far as can be judged now, would be to continue the course which Mr. Truman has done his uncertain best to justify. If we are to fight the hordes of Russia and China and their satellites it is surely better to fight them with allies at our side to help us than to go it alone. If we deliberately start to fight them in Asia we shall almost certainly be alone."

The Wall Street Journal: "Given the situation as it stood, it is difficult to see how President Truman could have done other than he did in dismissing General MacArthur. That is true regardless of how much provocation General MacArthur had for acting as he did act. Indeed, he must have known that he would be dismissed and thought that he would accomplish something by forcing the President's hand."

The Dayton Journal Herald: "Let there be no mistake about it, the President was justified in removing MacArthur. The general has been repeatedly insubordinate, and insubordinate in a way which threatened the success of the country's foreign policy. That he got away with it so long is not a tribute to Mr. Truman's patience, for no strong President up to his job could be patient in that way. Rather it is a disclosure of Mr. Truman's futility."

The Charlotte Observer: "Since General MacArthur had demonstrated by his persistent public statements that he would not abide by the directives of his superiors, there was nothing left for the President to do but to relieve him of his commands, regardless of who was right or wrong or errors had been responsible for the developed intolerable situation."

The Louisville Courier Journal: "This would be the worst of all times for a field commander to dictate the foreign policy of the United States. That is what MacArthur showed himself determined to do, in spite of repeated and specific orders from Washington. The Korean conflict cannot be isolated from the rest of the world. An action by an American general there could bring a hail of atom bombs on the roofs of a dozen American cities. * * * So President Truman took the inevitable step."

The Roanoke Times: "It was clearly within the President's power and authority to dismiss a general who had repeatedly defied instructions * * *. The bitter controversy that is in prospect over the affair cannot be helpful and will, on the contrary, be most unfortunate if not actually disastrous."

Abuse of Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ZALES N. ECTON
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. ECTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very interesting and intelligently written letter addressed to the editor of the Seattle

Times, by a citizen of the State of Washington, and published in April 6, 1951, issue of that newspaper.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE?

EDITOR, THE TIMES:

Gross abuse of American freedom is a national danger. Liberty under law is the foundation of durable democratic government. It means that each person is free within the circle of his own right. Law seeks prevention of injury and would do justice to those who suffer harm.

Lamentably, liberty is abused by men of all stations. Even governments pervert their purpose to preserve order and justice; they enact unjust laws and adopt sinister policies. Legislatures stop clocks despite time limit; courts validate such glaring law evasion.

Pressure groups, factions, lobbies, powerful individuals abuse liberty in pursuit of selfish ends. Men alone or in gangs commit atrocious murders. Thieves, cheats, frauds, and racketeers abound. Gambling and vice flourish. Bribery and perjury may soon become popular habits.

Evil men congregate in cities to feast off the gullibility of others. Criminals from abroad live here as princely jackals. Organized crime is rife, the Communist dastardly contrives treason against our whole system of liberty, while cynically invoking protection of the liberty he would destroy. On the other hand idealists fear to defend liberty lest they abridge it.

Contributing to delinquency is the good citizen's disregard of civic duty, his own refusal to obey the law because it is the law, his fatal undervaluation of priceless lawful liberty. Laws must be enforced; if enforced, fewer would be necessary.

Constitutional democracy, if neglected or abused, quickly decays. But fortunately it carries within itself recurring strength through the supreme right of self-rule at the ballot box. This right must be revered and all citizens alerted to evils which corrupt or endanger the Republic.

If we do not rule ourselves, others will. There is no escape from the rule. The duty to vote for competent men and to administer impartial government is a duty of stern realism, for government is what we make it, not a self-executing ideal.

Hard-headed men, who flinch not from corrective action, must take the helm of state. A republic rich in purse but poor in character is foredoomed.

Who then is responsible for what is wrong in this free country? The citizens—you and I—are responsible. Our hope lies not in sporadic reform but in a sustained national revival of personal rectitude.

AUSTIN E. GRIFFITHS.

Proposed Freezing of Farm Parity Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Unjust to the Farmer," published in the Greenville (S. C.) News on April 11, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNJUST TO THE FARMER

Senator MAYBANK uses vigorously emphatic language in his expressed determination to oppose the proposed plan to freeze farm parity prices as a way of curbing food-price rises.

But we think not only farmers, but most other citizens who endeavor to think this matter through, will agree that his position is sound and logical.

The calculated parity price for farm products, of course, rises when the things the farmer has to buy rise in price; and so the brilliant idea has occurred to some of our controllers to decree that what was parity last January, must continue to be parity no matter what other prices do, subjecting farm products to ceiling price orders at that level.

Any such action would destroy the whole theory of parity prices for farmers, and might as well be accompanied by total elimination of all legal and other conceptions of parity, along with an arbitrary ceiling on all these prices at a level no higher than the parity figure of last January.

Let it be kept in mind that the conception of parity for farm products is essentially a price relationship. It grows out of calculations that in order to be on a balanced price relationship with the rest of the economy, the farmer should receive prices for his products which bear the same relationship to prices of other goods as they bore during a former period regarded as a normal economic time. And it is obvious, of course, that if the prices of other goods rise, the farmer's calculated parity must rise also if there is to continue to be that same balanced price relationship.

There may be argument as to whether or not this is the most accurate means of figuring how the farmer ought to stand in price matters on an equitable basis with the rest of the economy, but we don't believe any of the critics, even, have suggested what he regarded as a fairer formula for this purpose. The Government, of course, does not guarantee farmers parity prices, but the whole theory of this policy is that it is desirable from the standpoint of fairness that the farmer receive as much as parity prices, and the Government gives him some help in the effort to do so by granting commodity loans at some figure below parity.

The issue now is that the price control law does not permit a ceiling to be placed on these farm commodities until and unless they reach parity prices. And that certainly seems a fair and logical proposition, so long as it is held as a public policy that it is only equitable that the farmer should receive as much as parity for his goods.

It should be obvious that if other goods rise in price and the farmer's so-called parity is not permitted to rise beyond an arbitrarily designated figure of some months ago, his price cease to be parity and the term becomes meaningless.

And it ought to be clear that farm parity prices will not rise unless other prices rise. The way to keep parity down is to keep the other prices down, since they are the basic cause of the rise and fall of parity.

One might pertinently ask the question: Is it in any way fair to the farmer to allow price rises in other goods, yet prevent him from receiving, even if the market offers it, a price that would maintain an equitable relationship with the things he must buy?

As a matter of fact, the greater part of the farm products from which foods are made still sell below the calculated parity. To fix a ceiling at what parity was a few months ago, would thus not probably at this time reduce the price of many or any of them. And unless our controllers, who say they are going to keep other prices from rising, really think other prices are going up considerably more, how can they claim that this proposed step would be of any real value?

Senator MAYBANK has spoken forthrightly on this issue. His words are worth reading again. Noting that farmers' income has shrunk $6,000,000,000 since 1948, he added: "There has been an outrageous campaign to deceive and fool the people of the United States, to have them believe that parity prices are largely responsible for inflation."

And that is well said, we think.

The Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Another Tragic Error," published in the Oil City (Pa.) Derrick on April 12, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANOTHER TRAGIC ERROR

Add another tragic error to the tragic career of a little man trying to fill a big job with a jocular grin and an inflated ego as his only assets.

For the ousting of Gen. Douglas MacArthur by the temporary resident of the White House is, to the average citizen at least, nothing short of a tragic error.

It removes from the active military scene at a time of great national peril one of this Nation's outstanding soldiers and a man whose years of experience have schooled him in far-eastern problems to a far greater degree than the cumulative total of all the political demagogues in Washington. That, in itself, is tragedy enough.

But more tragic than the ousting of a military commander, though he be one of tried and proven ability, is the implied determination of the socialistic nitwits to continue the hesitant and wavering policy in the Far East—a policy that already has gotten us into one of the sorriest messes in which this Nation ever has found itself; a policy that has cost us upward of 60,000 casualties in Korea with the end nowhere in sight.

General MacArthur was fired for insubordination, so the little man said. Technically, that may be true. But to the average citizen he was sacrificed on the altar of appeasement because he dared raise his voice against the futility of waging a war in which his hands were tied and his movements restricted, while his enemy was given privileged sanctuary and was free to use every means at his command to deal out death and destruction.

The ouster of the heroic commander was received with cheers in the capitals of Britain, France, India, and some other nations allied with the United States in the Korean struggle. And well it might. For theirs has been a puny contribution to the common fight against communism. They consistently have sought to appease Red China and have been gunning for months for MacArthur's scalp because he dared appraise the situation in its true light.

But in the cities, the towns, and the rural areas of America, there was no cheering.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

For herein reside the families of those 60,000 brave youths who already have been sacrificed on bloody Korean fields, and the additional 250,000 youths now waging a heroic but apparently futile struggle 6,000 miles from home.

It was for these brave youths that General MacArthur dared speak out. His was a voice crying in the wilderness for the troops, the facilities and the freedom of movement necessary to avoid useless sacrifice and to win the war for freemen everywhere. But his voice was drowned out by the pussyfooters and wishful thinkers who still believe you can compromise and negotiate with international communism.

General MacArthur's ouster removes a pillar of strength from the free world's far eastern defense. And it still fails to solve the primary question of how to end the fighting in Korea without advantage to Communist China and its master, Soviet Russia.

This is the question in which all America is vitally interested. And the man in the White House will be held strictly accountable to the American people for the answer. The outlook is fraught with fear. For it was disastrous leadership and bungling policy that led us down the road to bloody Korea. That leadership and that policy still are with us.

It is difficult to see how the firing of General MacArthur brings us any closer to winning or ending the war in Korea. But for the sake of those brave youths on the fighting front, for the sake of this Nation and freedom-loving peoples everywhere, it is to be hoped that out of the furore and the debate aroused by the general's ouster will come a firm and resolute policy under which Americans may unite and march forward to victory and lasting peace.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "MacArthur Forgot," from the Fairmont (W. Va.) Times of April 12, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MACARTHUR FORGOT

When a young man is selected to enter the United States Military Academy at West Point, he is regarded as officer material for the United States Army. During his years of training at the Academy he learns first of all how to take orders. You cannot learn how to give orders unless you know first how to take orders.

Gen. Douglas MacArthur had all the benefit of the fine training that the Nation gives its selected military men. Certainly in his undergraduate days he learned how to take orders. And he became a great military man well qualified to give orders.

But since 1937 General MacArthur has been in the Pacific, first in the Philippines, then directing the war in the Pacific, accepting the Japanese surrender, remaining as occupation commander in Japan, and finally leading United Nations forces in opposing Communist aggression in Korea.

In all this time General MacArthur has not returned to the continental United States. Although many times during those years General MacArthur's actions and public pronouncements seemed to redound mostly to the glory of MacArthur, no one in high position questioned his military sagacity. His succession of important assignments indicates the confidence that his superiors had in his ability.

What many seem to forget right now is that General MacArthur did have superiors. He was not a law unto himself. He was accountable to the Commander in Chief, who is the President of the United States.

During the past few months General MacArthur has overstepped the bounds of military propriety to oppose publicly the military and world political policies of his Commander in Chief. Other military leaders have been at odds with their superiors but it hasn't often caused them to air their private views to the public.

MacArthur's willingness to state his own views, even though they clashed with those of the Commander in Chief and with those of the United Nations delegates indicates that the general has been too long out of touch with his country and too much enamored of the title of Supreme Commander. His refusal to go along with the policies of the United Nations violated the first rule of a soldier. He forgot how to take orders.

It is unfortunate that the whole affair now is a domestic political affair with the Republicans rallying to defend MacArthur and the Democrats supporting President Truman. But General MacArthur made his actions political by permitting his views to be aired by Republican leaders here at home. General MacArthur had no objection to having his statements released by House Republican Leader JOE MARTIN. General MacArthur expressed no objection to the frequent injection of his name as a Republican Presidential possibility.

The situation became intolerable when General MacArthur, apparently without the knowledge of his superiors, offered to accept the surrender of the Chinese Reds and North Koreans and make a battlefield settlement of the Korean War. This unilateral action upset whatever political maneuvering for a negotiated peace was under way.

President Truman could do no less than relieve MacArthur of his duties. It became clear that General MacArthur was unable to play on the team because he objected to the strategy. General MacArthur during his years of high command has forgotten how to take orders.

President Dropped Emotional Atom Bomb Not on Enemy, But on America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following penetrating analysis of the MacArthur dismissal by Dr. D. Walter R. Courtenay, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, of Nashville, Tenn.

The column is from the Nashville Banner:

THE MACARTHUR AFFAIR

(By Dr. Walter R. Courtenay, pastor, First Presbyterian Church)

Early on Wednesday morning, April 11, the President of the United States dropped an emotional atomic bomb on America. Unlike the usual atomic bomb the force of this one was not limited to a scant 10 miles of territory. It blasted the entire Nation, nay, its force was felt in every capital in the world. Not even Pearl Harbor produced more confusion and emotional shock. A declaration of war with Russia could not have created greater comment and activity.

As the emotional smoke continues to billow and roll back and forth across the land, depending on which way the political and emotional winds blow, there are several things we must keep in mind.

1. General MacArthur is a great soldier. His record speaks for itself. His record as a cadet at West Point; his record in World War I; his record as Superintendent of West Point; his record in World War II, underscore with heavy lines this first contention. He was and is a great soldier and a brilliant general.

2. He is a great administrator. He proved that in the Philippines. He has proved it again in Japan. In Japan he has set an all-time high in the reconstruction of a defeated nation.

3. He is a great American. I make bold to assert that the reason why he talked out of turn, if he did, is to be found in his high sense of patriotism. What else could he do? The White House would not listen. The State Department would not listen. The Pentagon would not listen. They were looking at the Korean War in terms of getting along with England, France, and India. MacArthur saw it purely from the American standpoint. Since we are doing nine-tenths of the fighting, and nine and nine-tenths of the paying, sustaining too, nine-tenths of the casualties, why shouldn't our considerations come first? Why should nations that have recognized Red China for commercial reasons, who advocate giving Formosa to China, inviting the Red rapists to participate in the peace treaty with Japan, and in the future of the United Nations, exert more power over our conduct of the war in Korea than we do?

I thank God that MacArthur would not be muzzled like an ox. I am glad that he put our national safety above his own advantages. I rejoice in the knowledge that there is at least one leader left who will not be dominated by fear of Russia or Washington, and who refuses to permit America to be sold out in the interests of our so-called friends.

MacArthur knows as none other, save those associated with him in Asia, that we have surrendered our safety as a nation to the unsafe United Nations; that without bombing bases beyond the Yalu we cannot win the Korean War; that the present plan plays right into the hands of the Soviet which is not swayed in its actions by our hopes; that the Korean War has not and will not prevent world war III if the Russians are set to wage it; that there can be no peace between Communists and Americans, and that our men and our money are being ground to bloody dust in a venture that cannot end in victory without becoming bigger.

MacArthur did not bomb bases beyond the Yalu. He did not open a second front. He did not release the Formosan forces. He did write his convictions on kites and fly them world-high that all Americans outside of Washington might see and be warned. For that I am grateful.

America today is like a lifeguard that jumped into wave-beaten seas to rescue a group of people whose boat had capsized. The swimmer is strong, skilled, and courageous, but what can he do when all these people lay hold on him, demanding that if he saves any he must save all? Try as he may, he makes little progress shoreward. The people he went to rescue cling to his arms, his head, his legs, his body; tugging, screaming, beating. Will he ever be able to make the shore?

That is the way MacArthur sees the situation confronting his country. He has given his best to America. He has fought to win, and that against almost impossible odds, and because he advocated the only honest measures that can bring victory to our forces he is released of his command.

If he is guilty of talking out of turn today, he was just as guilty 5 months ago. Why was he not recalled to the States, faced by his critics, and, then, either removed or supported?

I fear it is a case of an ex-captain of artillery lowering political guns against a five-star general. Once more greatness has been misunderstood by those who lack it.

The Fair Deal has again dealt unfairly with America's welfare, smearing for reasons one of the truly great men in the history of this Nation, a great military leader, a skilled political administrator, a sincere Christian gentleman, and a true son of Uncle Sam. Under the leadership we have we can never win at home or abroad.

Replacement of Gen. Douglas MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE R. HOEY

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a very thoughtful editorial written by Mr. Ed Post, Jr., and which appeared in the Cleveland Times, of Shelby, N. C., on April 10, 1951. Mr. Post served in the recent World War and has had extensive experience under General MacArthur.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DESIGN OF INDISCRETION

The confusion born of Douglas MacArthur will not cease until he is relieved of all command.

MacArthur is not naively blundering into these indiscretions. There has been a sufficient number of them to indicate a purpose and a strategy behind them.

The Republicans appear delighted to nurture the cause of MacArthur as a source of embarrassment to the Democratic administration, but that is the game of playing with disastrous fire, because MacArthur is forcing the issue of whether or not the military arm or the civilian arm shall formulate international policy for our Nation. If MacArthur wins, it could well mark the beginning of the end of American democracy in eventual subservience of our Nation and our free political structure to the militarist clique.

We would admit and accord whatever claims of merit might be made for Douglas MacArthur as a military commander, with the reservation that has ever been or shall be flawless or unsusceptible to error. But, even granting all exaggerated as well as founded claims of his military prowess, there remain in the man three indisputable traits which minimize his greatness and make of him a real threat to any cause he serves:

1. Indiscretion. MacArthur's unwillingness to fulfill his commission within the bounds of authority bestowed by it, his laxity in self-discipline, both in restraint of his personal opinions and in carrying out his mission without undue complaint that he is not supported as he deserves or given the free hand he thinks he merits; this stubborn indiscretion by its repetition is revealed to be in fact disregard of his mission as defined.

2. Devotion to himself: It would not be stretching the everyday evidence to say that MacArthur's primary aim is to build and preserve the myth of himself as an historic hero. The successful and determined execution of his mission is incidental or secondary at best. Even remotely selfless loyalty and devotion to a people and a cause is not characterized in a commissioned—not elected—servant who unrelentingly thrusts himself daily to the forefront of publicity and continues a distracting and surely time-consuming stream of personal and irresponsible communications to publicity media, broadcasting his private opinions with abandon, regardless of whether or not they conform with the decisions which he is hired to execute.

3. Messianic complex: It is the evident conviction of Douglas MacArthur that he was sent to this earth for the purpose of redeeming the entire world and redeeming it with arms and bloodshed alone. His apparent conviction is that he, and he alone, is possessed of the knowledge of destiny and correct action.

Lest some may think that the appearance of these traits in Douglas MacArthur are to be dated with the Korean War and may have resulted in the man as a result of the confusions and frustrations of the Korean War, we hasten to reprint a doggerel classic which appeared in the Pacific theater during the waning years of World War II. It first appeared in this column on February 27, 1948, and we reprint it now to show that these traits of MacArthur were documented in satire long before he was thwarted in his desire to launch all-out war on the Asiatic mainland.

Three years ago we wrote:

"For a year before and after the invasion of the Philippines by the Great Returner, the quantity of classified information which was revealed in daily press communiques from MacArthur's headquarters was a major topic of bull-sessions in the Pacific. While most military headquarters in that theater of operation kept silent about possible future operations, General Doug, striking the pose of a messiah, refused to let anyone forget that, even if no one else was, he was pressing the war effort. Finally, it became a standing joke that soldiers, sailors, and marines—all of whom MacArthur claimed in his oracular pronouncements to the press as members of his own personal crusade, speaking of 'my' troops, 'my' ships, and 'my' planes—could learn where they would land next by keeping up with Doug's communiques and by tuning in each evening on the Voice of Freedom, a 1-hour broadcast beamed from the general's headquarters by a licensed commercial station, allegedly paid for by the Army and used to reassure the American Armed Forces in the Pacific that Doug was looking after them, would deliver them from evil and was arranging to win the war for them—not only in the Pacific, but by repeated inferences, through his influence on strategy in the European theater also.

"Shortly before the Philippine campaign was launched a doggerel epic appeared in the Pacific theater and passed from ship to ship in the Third, Fifth, and Seventh Fleets and from battalion to battalion through the Army and the Marine divisions stationed on that half of the globe."

This is the document:

"For two long years, since blood and tears
have been so very rife,
Confusion in our war news burdens more a soldier's life.
But from this chaos, daily, like a hospice on the way,
Like a shining light to guide us, rises Doug's communiqué.

"For should we fail to get the mail, if prisoners won't talk,
If radios are indisposed and carrier pigeons walk,
We have no fear, because we'll hear tomorrow's news today
And see our operations plan in Doug's communiqué.

"Here, too, is told the saga bold of virile deathless youth
In stories seldom tarnished with the plain unvarnished truth.
It's quite a rag, it waves the flag, its motif is the fray,
And modesty is plain to see in Doug's communiqué—

" 'My battleships bombarded the Nips from Maine to Singapore,
My subs have sunk a million tons; they'll sink a billion more.
My aircraft bombed Berlin last night. In Italy, they say,
Our turn's tonight, because it's right in Doug's communiqué.

" 'My armored tanks have mowed his ranks, so Rommel's gone to hide;
And the frozen steppes of Russia see my wild Don Cossacks ride.
My brave beleaguered Chitniks make the Axis sweat and pay.'
It's got to be—it's what we see in Doug's communiqué.

"His area is quite cosmic and capricious as a breeze,
Ninety times as big as Texas, bigger than Los Angeles.
It springs from lost Atlantis up to where the angels play,
And no sparrow falls unheeded—it's in Doug's communiqué.

"He used to say, 'And with God's help,' but lately it would seem
That his patience is exhausted and God's on his second team;
And the Cabots and the Lodges, too, have long ceased to pray
That they'll even squeeze a byline into Doug's communiqué.

"And while possibly a rumor now, some day it will be a fact
That the Lord will hear a deep voice say, 'Move over, God; it's Mac.'
So bet your shoes that all the news that last great judgment day
Will go to press in nothing less than Doug's communiqué."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Truman and MacArthur," from the Bluefield (W. Va.) Sunset News of April 12, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRUMAN AND MACARTHUR

President Truman's action in ousting General MacArthur has stirred the Nation and the world as few other actions of his administration have done. We believe he had no alternative. MacArthur himself, whether deliberately or not, made his dismissal inevitable by his continued disagreement with the policies which he was duty-bound to carry out. Any United States President facing the same situation, would have been compelled to make the decision Mr. Truman made. The policies of government must be made by duly constituted civilian authorities, not by military commanders in the field.

It is unfortunate that Mr. Truman had to act as he did. Many Americans are indignant, for they believed in MacArthur. But General MacArthur had shown that he was not in sympathy or agreement with United States or UN policies in Asia, which, right or wrong, were made by the Government the people elected.

In simple and candid language the President last night told the Nation we are fighting in Korea to prevent world war III. He dismissed General MacArthur, he said, because MacArthur's insistence that the war be expanded into China jeopardized that aim.

We are trying to stop a war, not start one, the President said. It would be tragically wrong to take the initiative in spreading the war in Asia.

General MacArthur is unquestionably one of the great military figures of all time. He is a man of sincerity and high purpose, a great soldier. His record throughout the Pacific war and the occupation of Japan is unique. He has truly been a bulwark against communism in the Orient.

The record shows that President Truman, too, has been a bulwark against communism. The fight he has waged has been equally effective against its spread.

History will show that the Truman doctrine, the Marshall plan, the decision to use force against the Reds in Korea, the building up of Europe's strength, the rearming of our own country are positive and aggressive measures which have already contained and curbed the Russian aggressors.

The action in Korea is a vital part of the Truman policy of meeting Red aggression wherever it shows itself and we believe that policy should be continued. In Greece and in Berlin similar action short of all-out war stopped the aggressors. Mr. Truman believes it will do so again. Until now it has, and we have gained precious time to rebuild our strength while another general war is held in abeyance. We are hurting the Reds in Korea more than they are hurting us. It seems sensible to continue that course.

Attempts to make MacArthur's dismissal appear as appeasement of the Soviets are distortions of the truth. We will not appease Russia. The terms which the President set last night for peace in the Orient made that clear. In addition the action of Secretary Acheson in rejecting British overtures to give Red China a voice in the Japanese peace treaty points up the fact that the cries of another Munich are not based on fact.

But to launch attacks on China now as MacArthur wished to do, would mean the United States would be committed to an interminable war on the continent of Asia. We would lose Europe, which would be far more costly in the long run, for we could not fight now on two such fronts. With Europe would go our allies of the Atlantic Pact, and what is even more important, the continent's industrial productive capacity. The United States would stand alone against a dominant Russia. It is unthinkable.

We are winning now in Korea. We are building strength at home and in Europe. We are gaining steadily in the efforts we have launched to crush the ugly serpent head of communism. But this is not the time to launch attacks on China and start the war which we are trying to prevent.

Organization of American States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. SMATHERS
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Latin Resources Vital to United States in Time of War," written by Maj. Alexander P. de Seversky, published in the New York Journal-American of April 5 last.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LATIN RESOURCES VITAL TO UNITED STATES IN TIME OF WAR

(By Maj. Alexander P. de Seversky, internationally famous airplane designer and aviation authority)

The current meeting of the organization of American States, which unfortunately has received very little attention from the press, is, in the opinion of this writer, of the utmost importance. Its success or failure may determine our very survival if the world situation deteriorates and we are forced into a major show-down with the Communist nations.

Should this occur, the world will immediately be divided into two geographical halves. We shall be excluded from the enemy half as effectively as he will be excluded from ours. All sources of strategic supplies outside of this hemisphere will be denied to us by enemy air power.

It is, therefore, patently clear that we must proceed without further delay to develop the raw materials, productive capacity, and unity of purpose of the Americas so that this hemisphere will be, in fact and not merely in prospect, a completely self-contained and self-sufficient base to sustain the military power against Communist aggression.

SHIPS WERE IMPORTANT

Before the advent of global range aircraft, only navies could project military force from one hemisphere to another. Our ships not only carried our war machine to overseas bases, but also brought the needed strategic materials from the distant corners of the earth back to this country to keep our industrial effort going.

During the last war, therefore, the only way that the Axis powers could deny us vital strategic materials was to attack our shipping in an effort to cut off our lines of supply. That is why Germany invested a great part of its national effort in submarine warfare. And they nearly succeeded when our shipping losses in the Atlantic reached the colossal figure of 1,000,000 tons a month.

Fortunately for us, the battle of supply lines had at that time stopped being solely a naval problem. Air power had entered the equation. It was air vigilance, air search, and air attacks on submarines both on the high seas and in their breeding grounds on enemy soil that eventually emasculated the enemy's grip on our supply lines, and saved us the victory.

SOVIET SUBMARINES

It has been said that Russia is building a great fleet of submarines. Such a step is militarily profitable from the Russian point of view so long as we persist in the balanced-forces strategy and accordingly disperse our land forces all over the world, maintain bases along the entire periphery of the Soviet sphere of domination, and draw our strategic materials from the enemy's back yard thousands of miles away. They are building undersea weapons because we are building targets for these weapons.

On the other hand, Russia is quite capable of a strategic deception, and we must treat the propaganda concerning her great undersea fleet with a grain of salt.

Once her air power assumes major proportions and can deliver its massive stroke in any direction of the compass, she may ignore our supply lines and strike directly at the sources of strategic materials instead.

ENEMY AIR POWER

The enemy's air force based in China and the Balkans can readily reach any spot in Europe, Asia, and Africa that attempts to trade with us, and keep them neutralized. The very threat of annihilation from overhead may intimidate these regions and prevent them from supplying us.

The choice they will have is to desist, or be destroyed. One need not be a strategist to realize that it is beyond the realm of possibility to endow all of these remote spots with air defense capable of warding off the entire striking power of the Eurasian continent.

Thus we may have an invincible Navy, complete command of the seas and a vast merchant marine, and yet face strategic strangulation because our ships have nothing to transport.

Under these new conditions, therefore, it is not sea power, but again air power that will be decisive. Only the right kind of air force, if and when created, operating directly from this hemisphere, could destroy the enemy's air power and regain access to these strategic points.

But in order to guarantee our air force such an uninterrupted offensive, we must forge it from strategic materials located in this hemisphere.

However, the United States alone, for all its amazing riches, is a have-not Nation in terms of certain strategic materials. In the past we have counted complacently on a flow of rubber, hemp, and other key materials from the East Indies, the Philippines, and Indochina.

Smugness gave way to alarm early in the last war when Japanese aviation closed off our access to Manila hemp, silk, quinine, and rubber. We lost 90 percent of chromium, 87 percent of tungsten, 85 percent of mica, 80 percent of tin, 60 percent of wool.

We are headed for a similar shock if we do not organize this hemisphere now for development of its resources. Taken as a whole, the hemisphere has all the ingredients required for the implementation of a modern military force. Yet, at this very dangerous moment in world history we are still not self-sustaining. The cause of our plight lies in the absence of adequate planning and foresight.

TIME YET TO ACT

Fortunately, there is still time to open up the almost inexhaustible resources of South America, to replace or supplement those that are located within the sphere of domination of the Communist nations.

For example, there is enough managanese in Brazil to supply the needs of our entire steel industry. Tungsten and wolfram, which we derived largely from China, is available in northern Argentina, Bolivia, and Chile. The cobalt that is so crucial for jet engine production exists in South America.

The success of the organization of American states, therefore, is not only of the greatest importance to every living person in this hemisphere, but to all freedom-loving people, and particularly to Europe, whose survival depends on the deterrent power of America's military strength and industrial output.

GLOBAL WAR RIVALS

Tomorrow's global war, if it comes, will find the total resources of one hemisphere pitted against the total resources of the other. It is evident, then, that hemispheric solidarity is not merely desirable—it is imperative. In any showdown, our destinies are irrevocably interwoven with those of our South American neighbors. We shall all sink or swim together.

The South American countries must be given assistance and encouraged to develop their resources with the utmost dispatch. We must unite this hemisphere into an efficient organization, and see to it that our standard of living will never be impaired by the shutting off of vital materials elsewhere.

LATINS ARE PROUD

Recently I visited South America and had the opportunity to discuss the defense of our hemisphere with the presidents and military heads of several countries. The Latin Americans are proud and sensitive. They are aware that we need their help even as they need ours.

What they want are opportunities to collaborate as equals among equals. Our very stature and power require that we act in a spirit of fair neighborliness, and we may be sure that it will be answered in kind.

This is the challenge that now faces American statesmanship and the American people. When our policymakers have grasped these basic conditions, we shall then be able to work out a realistic hemisphere policy under which the Americas can be truly unified to face the common danger.

The Political Effect of the MacArthur Incident

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio discussion which took place over the American Forum of the Air on the subject, "The Political Effect of the MacArthur Incident," on April 15, 1951, participated in by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], and the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND].

There being no objection, the radio discussion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE POLITICAL EFFECT OF THE MACARTHUR INCIDENT

ANNOUNCER. The National Broadcasting Co. presents the American Forum of the Air, founded 22 years ago by Theodore Granik, and dedicated to the full and public discussion of all sides of all issues, coming to you from the Continental Room of the Wardman Park Hotel in Washington, D. C. Each week at this time, the American Forum of the Air presents special guest speakers, so that you in your home may enjoy authoritative discussions of the provocative and vital topics of our time.

Here today to discuss this problem are Senator JOHN J. SPARKMAN, Democrat of Alabama, Senator KARL E. MUNDT, Republican of South Dakota, Senator ROBERT S. KERR, Democrat of Oklahoma, and Senator WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND, Republican of California, and your moderator, Theodore Granik.

Moderator GRANIK. Gen. Douglas MacArthur will soon land in the United States for the first time in 14 years. By relieving MacArthur of his command, President Truman has touched off one of the most explosive issues on Capitol Hill. The debate, which found congressional leaders divided on the troops-to-Europe issue, has now been expanded to include the controversy over our policy in Asia.

General MacArthur is expected to address the Congress, his remarks—his differences with the President over foreign policy—will unquestionably have far-reaching repercussions.

Today, the American Forum of the Air considers the so-called MacArthur incident in a special round-table discussion. Because of this internationally important controversy, we have postponed for a later date the program originally scheduled, "Would a Realinement of Our Political Parties be Beneficial?"

Now to start the debate. Senator KERR, just why did the President replace MacArthur?

Senator KERR. Well, the President had to replace MacArthur or permit the military authority to be neutralized, by the Joint Chiefs of Staff being disregarded by a field commander. He had to remove MacArthur or permit the military to dictate to the civilian authority. He had to remove him or abandon the United Nations objectives in Korea—to stop aggression, to punish the aggressor, to limit the conflict. He had to remove him or risk MacArthur's taking this Nation alone into the jungle and mire of China in an all-out world conflict.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator Knowland?

Senator KNOWLAND. I disagree with Senator KERR in his statement. In the first place, it was not necessary to eliminate General MacArthur from command. The situation is that General MacArthur has made a great contribution to our opposition to communism in the Far East. He stood as a symbol to the opposition to communism. This has undermined the anti-Communist forces in the Far East. It has undermined our position in Japan.

No one questions the constitutional power of the President to do what he did, but we do question his judgment in doing what he did.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator Sparkman?

Senator SPARKMAN. Mr. Granik, I feel that the President had no other choice. I agree with Senator KNOWLAND that General MacArthur has done a great job in Japan, and he has made a great contribution in the fight against communism. But I don't think anyone can dispute the fact that General MacArthur had reached the point where he simply was out of step, out of step with the policy laid down by our Government relating to our program in the Far East, out of step with our Joint Chiefs of Staff, who were laying down the military program. And it was either to go over the heads of our Joint Chiefs of Staff and yield to General MacArthur, or else it was to continue to take the advice of our Joint Chiefs of Staff and replace General MacArthur. I think the President had no other choice.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator MUNDT?

Senator MUNDT. Mr. Granik, it seems to me that the President's action with regard to MacArthur is just another indication that a pernicious pattern of performance is developing in the White House which does not augur very well for America's future. It appears to me that the attitude in the White House today is: either agree with everything that is done, or else you are going to be deposed. I suppose you could say it: if you don't agree, you are going to lose your position. First it was Louis Johnson; now it is Douglas MacArthur; tomorrow it may be Ike Eisenhower.

In other words, if Dean Acheson and Harry Truman find themselves in disagreement on policy with someone, and if they find those people who oppose them talking to Republicans, out they go. Cut off their heads. That, I think, is rather dangerous in American policy, and it has never been part of the American tradition.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator KERR?

Senator KERR. It wasn't a contest between MacArthur and Dean Acheson. It was a contest between MacArthur and the Joint Chiefs of Staff. It wasn't a contest between MacArthur and the State Department. It was a contest between MacArthur and the Defense Department. It wasn't a matter of agreeing with a whim of the President of the United States. It was a matter either of carrying out a policy agreed upon by the United Nations and about which we are working over there, or of the field commander carrying out the orders of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

When matters get to that point, it isn't a question of debate between the superior and the subordinate commanders. It is either a job for the subordinate commander to obey the orders and carry them out, or move out of the way and let somebody in who will.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator KNOWLAND.

Senator KNOWLAND. Now, Mr. Granik, the actual facts of the matter are that General MacArthur violated none of his military directives. To the contrary, he was given certain directives by the United Nations for the purpose of unifying and making a free Korea. When he tried to carry out those directives successfully, he was interfered with both at Lake Success and Washington, in carrying out his military responsibilities.

Moderator GRANIK. Do you want to answer that, Senator Sparkman?

Senator SPARKMAN. I just can't agree with Senator Knowland in that statement. In fact, I think it is noticeable in the press throughout the country that it is conceded that General MacArthur was out of step with the directives and failed to go through with the directives that had been issued by our Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Now, let me give one example. On March 20, our Joint Chiefs of Staff notified General MacArthur that due to the fine progress that had been made, some kind of a plan was going to be approached toward opening up negotiations. It just simply tipped him off, with a highly secret document. Four days later General MacArthur comes out and issues a statement along the same line. Now, if that was not being out of step, I don't know what is.

Just one other example. The Joint Chiefs of Staff suggested to General MacArthur the rearming, or the arming—the supplying—of the South Koreans, and sent a long directive regarding that. And General MacArthur, instead of acceding to their wishes and arming the South Koreans to help fight the North Koreans, decided he wanted to use that equipment on the Japanese state police. Now, if that is not being out of step with the Joint Chiefs of Staff and with our policy that has been established by our Government, I do not know what can be.

Senator MUNDT. Of course, as long as you keep talking about the Joint Chiefs of Staff, you have a great advantage over us; because any member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff who talks to the Republicans loses his job. The only people who have been talking publicly are Dean Acheson and Harry Truman; so consequently the Senator from California and I have to quote them. We know we would not lose our jobs if we mention their names.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator KNOWLAND, do you want to add a word there?

Senator KNOWLAND. Yes. The fact of the matter is that in one of the national news magazines this last week General MacArthur wired to say that he had never seen this directive prior to the time that he issued his statement on March 24.

Senator SPARKMAN. You mean the directive of March 20?

Senator KNOWLAND. That is right. And it had never been presented to him. He had never seen the details of the situation at all. Now, that is one thing.

The second is that they have released certain extracts from hitherto top secret documents which will support their position, and they have denied to the Congress of the United States, upon the official request of its committees, the surrendering of the Wedemeyer report, which I think will show gross incompetence in the executive branch of the Government.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator KERR, are you bursting with a question?

Senator KERR. No, I am not bursting with a question. I am enthusiastic with an answer. The remark that he made about MacArthur saying something over there is in error. The statement was made by Whitney.

You remember, JOSEPH MARTIN, the Republican leader in the House, came out and said that he had talked with MacArthur and MacArthur had accepted his invitation to come back and address the Congress. And everybody was all excited about whether he should or should not; when, lo and behold, some enterprising newspaperman broke through the censorship which MacArthur has imposed over there——

Senator KNOWLAND. At the request of the Joint Chiefs.

Senator KERR. To advise the American people that MARTIN hasn't talked to MacArthur at all, that MARTIN had talked to Whitney. Now, MacArthur is going to be back here in a few days. He wants to come before the Congress. The Democrats want him to come before the Armed Services Committee. And we want to find out what it has been that he has been advocating over there about aggressive action, about carrying this war to China.

I notice in the Christian Science Monitor, here, of Friday, a quote from Senator TAFT in New York the other night, in which it says: "Senator TAFT's New York speech in which he said prevention of a third world conflict cannot now be accomplished without an aggressive war against Communist China." That is the basic issue here politically, Mr. Moderator, as to whether or not the American people are going to permit a few Republican leaders and General MacArthur to lead us into a situation of all-out war against Red China on the continent of Asia, or whether we are going to limit our forces over there to the accomplishment of the objectives of stopping aggression in Korea, punishing the aggressor, limiting the scope of the conflict, and then working out peace.

Senator MUNDT. Mr. Moderator, I would like to say that I think we are getting down to brass tacks now. The Senator from Oklahoma has begun to bring in the name of Congressman MARTIN, of Massachusetts. And that probably is the reason why Douglas MacArthur is no longer in charge of the Asiatic theater. Because Douglas MacArthur talked to a Republican Member of Congress. Because Douglas MacArthur thought that Republicans as well as Democrats had a right to know what was going on in Asia, now he is to be pilloried. Now they are anxious to get him into a secret committee room, so that the public cannot be there, rather than have him address the Congress. But fortunately the ire of the American public is such that they are insisting that he talk to them.

Actually, MacArthur made two mistakes. The first mistake he made was in talking to a Republican Congressman. That was considered bad in Democratic circles. Then he made the error of turning his back on the man who would not turn his back on Alger Hiss. Consequently they are pillorying him for that. As far as his specific activities are concerned, up to now, anyhow, no one has questioned the fact that Douglas MacArthur did not start the war in Korea. Somebody in the White House, or the State Department, ordered him to start the shooting. So they can't say he upset the peace of Asia.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator KERR referred to the possibility of an aggressive war against Red China. Would you care to comment on that, Senator KNOWLAND?

Senator KNOWLAND. I was in Korea this last November, and I can say that General MacArthur has never recommended an invasion by American forces of Red China. I believe it is necessary to get rid of that red herring to start with. I do not believe it is necessary to have a declaration of war, but I do think it is necessary to untie the hands of our fighting men there, so that they are not being required to go up as our fighting planes and bombers are, and find that the Russian-made enemy planes can go back into a sanctuary area and keep from being attacked in their nests.

General Stratemeyer yesterday pointed out that it was an almost impossible task to ask men to risk their lives when the enemy is operating from a sanctuary we could not attack. That has never before happened in American history.

Senator SPARKMAN. I want to get back to something my friend KARL MUNDT said. Now, everybody knows that there have probably been twice as many Republican Members of Congress visiting General MacArthur in the east as there have been Democrats. I think there is no argument about that at all. And goodness knows, we are not objecting to his appearing before Congress. We are joining in the invitation. We do say that he ought to subject himself to questioning before a congressional committee, upon which both Democrats and Republicans sit; and it will not be a secret meeting, because there is no reason why it cannot be an open meeting.

I think we ought to stick to the gist of this subject, and that is that General MacArthur undoubtedly was advocating a policy that meant the spread of this war, when we are trying to localize it. He undoubtedly put himself on that side. And now we find our Republican friends lining up with him, advocating what would amount to a third world war.

Senator KNOWLAND. Don't you think this means the survival of the Nation is at stake?

Senator SPARKMAN. I think it means the spreading of the war, when we are trying to localize it.

I want to quote from Senator TAFT's New York speech. Now just listen to this. This is from the New York Times: "A more active battle against China, involving use of the National troops on Formosa under control of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek and an invasion of China was"—he was talking, by the way, about this aggressive plan that General MacArthur was advocating—"was justified from a moral standpoint, but practical considerations, notably the size of the armies and the danger that it would incite Russia into an active war, made it impossible."

Now, that is Senator TAFT speaking about this very program. And I think everybody who goes into it will realize that the inevitable result of what General MacArthur was advocating was a spread of this war and the start of world war III at a place where we don't want it, and at a time when we are not prepared to meet it.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator KNOWLAND, do you want to comment on that?

Senator KNOWLAND. Well, what General MacArthur was trying to avoid was a far eastern Munich that would make inevitable world war III.

Senator SPARKMAN. We do not have to have a Munich.

Senator KNOWLAND. We know that the road to appeasement is not the road to peace. The British just a few days ago advocated that Formosa be turned over to the Chinese Communists; that the Chinese Communists be admitted into the United Nations and that they participate in the Japanese peace treaty. If that would not be a full-fledged far-eastern Munich I would like to know what you would consider it. The removal of General MacArthur was the first step in being able to achieve that surrender to British appeasement.

Senator SPARKMAN. Mr. Moderator, I want to challenge that statement, and I want to say here positively that the United States has no idea and never has had of letting the Red Chinese participate in the Japanese peace treaty or of surrendering Formosa. I happen to be chairman of the Far Eastern Subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee and I happen to know that Britain did not propose this 3 days ago, they proposed it 10 days or more ago. We immediately had a hearing on it and the statement was made positively that we would not, under any conditions, and Britain has been informed that we would not accede to it. And we are going to stand fast on it. The removal of MacArthur has no bearing on it whatsoever.

Senator MUNDT. I am not so sure about that.

Senator SPARKMAN. Well, I am.

Senator MUNDT. Whether it was 10 days or 3 days is immaterial. But these proposals that Great Britain makes have a habit of being accepted by the administration. Great Britain was in favor of removing MacArthur and has been in favor of removing MacArthur for a long time. So has France, the Communist Party in America, and so have a great many others. You give one reason for his removal. It looks to us like there is another reason for it. At least it is a concession to the appeasement forces around the world and every Communist country ran its colors at the top of the mast when MacArthur was eventually removed. They consider it an appeasement of Red China and an appeasement of the Communists.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator KERR?

Senator KERR. I want to go back to the statement made about the secret meeting. The Armed Services Committee, including the Republicans and Democrats, invited General MacArthur to come before them in a public meeting where he could make his statement and be cross-examined. Now, my good friends over here say they do not want MacArthur to be up against a sanctuary. Yet they seek to place him in a sanctuary.

Senator KNOWLAND. He will take care of himself when he gets here.

Senator KERR. He has already wired back that he will not appear before the Foreign Affairs Committee or the Armed Services Committee until he finds out whether he is going to be given a hero's welcome.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator Kerr, I am sorry.

Senator KERR. I want to say that I am opposed to his being offered a sanctuary where he will not be subject to cross-examination. Any time Congress lets a man, who has been relieved of his command for insubordination come before them to make a speech and at the same time be free from cross-examination, Congress is tying both of their hands behind them. And I get back to the statement Senator MUNDT made about disagreeing with Dean Acheson. Dean Acheson had no more to do with the military orders that went down to MacArthur than Senator MUNDT did. They were issued by the Commander in Chief and when MacArthur disregarded and disobeyed them he was disobeying the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Commander in Chief.

Senator KNOWLAND. Well, I would like to speak on that subject. I happen to be a member of the Armed Services Committee. General MacArthur has not declined to appear before the committee. He suggested that he should not make an appearance before the committee until he had had a chance to appear before the full Congress. And, Senator RUSSELL, the chairman of the committee is now in communication with him. That is the first situation. The second one is that the State Department has interfered in the military strategy of the Far East and as far as I am concerned I would rather take the judgment of Gen. Douglas MacArthur as to our defense needs in the Pacific than I would the judgment of Dean Acheson, the Secretary of State.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator SPARKMAN?

Senator SPARKMAN. Of course that is the trouble with this whole debate. They try to shove aside the fact that stands out just as clearly as it can for those who want to see it that our policy in the conduct of the Korean war was decided upon by the military experts upon whom we depend for military advice in our Government, the three who make up the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They keep referring to Dean Acheson. Dean Acheson has not one single thing to do with the military policy in Korea, it is the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and every single paper that was issued to General MacArthur comes from the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Why do we not talk about their judgment as to how to run things in Korea, as to how to run the war? Why is it that the people who were afraid of provoking war by sending troops to Europe are not afraid of provoking an all-out effort in China? Why is it that they desire appeasement in Europe and aggression in Asia?

Moderator GRANIK. Senator MUNDT?

Senator MUNDT. The reason we talk about Dean Acheson is because I happen to know, having served on the House Foreign Affairs Committee all the time this Chinese policy was being shaped, that Dean Acheson and the State Department stood as a road block consistently stopping us from doing anything that would be of assistance to Nationalist China. That fact stands out. The fact as you mentioned it that Dean Acheson had nothing to do with foreign policy does not stand up very clearly to me because the Joint Chiefs of Staff had to make this program consistent with the foreign policy of the country.

Senator KNOWLAND. How do you account for the fact that on the 23d of December 1949 Dean Acheson and the State Department sent to all of our consular officials overseas a communication which was withheld at that time from the American public to get them acquainted with the facts, so they could educate the public that Formosa had no strategic value, when that was contrary to the judgment of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and it was contrary to the judgment of our responsible military and naval commanders in that area of the world? It was not until they disclosed the matter on the floor of the Senate that the State Department finally admitted that they had sent that out, but they refused to furnish the original documents to the Senate of the United States.

Senator SPARKMAN. Was that on December 23 of last year or year before last?

Senator KNOWLAND. 1949.

Senator SPARKMAN. Yes, 1949. As a matter of fact, if you will refer back to that whole statement, and particularly to the explanation that was given a few days after that for which Dean Acheson had been so severely attacked, you will see that he outlined our responsibility for defense, and he said that that line ran down through Japan and the Philippines, and he went on to say, not that Formosa had no strategic value, but that the question of defense of Korea and Formosa was a United Nations question rather than a United States question.

Senator KNOWLAND. He amended that statement by saying that Korea and Formosa were outside our line of defense. He issued an open invitation for the North Korean Communists to attack Korea and for the Chinese Communists to attack Formosa.

Senator SPARKMAN. Not at all. What he was saying was that it was not the individual policy of the United States. Read the statement.

Senator KNOWLAND. I have read it many times.

Senator SPARKMAN. Read the statement. He said definitely that the defense of Japan and the Philippines was the individual responsibility of the United States but that Formosa and Korea were the responsibility of the United Nations. It was all in the same question and when you quote one you ought to quote the other.

Senator KNOWLAND. The responsible command out there, naval and military, feels that the loss of Formosa would be detrimental to the strategic defense of this country and would move our defenses back to the Pacific Coast States of Oregon, Washington, and California in this age of the atomic weapon and the airplane.

Senator SPARKMAN. We will not lose Formosa.

Senator KNOWLAND. We will if the appeasers have their way about it.

Senator SPARKMAN. We are not the appeasers.

Senator KNOWLAND. But the British are.

Senator KERR. We are not going to lose Formosa for the very simple reason that our fleet is now protecting it. You cannot escape your responsibility in this regard by favoring MacArthur and his policy, that would spread the war, by talking about Britain. Certainly Britain is our ally and there are things with them that I do not agree with but I am mighty glad they are allies. You cannot escape the responsibility of MacArthur by attacking Dean Acheson for the very simple reason that MacArthur was the man who refused to obey orders of the Commander in Chief and refused to carry out the policy of the United Nations, and refused to operate on a basis that would prevent the spread of the conflict, but rather favored that which would cause it to spread.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator MUNDT?

Senator MUNDT. Let's straighten out, first of all, what the fleet is doing around Formosa. The fleet is around Formosa in order to keep the Nationalist government in Formosa from attacking the Red Communists in China and the Red Communists are attacking us. That makes it a pretty difficult war for our GI's in Korea because it is the first time in American history that you have had the American Navy on one side of the war and the Army on the other side of the war. That is carrying competition a little too far between Annapolis and West Point. All that we are asking is that the fleet be withdrawn and let the Nationalists in Formosa decide what they want to do about attacking our enemy, the Red Communists in China.

Moderator GRANIK. Do you want to answer that?

Senator SPARKMAN. Yes, I do. That just simply is not the case. As a matter of fact, if our fleet were not protecting the Nationalists on Formosa the Chinese Communists would take it overnight. We are protecting the Nationalists rather than holding them off the mainland.

Senator KNOWLAND. We are doing two things, John, we are protecting the Island of Formosa and we are preventing them from making any incursions on the mainland. It is a two-edged situation.

Senator SPARKMAN. Well, we are preventing the Chinese from making incursions on Formosa, too.

Moderator GRANIK. One question?

Question. My question is for Senator KERR. Is the MacArthur incident the kick-off for the political campaign for 1952, or was it just a coincidence?

Senator KERR. It was just a coincidence but it is going to result in the American people finding out the hopeless confusion and the hopeless dissension in the ranks of the Republican Party. It is going to prove that the responsible leadership of the Republican Party here in Washington is a war party. It has shown that men like Lodge and Saltonstall and Duff and Dulles and Austin have been shoved aside, those who helped build the bipartisan policy and who helped fight for it and support it. They are being shoved aside and those who believe in the program of spreading this war in China to follow MacArthur are in the saddle and I think it is going to result in that which will be most helpful to the Democratic Party and the American people.

Senator KNOWLAND. Just let me say this, Mr. Moderator. Since the year 1908, when I was born, we have been in three wars, including the Korean war. All of them have been under Democratic administrations. I participated in one as a soldier. If Senator KERR would take the position that the Democratic Party is a party of peace that does not make sense.

Now all Americans, Republicans and Democrats, have had to fight in all three of these wars including the Korean war, which is now going on.

Senator KERR. That is the reason we do not want it to spread to Red China; that is the reason we want to prevent a world war now; that is the reason we want to limit the conflict and make the peace as soon as we can, instead of permitting it to spread around the world and get to the point where there never will be any hope of getting out.

Senator MUNDT. I do not know where Senator KERR has been living in the last 6 months if he thinks there is danger of the war spreading to Red China. Red Chinese have been shooting American GIs for a long time in Korea. That war has already spread. What we want is a chance to defend the lives of the American GIs now fighting for freedom on the Korean Peninsula.

Moderator GRANIK. Thank you very much, gentlemen.

Policy, Not Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD T. MILLER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. MILLER of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, the times are too perilous for us to indulge in the luxury of a free-for-all partisan scrap, even if the President has acted impulsively and thrown the administration into a vulnerable political position.

The somber background of our young men, dying on foreign soil, and the growing menace of communism might call for restraint and sober nonpartisan judgment.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

If we allow our minds to be diverted by political expediency, or secondary arguments over military properties, the control of the military by civilians and similar traditional issues, we will only compound mistakes already made.

It is generally admitted that, constitutionally, the Chief Executive is within his legal rights in changing commanders. Let us concede that, and also the fact that any military commander is justified in obeying his own conscience, even as did Gen. Billy Mitchell.

The real need of the hour is a sound and practical objective with respect to the war in Korea and the over-all policy in the Far East.

Congress is not the only branch of the Government that should be sensitive to the will of the people in policy matters. The executive branch, likewise, is only an arm of the Government of the people, by the people.

The people are speaking and, if my mail is at all indicative of the general sentiment, they want a firm policy in Asia that will end all traces of appeasement of communism and give our forces in Korea the green light to end that conflict victoriously, with as few casualties as possible.

The President and the State Department would do well to listen to these voices with the view of guiding the ship of state in accordance with the will and judgment of the Nation as a whole.

The following editorial from the April 13 edition of the Easton Star-Democrat, a Maryland paper that has always been Democratic, as it name implies, ably states what many of the citizens in my district are saying and thinking at this crucial moment:

THE MACARTHUR DISMISSAL

President Truman's summary dismissal of General MacArthur has profoundly shocked the Nation. Immediate reaction to this rash act in this area was that the President had gone too far; that it is too bad Truman cannot be removed from office with the same ease. Indeed, several Republican Senators were quoted as demanding President Truman's impeachment, although this can be considered virtually impossible in view of the two-thirds rule.

The President's action should touch off a round of official celebration in the Kremlin. MacArthur was an archenemy of communism at the time when the boys in Washington were holding hands with the boys in the Kremlin. It can be said with truth that at least part of the clamor for General MacArthur's dismissal was sponsored, aided, and abetted by the Communists throughout the world.

British and French politicians are more than pleased over MacArthur's downfall, although they haven't had the courage to state their pleasure publicly even though it is they who have been calling for this action all along. Their contention has been that an aging general was being allowed to lead the world into another war. Their real reason for opposing MacArthur was the fear that emphasis on the fight against Communist aggression in Asia would divert military aid from Europe. What these foreigners fail to realize and what President Truman is learning with emphasis at the moment is that to many Americans General MacArthur is a treasured symbol of dynamic democracy in the best Teddy Roosevelt tradition.

We are not among those who have been blinded through the years by the so-called MacArthur magnetism, and certainly his actions in the past few months cannot be condoned on a purely military basis. Under our present system of government a civilian, the President, is Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces and the military is expected to take orders and remain silent. On this basis there can be no denial that General MacArthur is in the wrong; although in his position as supreme commander he violated no rule or regulation.

Apart from this narrow military viewpoint, it must be acknowledged that the general's long years of military and political experience in the Far East make his opinion of particular value. The President or the Congress should have provided a channel for the expression of these views. General MacArthur should have been recalled to Washington to testify in full, once and for all. His testimony would have been certain to intensify the debate regarding far-eastern policy, but such searching examination of policy would have been good for the country, just as it was in the instance of the debate on aid to Western Europe. (In which General Eisenhower had a hand.) Out of it might have come a far-eastern policy that was at once realistic, and supported by a clear majority of the American people. Heaven only knows this country needs a far-eastern policy. There would have been no MacArthur incidents, and possibly no war in Korea if administration policy in the Far East had not been such a deplorable failure since World War II. The supreme tragedy is that even now, with men dying or being wounded at the rate of 1,400 a week in Korea, there is still no clear-cut American policy in the Far East. Where leadership was needed, there has existed a vacuum.

Right or wrong, General MacArthur has always been a leader. His recommendation of a policy to avoid a stalemate in the Korean war is the only definite and authoritative statement of policy on the subject available for consideration. And the general's warning that Communist conspirators have elected to make their play for global conquest in Asia, is also a compelling declaration deserving of the most searching examination.

President Truman's actions in recent months to muzzle the most outspoken critic of a State Department in which the American people have no confidence on far-eastern affairs, have left a bad taste in everyone's mouth. His surrender to the demands of foreigners and weak-livered diplomats in the State Department in dismissing MacArthur is a great disservice to the American people.

In many respects this could be General MacArthur's finest hour. If he will use his new freedom to return to the United States and give the American public the full benefit of his views, he is likely to find more support than has ever been accorded him in his long and gallant career. We may now see the true temper of MacArthur steel as compared with Truman mink coats and red herrings.

The Issue in MacArthur Dismissal Is One of Policies in Asia, Not One of Civilian Versus Military Control, for There Was no Insubordination

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend by remarks in the RECORD, I include the following extraordinarily sane, sound, and lucid broadcast on April 15, 1951, by Mr. David Lawrence, editor of United States News and World Report:

The American people seem to be talking about just one thing and asking many questions about it, and that is the removal of General MacArthur. The first question, as you might well surmise, is this: "Hasn't the President of the United States the right to fire any general?"

Of course he has that right. But the real question is, "Was President Truman right in firing General MacArthur?"

I think the President need not have dismissed MacArthur but could easily have resolved the differences in a manner that would not have split America and would not have humiliated a national hero. When an important executive is 8,000 miles away from home base on an important assignment, and the wires get crossed up with messages from his employer, you don't fire him on the spot—you bring him home and have a face-to-face talk with him and a showdown, and then if you can't clear up the misunderstanding you ask him to resign or fire him. Tokyo, after all, is less than 48 hours away from Washington in flying time.

The next question: "What was the misunderstanding? What are the facts? Didn't MacArthur just simply disobey orders?"

As I examine the facts, MacArthur complied with his orders as he understood them, and his military secretary, Maj. Gen. Courtney Whitney, says the same thing. This is an odd time to accuse a man who has been Chief of Staff of the United States Army either of not knowing how to obey orders or of willfully disobeying orders. The orders given MacArthur, as I read them, were never explicit, and the so-called policies, if there were any, were never explained clearly to General MacArthur. The whole key to the controversy can be found by taking as an example one of the important messages released by the White House last week. This was sent to MacArthur on March 20 by the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Because that message is bound to be the basis for the judgment of this case in history, I'm going to read it to you and then explain it. It is brief. I quote:

"To the commander in chief, Far East, Tokyo, Japan.

"From (the) Joint Chiefs of Staff in Washington.

"State (Department) planning Presidential announcement shortly that with the clearing of (the) bulk of South Korea of aggressors, the United Nations are now prepared to discuss conditions of settlement in Korea. Strong UN feeling persists that further diplomatic effort toward a settlement should be made before any advance with major forces north of (the) thirty-eighth parallel. Time will be required to determine diplomatic reactions and permit new negotiations that may develop. Recognizing that (the thirty-eighth parallel has no military significance, (the) State (Department) has asked (the) Joint Chiefs of Staff what authority you should have to permit sufficient freedom of action for (the) next few weeks to provide security for (the) UN forces and maintain contact with (the) enemy. Your recommendations (are) desired."

Now note carefully the language. There is not a word in that message which says that the United Nations has decided on a policy, nor that the United States has decided on a policy. It simply says that "a strong feeling persists." It sounds like the speculative dispatches of any Washington newspaper correspondent as he writes about the fluctuating sentiment in Washington.

Now what is a military commander 8,000 miles away to do when he gets a vague message like that which does not give him any decision on policy, but merely the expression of some bureaucrat's plan in the Department of State? And who operates our Army nowadays, anyway? Surely not the Department of State! Yet, that Department asks a general in the field to deploy his troops, not for a day or two, but for a few weeks—a few weeks, mind you—in such a way as to prevent any advance of his major forces. At the same time he is asked to provide for the security of UN forces and he is told to maintain contact with the enemy. What kind of double-talk is that, really?

The next question—"Isn't the Commander in Chief, namely, the President, supreme? Can't he impose whatever policy he pleases?"

No, he cannot, if Congress disagrees, because the President is accountable to his boss—the people of the United States. Under our written Constitution, the people's representatives, namely, the Congress, can, so to speak, court-martial the Commander in Chief. They can impeach the President and remove him from office if they think the people want them to do it.

On what charge can a President be impeached—you might ask. He can be impeached for failing to do his duty as he has sworn to do it under the Constitution. One charge being mentioned in Congress is that the President failed to get a declaration of formal authority from Congress to conduct an action with 250,000 American troops—Army, Navy, and Air Force—8,000 miles away from our mainland, all of which the President now in his speeches frankly calls a "war." Congress alone has the authority to declare war.

Another charge mentioned is that he has refused to grant our troops in Korea permission to strike at enemy bases even though they have been under enemy air attack and that he has thus needlessly sacrificed American lives.

It takes a majority vote, however, of the House of Representatives to present a formal charge of impeachment, and it takes two-thirds of the Senate to remove a President.

Next question: "Is this MacArthur controversy a partisan matter?"

No, of course not. We have already had 60,000 casualties in 9 months in Korea, which is more casualties than the United States suffered in its first full year of World War II. The sons of Republicans are being killed or wounded in Korea as well as the sons of Democrats.

Next question: "Isn't this an issue of civilian authority versus military authority?"

No, it is not. The Congress is also a civilian authority and it was the letter which General MacArthur wrote to Representative MARTIN of Massachusetts, minority leader, in answer to one from Mr. MARTIN, which really infuriated Mr. Truman and caused him to remove General MacArthur.

I was talking with Representative MARTIN on that point today and he authorized me to say:

"After what happened to MacArthur we in Congress cannot expect to get the truth. In the future no member of the armed services will dare to testify before any investigating committee of Congress or answer any letter from a Member of Congress if his information or judgment is at variance with the Truman policies. There goes our much-vaunted civil authority—for Congress is a coordinate branch of the Government of the United States under our Constitution, and when we get one-man government we don't have representative government any longer." (That's the end of the quotation from Mr. MARTIN.)

Now the next question: "Is it correct to say that MacArthur wants to extend the war and Truman wants to prevent a war?"

No, it isn't correct. For each man is sincerely convinced that he has the answer as to the best method of preventing world war III. I leave it to you, however, as to what prevents a big war. Is it when you tell the enemy every other day that you're afraid to get into a big fight and keep on saying to your own troops, "You must not fight the enemy with all your might because it might antagonize them"—or is it when you give your troops the right to fight the enemy with maximum force? We never yet have entered any war just to get a stalemate or a draw. We go in to win, and to secure respect for our rights.

"But was not MacArthur told not to issue foreign policy statements?"

Yes; but he is on the ground in a military area. Commanders have the right to discuss military and related questions. I examined all the directives and statements made public last week by the White House as having been sent to MacArthur, and I did not find a single explicit instruction that covers what MacArthur wrote to Congressman MARTIN. If by any twisted construction of those messages, it is said he did violate orders, then so did General Ridgway on March 12 when he said if we stopped at the thirty-eighth parallel we would achieve victory. This could be taken to be a political statement, too. Also, General Stratemeyer, of the Fifth Air Force, pointedly told the press last Friday about the bases in Manchuria from which planes were coming every day now to destroy our planes and attack our troops. That is an expression of opinion similar to MacArthur's, especially as General Stratemeyer pointed out how difficult it will be for us now to protect our troops. Incidentally, those six B-29's, with all their crews, those big superfortresses, have been lost by enemy action, and yet we are unable to attack the bases from which those enemy planes are coming.

"Did General MacArthur's statements hurt us with our allies in the United Nations?"

The answer is to ask: "How much actual agreement is there among our allies today?" The British recognize Communist China, yet they are at war with Communist China. They want us to turn Formosa over to Communist China. We don't want to do so. They want Communist China to sit in at the treaty conferences to determine the fate of the Japanese people. The American Government doesn't want Red China in that conference. The British are sending war supplies to the Communist Chinese. What kind of a United Nations policy is that when our best friend in the UN actually follows a policy opposite to that of the United States?

And General MacArthur is relieved of his command supposedly, as the President puts it, for failing to give "wholehearted support to UN policies." What UN policies?

America is disunited today. It will not be reunited by the wishful thinking of pollyannas who cry out that we just must not debate among ourselves. The real answer is to discuss all this freely in the court of public opinion and have it out.

If General MacArthur is wrong, let us have the facts to prove it. If Mr. Truman has committed a blunder that may aggravate world conditions and invite a third world war—just as Chamberlain by his appeasement policies invited World War II—then let Congress consider the facts about that also.

For both General MacArthur and President Truman are now on trial in the court of public opinion, and the only answer that can come in this controversy must come from the people themselves, by the fullest expression of opinions communicated freely in our democracy to their Representatives in Congress and to the President.

Effect of Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEVERETT SALTONSTALL

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "The Applecart and Its Badly Teetering Load," by Arthur Krock, published in the New York Times this morning.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN THE NATION

(By Arthur Krock)

THE APPLECART AND ITS BADLY TEETERING LOAD

WASHINGTON, April 16.—The Stars and Stripes snapshot of General Eisenhower—when he was told at Coblenz that General MacArthur had been relieved of his duties in the Far East—is one of those rare news photographs which reveal more than words can do. Many of the implications and conceivable consequences of the President's order have been listed, analyzed and forecast. But in the troubled look which the camera caught and was broadly circulated on the first page of this newspaper and others today it is possible to see the greatest of these:

Will Mr. Truman's action provoke a controversy in the United States that will seriously deflect the military program for the defense of Western Europe, which the North Atlantic Treaty nations have entrusted to General Eisenhower? Will General MacArthur dedicate himself to that objective, and by what means?

It is already apparent that, if these were the thoughts behind the Eisenhower look of anxious regret, they were prescient. The effects of the relief order on official Washington have been numerous, among them the manifestation of a popular will to pay public honor to General MacArthur for his military achievements and his extraordinary record as proconsul in Japan. But not only those Republican politicians who long have been critics of the administration's Far East policies have seized upon the President's action as a catalyst to combine with irresistible force all the pressures for an open reexamination and change of these policies. A number of Democrats and many students of foreign policy outside the political community also have their doubts, and welcome any incident which might produce a resurvey of global strategic values as estimated by the administration.

The existing handicaps

Considering his assignment, bearing in mind the difficulties of carrying it out successfully even in ideal circumstances, it is obvious that General Eisenhower requires national concentration on his problem as well as national support of his efforts to solve it. Except for Great Britain there are soft spots throughout the military foundation for the Eisenhower army; this correspondent noted some of them in recent dispatches from France, Italy, and Western Germany. And divisions on policy and purpose in many areas between the United States and Great Britain diminish the impact of the highly creditable rearmament program undertaken in London.

The West German Government's partnership in European defense is beset by the

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Communist propaganda of "unification and neutrality," which has also attracted many young people and sincere anti-Communists in that country, and is the dream of the German population. The same propaganda has penetrated into the thinking of the French, despite the gallant strivings of the Government to repel it. There is little relish among the Italian people for the military posture which Mussolini was the last to try and fail to establish, and partisan politics is impeding the effort of the Government at Rome to pass the rearmament budget.

These and other situations—the diplomatic impasse over joining Spain, Turkey, and Greece to the NATO; the mounting threat to Yugoslavia, which puts a new burden on the allied channels of supply; the sputtering fuses which lead to nationalistic explosives in the Middle East—have added critical factors to the many General Eisenhower has encountered from the beginning. If now the United States is to be diverted seriously from his mission, and if this—whether or not it brings about a change of military emphasis—is to lessen, however briefly, the faith of the treaty nations in our devotion to his enterprise, that is a very serious possibility from the standpoint of those who believe in the essential priority of what General Eisenhower has been directed to do.

A "PEARL HARBOR" INQUIRY

The events of this week in the United States, and especially in Washington, will furnish some of the answers and point the way to the rest. And today's demand of the Republicans for a "Pearl Harbor" inquiry into the administration's courses in the Far East since the Japanese war ended may tend toward the very answers which would imperil General Eisenhower's project. This possible consequence could have been uppermost among his thoughts on the instant of hearing about General MacArthur.

The administration's critics on the Far East have had a strong case for years. But as long as General MacArthur was on active service they could count only on his oblique assistance in promoting it. That was powerful and took direct form in his letter to Representative Martin, of Masachusetts. Yet what these critics still needed for a "Pearl Harbor" inquiry was his presence in this country and his unfettered testimony. The first, knowingly and with basic courage, the President provided them with when he relieved the Far East commander. Whether the second will be what the critics hope for must await General MacArthur's first question-and-answer appearance before congressional committees, though its nature may be foreshadowed by his address to the joint meeting of the House and the Senate.

Assuming that the MacArthur contribution will be documented proof of all the Far East policy critics have contended, the record will not necesarily lead to that diversion of military emphasis to Asia which would end the Eisenhower project. But that is among the grave possibilities evoked by the President's order, and no one is more aware of it than Eisenhower himself.

Small War or Big?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE R. HOEY
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very well considered editorial entitled "Small War or Big?" which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor of Boston.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SMALL WAR OR BIG?

To get at the central meaning of the MacArthur controversy Americans need to ask themselves this question:

"Which of two wars do we want to fight, the war which began in Korea on last June 25 or 'an entirely new war' which would certainly spread to much of China and might envelop the world?"

The American purpose as stated by President Truman is to prevent world war III by vigorously resisting aggression but starting no new fires.

The war which the North Korean Communist puppets started—and which was taken up by the United States, the United Nations, and the Chinese Communists—was and still is a war for specific objectives and within geographical limits. The objectives, from the United Nations side, are (1) to repel and discourage aggression, and (2) to establish an independent, unified Korea.

The United Nations forces have won notable gains toward those objectives and are still advancing.

But is that too slow? Are Americans so eager to get out of a small war that they must take on a very much bigger war to extinguish it? Or does this sense of urgency arise from an exasperation with communism, a fear of it which has smoldered since the Reds first took over Russia in 1917, and a tacit assumption of irrepressible conflict which can end only in final war with that system?

The struggle has taken place by means short of war, by limited wars, by propaganda, and by civil strife, and it will continue in some form until the fallacious tenets and methods of communism no longer appeal to extensive sections of humanity. Whether the struggle shall be peaceful or violent, narrow or broad, rests partly with Communists, partly with opponents of communism.

Where Communists choose the road of war, as in Korea and earlier, Greece, they must be met with arms. But if Americans deliberately choose to bomb Chinese cities, containing great numbers of people not in sympathy with the Communists, even because Chinese Reds have shot American soldiers in Korea, it will certainly look to the ordinary Chinese and to a great many other people as if Americans are the aggressors.

When, as is commonly suspected, the Soviet rulers in Moscow gave a go-ahead to the North Koreans the conclusion was widely drawn that the Kremlin was willing to risk precipitating a third world war in reaching for its objectives. This was rightly considered a cold-blooded and reprehensible attitude.

Would a similar judgment be passed on the United States if, rather than accept a sharp handicap in the UN's method of waging war for Korea, it should insist on making air attacks which—if last year's Sino-Russian Treaty means anything—would bring Russian arms in on the side of the Chinese?

Of course, it is argued by advocates of such a course that Russia would not actually intervene but would back down before a show of sufficient force. Possibly that is true, but it may also be remembered that the original Communist move across the thirty-eighth parallel in Korea was predicated on a belief that the United States would not use force to resist that action.

To be sure, there is need for sharper crystallization of policies and courses of action by the UN in bringing the Korean matter to a satisfactory conclusion. There should be earnest Anglo-American consultations to bring the views of these two leading nations closer together on dealing with Communist China. And there should be more meaningful discussions in the UN Sanctions Committee looking toward tighter control of trade with China and toward added contributions of troops to Korea.

The choice of broad courses here described is scarcely one on which any mortal could assume to know all the pertinent factors or to exercise an infallible judgment. The subject is one for earnest public debate and equally earnest individual soul-searching. To us it seems that the more justifiable course lies in the direction of limitation of war and of refusing to foment additional hostilities.

Another Idea Would Be To Have Our Own Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOWARD H. BUFFETT
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article by Bruce Barton entitled "The British:"

Dr. George Riley, the famous osteopath, was once invited to meet George Bernard Shaw, a devotee of osteopathy.

They had hardly shaken hands before Shaw burst into bitter vituperation of America.

Dr. Riley stood it for about 3 minutes and then cried out: "Stop that. You ought to be ashamed of yourself. How dare you, a man whose food and clothes and roof-tree are principally paid for by the money of American book buyers and playgoers, how dare you say such things about a country and a people of which you are so abysmally ignorant? I never knew such impudence."

Shaw shut his mouth. A look of amazement came into his eyes, but with it a glint of admiration. He told a friend afterward: "That man Riley is one of the most interesting people I ever met."

Too many British authors and lecturers have accepted our hospitality—often lavish and effusive to the point of servility—taken their winnings and gone back home to write and talk scurvily about us.

Too many of the British people as a whole, jealous of our prosperity, are unfriendly at heart. For years they sold us the idea that, except for protection of their fleet, we would have been helpless. But they never said from whom their fleet was protecting us; and in our Civil War, when our need of help was most desperate, their seapower, instead of helping us, tried to destroy our merchant marine.

Yet I admire the British. They write the English language better than we—we have no Shakespeare, no Milton. Their administration of justice is swifter, cheaper, and more dignified. In the conduct of foreign affairs they are so much smarter that it just is not funny.

Indeed, one of my distinguished lawyer friends, a long-time subscriber to the London Spectator, tells me that by reading it he has long been able to predict 6 months in advance just what our State Department would do—the British loan, the Marshall plan, the Atlantic Pact, and so forth.

Lately, Russia has been making our foreign policy. When she lets out a blast, we promptly blast her back. When she nudges the North Koreans into starting a rumpus, we obligingly reply with our whole Army and heaven only knows how many billions of dollars, while she loses not one soldier or one ruble.

Dancing to Russia's fiddle is getting us nowhere. We might better go back to letting the English manage us, however much we may dislike them. They know their way around, especially in the Orient, where they operated for more than 150 years at a handsome profit.

Another idea, of course, would be to have our own foreign policy. But since, to make any sense, this would have to be based on America first, it is out. Every other nation can be for itself first. But not the United States. The mere suggestion is "un-American."

The Lincoln Legend, Then and Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHAUNCEY W. REED
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. REED of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, April 15, 1951, a group of several hundred citizens gathered at Ford's Theater in our Nation's capital. It was there, on April 14, 1865, that an assassin fired a shot, that, on the following day, ushered into eternity, one of the world's greatest characters. Although 86 years have elapsed since that tragic hour the name of Abraham Lincoln still "belongs to the ages."

The chairman of Sunday's memorial service, sponsored by the National Park Service and the Lincoln Group of the District of Columbia, was our colleague, Hon. GEORGE A. DONDERO, of Royal Oak, Mich. The principal address was delivered by Dr. J. Walter Coleman, superintendent of the Gettysburg National Military Park of Gettysburg, Pa., and is hereto included as an extension of my remarks:

I undertook this little task in the belief that it would be an interesting exercise to compare some of the opinions which people expressed toward Lincoln in his own day and at present. Due allowance must, of course, be made for the familiar American tendency of letting adverse opinion of public figures mellow rapidly with the years. But, while some of this change in attitude toward Lincoln is sentimental, much of it, as I shall illustrate, is carefully considered. Unfavorable criticisms must be viewed against the customs of the times. If the late President Roosevelt, for example, had delivered an oratorical gem like the Gettysburg address, what would have been the comments of his severest editorial critics? I doubt that any of them would have sought an unenviable immortality by calling it disgraceful, but we must bear in mind that a considerable percentage of the comment on any incumbent President is automatically unfavorable. It is also human nature for indignant objectors to a Presidential course of action to be more vocal than the supporters.

We would therefore expect bitter expressions of disapproval during his lifetime and a generally more friendly attitude in later years. But this natural trend does not account for the even heightening interest in the man on not merely a national but a world-wide basis. The Lincoln legend is growing.

The reasons for this growth are not hard to find, but let me present a few personal observations to illustrate that it is a fact. For example, the Lincoln Fellowship of Pennsylvania has members scattered throughout the country. It meets at Gettysburg, always on November 19, and at some other times throughout the year. Mr. John D. Lippy, Jr., who is with us today, proprietor of the Lincoln Room in the Wills House is the president and I am the secretary. Its membership is a cross section of American life. From Philadelphia we have had a woodworking craftsman, an express agent, an AFL organizer, and the president of Penn Mutual Life Insurance Co. We have battlefield guides, a grocery store manager, a college president and a high executive in the Du Pont Co. They belong to the organization because they are interested in attending programs devoted to Lincoln, the man of the people.

I have been at Gettysburg 10 years. My observation has been that people visiting the park and cemetery are about as much interested in Lincoln's address as they are in the battle. This opinion is supported by the guides, our historians, and persons operating the several private museum displays in the town. Dr. Henry Hanson, president of Gettysburg College, told me once of the visit of a famous Japanese educator whom he conducted over the battlefield as his guest. It was a cold rainy day. They finally reached the national cemetery and the visitor left the car and stood, hatless, on the spot where the address had been delivered. "This is the memory," he said, "that I want to take back with me." Dr. Waldo Leland, last Wednesday, related an almost identical experience with the Minister from Norway.

Travelers have told me that they have commonly encountered school children in countries like Denmark and Switzerland who could recite the address perfectly in English. I think there can be no question that Lincoln's stature as a world figure is constantly increasing. Our American stronghold of democracy is, of course, more important in world affairs now than it was nine decades ago, but much of its importance stems from the fact that we had a Lincoln when we needed him, and that "When the Judgment thunders split the house, he held the ridgpole up and spiked again the rafters of the home." Great scholars are constantly finding in him a subject for study. They tell us how he emerged, how he found a general, how he conducted diplomacy in carpet slippers and how he shared the ordeal of the Union. If we cannot all understand the deeper complexities of that social and political cataclysm of the sixties, we all do know that the man surmounted fantastic difficulties in rising to our highest national honor, and in steering the ship of state through those troubled waters.

Lincoln's background, for an American legend, could hardly be improved upon. His people were English, they came to America before the Revolution. They migrated gradually westward by going down the great valley of Virginia from Pennsylvania, like Daniel Boone. Lincoln was born in a log cabin. His grandfather was killed by the Indians. Thomas Lincoln, his father, was poor but he possessed those skills essential to the frontier which gave his family enough to eat and wear. Abraham's schooling was brief, even for the frontier, but this unlettered man was able, by keen logic and homely aphorism, to hold his own in the courtroom or on the stump, with the smartest people, first in that part of Illinois or later, most anywhere. Abe Lincoln was big and strong in the days when the expression a "good man" had two different meanings, depending on which word received the inflection. He could chop and split rails, he could shoot. His private life was impeccable, but he could tell and enjoy a story as well as the next fellow when he was out with the boys. He didn't mind people taking a drink, although he didn't use the stuff himself. He had sincere Christian convictions which were, however, not formalized into any particular dogma. This Horatio Alger formula for human interest is doubtless a factor in the legend, if it does not affect our objective estimate of his ability. Contemporary critics were not impressed by it.

I have often talked with my father about the Civil War and Lincoln. Born in 1855 in Susquehanna County, Pa., he retained vivid childhood recollections. When I recently visited the little family burial plot a hundred yards from our home, I discovered the reason why memories of the Battle of Gettysburg were a trifle vague. Six of his little cousins were buried that week, victims of typhoid fever. His recovery left him too weak to be much interested in affairs of 1863, but he remembered well his tenth birthday, Monday, April 17, 1865. The mailman, slogging through the spring mud, brought stirring news that day. He first reported that two local Republican youths had been drafted, and a friendly Lemocrat had escaped the call. He was quite happy. Was there any other news? Oh, yes, Old Abe has been shot and I'm glad of it. The brutality of the statement shocked the little boy, and he often mentioned it. Fifty years later, when I was 10, my father reminded me of the incident. He said, "You know, I've thought about it quite a lot, and as near as I can figure out, Lincoln was about as great a man as Washington." A ground swell for the Lincoln legend.

Grandfather's comments come to me second hand, but on the subject of Lincoln they are definitely pungent. His district was famous, briefly, in the middle forties because of Congressman David Wilmot and his famous provisos, but, by the fifties, as Prof. Avery Craven recalls, Wilmot had already returned to enjoy a well-deserved obscurity in his backward constituency. He had been the lone Pennsylvanian to vote against a protective tariff. The irate Governor of Pennsylvania declared that the only thing that district ever manufactured was shingles and they stole the lumber to make them. He was wrong on two counts. They had plenty of shingle timber, and they also made whisky.

Congressman Wilmot was succeeded by his law partner, and my grandfather's attorney, Galusha A. Grow. Mr. Grow, later to become Speaker of the House, switched from the Democratic to the Republican Party, and grandfather disapproved of him and his famous Homestead Act. He thought that the new party was giving away land to worthless migrants who should have to buy it like his grandfather had done. His widowed sister, married to a Maryland Carroll, killed in the Confederate Army at Buzzard's Roost, had brought back reports about slavery that were somewhat at variance with Uncle Tom's Cabin, and he had a poor opinion generally of President Lincoln.

One of grandfather's youthful friends was an eccentric boy named Locke. His mother was a Ross who lived about a mile away. David Ross Locke had gone out to Ohio and become a newspaper man, writing what my grandfather called nonsense. He was a great favorite of Lincoln and had been entertained at the White House. He wrote under the absurd name of Petroleum Vesuvius Nasby.

But the years were to mellow even the considered opinions of Mr. Darius Coleman. He died thinking that Lincoln's Presidency was maybe the best thing that could have happened, but he always wished that Horace Greeley could have beaten Grant.

Lincoln made men follow him. When Noah Brooks went to hear him at the Cooper Union Institute he was cynical. He saw his awkwardness and heard the uncouth frontier pronunciation. "Old fellow, you won't do," he said. "It's all very well for the Wild West, but this will never go, down in New York." As Brooks recalled it later, "A friend said to me after the meeting, What do you think of Abe Lincoln, the rail-splitter? He's the greatest man since St. Paul, I said, and I think so yet."

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

In 1894 Woodrow Wilson was a professor of jurisprudence and political science at Wesleyan College. In an article for Forum magazine, entitled "A Calendar of Great Americans," he designated Lincoln as "the supreme American of our history."

Lincoln is a man of so universal appeal that he has become virtually all things to all people. Like the scripture, he is quoted by all shades from reactionary to pink. Conservatives warn us that we must return to the Lincolnian principles of government if our Nation is to remain free, overlooking the dire fact that Lincoln's government was at war from the outset and was forced, as I see it, to employ all kinds of restrictive measures, repugnant to Americans at times of peace. Radicals, on the other hand, assure us that freedom can only be attained by more and more drastic legislation, curbing the evils of capitalistic slave driving, and citing the Emancipation Proclamation and the thirteenth amendment as the beginning. Would Lincoln, if he were to be reincarnated today, be puzzled by these apparent contradictions? No, they existed also in his day. He would recall that the Republicans were denounced in 1856 as Communists and as high tariff economic royalists, alike.

Lincoln is great because he served as a fine leader of a mighty nation in the first war of modern times, in terms of the mechanical age. He had the courage to try to keep that Nation one, choosing the awful alternative of internecine war, rather than to let the dissenting States form their own government. In poker parlance, they might have split the pot, and ended the game peaceably, but this was not to be, and the times have borne out the wisdom of the course of action. The war for the Union was the first fought with weapons of steam (the gunboat and the locomotive), electricity (instantaneous communication by telegraph), and the enormous ramifications of these devices. It was the first great war directed from headquarters at the Nation's Capital. It was the first struggle of major proportions to be adequately reported in the daily papers.

We know that Lincoln's greatness is based on tangible evidence of his vast ability. And yet we love him, we revere his memory for other qualities. About a week before his death, when Lincoln entered Richmond he called at the home of Gen. George Pickett. The general was originally a Virginian who lived in Illinois as a young man and had been appointed to the United States Military Academy from that State. The President knew him quite well. He asked if General Pickett were at home, and he was told that the general was with his command in the Army. The servant offered to take a message, and asked who it was that he should say had called. The President replied, "just tell him that it was an old friend from Illinois." When I recall that expression, I feel that in a very real sense, to me, to all of us, Lincoln is primarily an old friend from Illinois.

Preservation of American Sovereignty Over Lake Michigan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement presented by me to the House Committee on Public Works on April 11, 1951, pointing out what I believe to be a serious defect in the agreement with Canada for construction of the St. Lawrence seaway.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESERVE AMERICAN SOVEREIGNTY OVER LAKE MICHIGAN

(Statement by Senator HUGH BUTLER, of Nebraska)

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, since the birth of this Nation and its expansion to the west, we have adhered to the position that Lake Michigan is wholly American. It lies entirely within our boundaries and is fed only by water that has fallen on our soil—and its waters are ours to do with as we will. That position has been expressly recognized and conceded in formal treaties with Canada, particularly the treaty of 1909, which is the basis for our present relationships with Canada with respect to these waters.

For many years, our diplomatic representatives exercised constant vigilance to insure that there were no encroachments upon our sovereignty over that great body of water. And it required much care and vigilance. Our neighbors, with true British tenacity, have constantly sought to obtain some sort of toehold that would give them ground to assert an interest in it.

That tenacity of the Canadians first bore fruit in the early treaty negotiations between the United States and Canada for development of the still pending St. Lawrence seaway project. The treaty negotiated some 20 years ago contained a provision, article VIII, which would have internationalized Lake Michigan.

Under this proviso, Lake Michigan would have been placed in the category of the boundary Lakes—Superior, Huron, Erie and Ontario. Article VIII specifically empowered an international board to enter all cases of disagreement in matters relating to the waters of Lake Michigan. The international board thus was empowered to control and perhaps prevent the use of waters of Lake Michigan by Chicago or any of the other lakes or cities.

That treaty fortunately failed of ratification in the Senate. There can be no doubt that the inclusion of article VIII in the covenant contributed largely to its defeat.

The present proposed agreement between the United States and Canada for construction of the St. Lawrence seaway was negotiated by the two Governments and submitted as a substitute for the defeated treaty. Again, those who represented us in the matter would have surrendered our sovereignty over Lake Michigan. Article VIII in its original form was rewritten into the new covenant. The framers didn't even have the originality to change the article number.

The abhorrence with which the legislative branch regards this reversal of our traditional policy has been demonstrated in the past and is again shown in the case of the pending resolutions to approve the St. Lawrence seaway agreement. Even those who favor the project have taken exception to this article. Their resolutions specifically provide for its elimination from the agreement.

I feel that I may fairly state that we have good ground to be suspicious of our own diplomats so far as this question is concerned. Twice within 20 years they have attempted to enter into deals with Canada that would undo the efforts of their predecessors for a hundred years before them. We have learned through experience that we must be constantly on guard if we are to protect our heritage in the waters of that Great Lake.

The Secretary of State has lately appeared before this committee in support of the pending resolutions, including the elimination of article VIII (c). However, his statement has raised very serious questions in my mind. By a series of half-truths and omissions of highly important facts, he has created the distinct impression that he is prepared to surrender to the British Empire the power to tell us what we may or may not do with the waters of Lake Michigan.

While the Secretary agreed to the elimination of article VIII (c), I am fearful that the very nature of his reasoning on the subject, as expressed in his statement before the committee, may have tended to restore it in full force and effect.

He argued that striking out article VIII (c) does not weaken Canadian rights and does not make American rights any more secure. In this fashion, the Secretary would negate the efforts of the Congress to safeguard the traditional United States jurisdiction over its great inland lake, 60 miles from the international border. Statements of highly placed Government officials in formal hearings before congressional committees may be given great weight in the future interpretation of the agreement.

Mr. Acheson's reasoning requires some analysis. First, he states that "the 1909 treaty provides that no uses, obstructions, or diversions of boundary waters might thereafter be made on either side of the line without respect to the International Joint Commission or to a special agreement between the parties."

Later, discussing specifically the elimination of article VIII (c), he acknowledges that that article (for the internationalizing of Lake Michigan) was intended in particular to relate to possible future increase in the diversion of Lake Michigan waters through the Chicago Drainage Canal. In that connection, he went on to say: "The issue as to the Chicago Drainage Canal was settled by the decision of the Supreme Court in Wisconsin v. Illinois, in April 1930, which enjoined the objectionable diversion. The International Joint Commission has complete jurisdiction over diversion of boundary waters in general, and both countries have regarded with satisfaction the exercise of that jurisdiction by the Commission."

Thus, we have a responsible official of our Government stating categorically that the question of diversion at Chicago is settled for all time. He certainly implies that any other question that might arise would fall within the jurisdiction of an international tribunal. What he did not explain is that the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 contains a definition of boundary waters which excludes Lake Michigan in its entirety. Included within that term are only those waters through which pass the international boundary, while the northernmost point of Lake Michigan is some 60 miles south of that line. Specifically, the definition excludes those tributary waters which flow into boundary waters.

This entire exclusion of Lake Michigan was no matter of accident or happenstance. It was done deliberately and carefully in order to insure that our complete sovereignty was in no way endangered.

On January 30, 1909, the Honorable Elihu Root, then Secretary of State, a great diplomat, and a great American, appeared before the Senate committee to explain the provisions of that treaty. After the preliminary article, containing the definition, was read, Secretary Root states: "The definition of boundary waters was carefully drawn in order to exclude Lake Michigan."

The 1909 treaty, and the explanatory statements of those responsible for its promulgation, seem perfectly clear as to the strict limits of the jurisdiction of the international tribunal. Not until recent years, when it seems to have become the fashion for our diplomats to give away that for which our predecessors strived, has anyone thrown doubt upon it. Now we have from the Secretary of State a statement which might well be cited by our neighbors in support of a contrary view.

So far as the diversion question itself is concerned, Mr. Acheson would brush it aside by the bland assertion that it has been finally and conclusively settled by the Supreme Court in the Lake Levels case. He implies that the whole question is now of no importance.

If it is of no importance, why should our Canadian neighbors have been so anxious to write article VIII into the treaty which was signed in 1932, and defeated in the Senate a couple of years later? Why have they insisted on inserting article VIII (c), into this agreement? The answer is obvious from the Supreme Court decision, which may be found at 281 United States 179.

There the Court, Mr. Justice Holmes delivering the opinion, clearly recognized that it was dealing with a controversy between States, in a field where the Congress had not exercised its authority. The decision is strictly limited to those issues.

The prospect of such congressional action appears throughout the opinion, as where the Court said, "These requirements (of immediate action) as between the parties are the constitutional right of those States, subject to whatever modification they hereafter may be subjected to by Congress acting within its authority. It will be time enough to consider the scope of that authority when it is exercised. * * * The right of the complainants to a decree is not affected by the possibility that Congress may take some action in the matter."

At other points the Court said, "All action of the parties and the Court in this case will be subject, of course, to any order that Congress may make in pursuance of its constitutional powers and any modification that necessity may show should be made by this Court," and "The amount of water ultimately to be withdrawn unless Congress may prescribe a different measure is relatively small."

In its decree, the Court specified that any of the parties might from time to time apply to the Court for action or relief with respect to various points of its provisions, including the diversion of water from Lake Michigan.

It therefore is evident that the diversion question is far from being settled in the conclusive manner that Mr. Acheson implies. To the contrary, it may be reopened at any time that need therefor becomes pressing—by further proceedings in the Court, or by action of the Congress.

In the light of this diplomatic background, it is extremely important to be sure exactly what Mr. Acheson meant. When he said, "The issue as to the Chicago drainage canal was settled by the decision of the Supreme Court," was that statement intended to give assurance to Canada that the case would never be reopened? In other words, is his entire statement to be interpreted as an assurance to Canada that we are prepared to relinquish our complete sovereignty over Lake Michigan? If such an assurance is to be part of the permanent record of these hearings, it may be difficult to prevent such an interpretation of this agreement.

Although the Secretary of State may not be able to tie the hands of future Congresses completely, he may make it exceedingly difficult for Congress ever to take action in opposition to his interpretation of the agreement. The Executive has a veto over the actions of Congress, which can be overridden only by a two-thirds vote of both Houses.

If the question of the use of the waters of Lake Michigan should be opened by Congress, what then? Mr. Acheson implies that any possible dispute between this country and Canada will be settled by the International Joint Commission. Judging from his remarks, Canada is satisfied that leaving out article VIII (c) will make no difference in the actual interpretation of the agreement. Certainly Congress is under the impression that deleting article VIII (c) does make a difference. That is why we are leaving it out.

Are we to infer that Canada will have just as much to say in the use of Lake Michigan waters without article VIII (c), as they would have with it? That is the only inference that I can draw from the Secretary's remarks.

Gentlemen, this is not a matter to be treated lightly. This is a great Nation with, we earnestly hope, a long and glorious future. The needs of that future cannot now be foretold with certainty. Diversion from Lake Michigan may have to be increased before too long. There already are indications that the present flow may not long suffice to meet the combined needs of sanitation in the growing Chicago area and the needs of the expanding commerce over the Lake-to-the-Gulf waterway, authorized and completed by the Congress since the taking of evidence in that case.

Surely, we must not now permit the creation of a situation which might in the future operate to rob us of rights which have been so zealously guarded by those who preceded us.

When people employ the term "sold down the river," they usually refer to the Mississippi. If this radical departure from our previous policy is permitted to stand, the people of this Nation, particularly those of the midcontinent area, are likely to discover that they have been sold down the St. Lawrence.

I hope the day will never come when we in the United States of America have to ask any foreign country, friend or foe, whether we can divert water out of a lake entirely within our own borders, and drawing water entirely from American soil.

Hearings before this committee have shown that many of the proponents of the seaway have feared economic stagnation in the Great Lakes area if the seaway was not completed. The improper use of the waters of Lake Michigan could stagnate industries already established. The loss of control of Lake Michigan could stifle the development of Chicago, Gary, and many other cities around Lake Michigan.

I submit that this matter is too vital to our sovereignty and our future welfare to be treated casually or informally. In view of Mr. Acheson's position, the entire question of the St. Lawrence should be made the subject of a formal treaty, spelling out in detail just what is intended to be covered, and just how each item is to be treated. We should lay the whole picture before the American people. Only in that fashion can we be sure that we are not through loose interpretation and casual conversation of the diplomatic corps, to lay a basis for abandonment of strongholds so staunchly manned in the past.

"Senate Resolution 49

"Whereas early this morning President Truman announced the discharge of Gen. Douglas MacArthur from all of his military commands; and

"Whereas General MacArthur has long been a symbol of the determination of the free peoples of the world to resist totalitarian aggression and has been looked to with hope by the freedom-loving peoples of the world; and

General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Tablet, Brooklyn, N. Y., for April 14, 1951:

GENERAL MACARTHUR

A genuine American whose love of his country is first. A commander who won glory on a dozen battlefields; a strategist whose epoch-making achievements saved lives while winning victories; an administrator who obtained the confidence of the defeated foe and brought order out of chaos.

A Christian who believes in God and totally rejects communism, who never called its tyrannical head "Uncle Joe," who never found Russia an enigma and who neither compromised his principles nor attempted to appease an unappeasable tyranny.

A citizen who loves his country, first, last and all the time. For him there is no divided allegiance, no placing of Britain or any other country above his own. To him we all owe a debt which is impossible to repay in full.

HE CAN TAKE IT

The five-star general has lost his four commands. He does not have to worry. He got out at a good time and for a good reason and with the respect of his countrymen. He may be the means of exposing once and for all the subversive forces of hidden government assailed last year by Senator McCarthy, whose attacks on the enemy from within—our deadliest foe—are being more widely accepted each day as entirely justified.

It is lamentable that a temporary victory is scored over this rugged and authentic American by Dean Acheson, who could not turn his back on Alger Hiss, and by Gen. George Marshall, whose mission to China and its aftermath transferred that country from a friend to a foe and made communism the victor at a cost in lives, blood, and dollars that is incalculable.

General MacArthur has one charge against him. He was not obedient to civilian political leadership. He was not like other generals who sat silent while Russia was handed half of Germany and was permitted to seize other nations whose freedom they saw betrayed: who likewise offered no protest when our own Armed Forces were liquidated while the Reds solidified their aggression.

General MacArthur lost his command, but he saved his reputation. The charge of insubordination he can wear without odium.

THE PRESIDENT'S CASE

President Truman presented his case over the radio and television networks Wednesday night. Obviously nervous and under strain, Mr. Truman was on the defensive. What he failed to say aroused more interest than what he said. For instance, he emphasized that the United Nations, enemy was Soviet Russia; he failed to mention that Soviet Russia is the predominant force in the United Nations. Again, he declared the aim of the United States is to help peoples enslaved by Soviet Russia regain their independence; he did not mention the assignment of the United States Seventh Fleet to prevent the Chinese on Formosa from attempting to liberate their homeland. Most frightening of all to anyone with an elementary knowledge of communism was his incredible opinion that Soviet Russia could be scared or diverted from her objective—to enslave the world—by a show of strength in Korea.

President Truman has had his say. Now let General MacArthur present his case over the same Nation-wide facilities. The American people will hand down the verdict.

A Tragic Incident

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM K. VAN PELT

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. VAN PELT. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial appeared in the Fond du Lac Commonwealth Reporter. It expresses very clearly the concern and indignation of my constituents in the Sixth Wisconsin Congressional District. It expresses the bitterness of an aroused people who for a week have been flooding my office with telegrams and letters asking that the President be impeached and that our State Department be given a thorough cleaning starting with its head, Dean Acheson and all the others who would not turn their backs on a traitor. The Congress of these United States will and must accept this challenge. It is my sincere hope that after hearing General MacArthur express his own views and opinions to proceed at once on a constructive program—a program that will rebuild the morale of the American people rather than support the retrogressors and the socialistc schemers of England. Mr. Speaker, my oath of office was not taken lightly and I pledge to my colleagues my whole-hearted support to clean out the offices of our Government of men and women who would have us appease any foreign power. The editorial from the Reporter follows:

A Tragic Incident

Americans are shocked by the action of President Harry S. Truman in depriving Gen. Douglas MacArthur of his commands in the Orient at a climactic stage in the civilized world's battle to halt the spread of Russian Communist imperialism.

The President's orders can be criticized bitterly and defended cautiously, but to remove a great leader in such a manner does not seem the American way.

Yes, General MacArthur was a military man. He was brought up in the Army and lived the life of a soldier. There were many young men who fought in the Pacific during World War II. All of them knew that he was a hard taskmaster. They knew he expected them to act as soldiers and give their lives if need be in the defense of their country. Still, many a father and mother were thankful that so rigid a disciplinarian was in charge of their sons. He fought for the welfare of his men. He believed in ending a war as quickly as possible with a minimum loss of life and in getting the men back to their families.

General MacArthur wanted to finish the war in Korea. He wanted his boys back with their families. He realize that the war never could be won the way it is being fought and the way Washington wanted him to fight it. A stalemate in war is worse than war itself. It means the unnecessary sacrifice of life. We can go on fighting for 25 years or more and in the end be no closer to victory than we are today.

It is admitted that possibly there was little else President Truman could have done under the circumstances, but we believe he might have been more of a diplomat and prevented those circumstances. It is apparent, perhaps, that General MacArthur failed to obey instructions of his Commander in Chief, but there is a serious question who was the better acquainted with the real thing—the man on the spot or the man in the White House.

We regret that there should be so deep and so wide a breach in the difference of opinion between a great commander in the field and the administration itself as to the importance of the far-eastern theater.

Now that General MacArthur has been dismissed, isn't it time that something was done about Secretary of State Dean Acheson who dictated the policies which actually led to the breach between the President and General MacArthur?

The rift between the President and the general reminds us of Munich and Hitler. Serving the general's head up on a platter may appease the yapping yahoos of the British Socialist Government temporarily, but now that the diplomats and the politicians have taken over this war, what are they going to do with it?

General MacArthur, we are convinced, was asked to work completely in the dark. The outcome was inevitable.

The irony of the whole thing is that Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway, who has replaced General MacArthur, holds practically the same views as his former commander. He has said as much in various statements which have come from him out of Korea.

MacArthur is a great general. Loss of his services to the country in this time of need is tragic.

House Concurrent Resolution 93

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. ROSS ADAIR

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. ADAIR. Mr Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein House Concurrent Resolution 93, which was introduced by me on April 16, 1951, as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 93

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is hereby expressed to be the sense of the Congress that, because the people of the Nation have lost confidence in the foreign policies of the administration and in the manner in which those policies have been executed by Dean Acheson, he should be removed forthwith from the office of Secretary of State.

Sec. 2. It is further expressed to be the sense of the Congress that, because of the confidence which the people of the Nation have in General of the Army Douglas MacArthur, he should be afforded an opportunity to appear before a joint session of the Congress to give his views upon the situation in the Far East, and thereafter his experience and counsel should be utilized for the benefit of the people of our Nation at this time of grave crisis.

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the Record, I include an article by Mr. Rukeyser in the Journal-American on the dismissal of General MacArthur.

Mr. Rukeyser points out clearly that the men rejected by President Truman are the men whose names will be on the honor rolls of the future. The article follows:

Dismissal of MacArthur

(By M. S. Rukeyser)

America's top resources consist of the know-how of creative personalities, and the public sense of shock over the ouster of Gen. Douglas MacArthur reflected widespread instinctive appreciation of that fact.

The battle of the routineers against sheer excellency goes on in numerous areas of activity. The intrigue against MacArthur has seen its counterpart in the recent attempt of pressure groups to agitate against Charles E. Wilson, generalissimo of defense mobilization.

In science, as well as in the practical arts, the conventional tend to resent original source minds, on whom accelerated progress so much depends. Back in 1926 General Billy Mitchell was disciplined because he visualized the meaning of air power earlier than the persons who were his technical superiors.

From his days at West Point where he made top grades, General MacArthur has distinguished himself in thought as well as in action.

He has long been a symbol of American intelligence and strength.

He was not disposed to follow the line of least resistance, and permit his silence to give his fellow countrymen a false sense of security.

MacArthur's stature is measured by his unwillingness to alibi failure on the ground that he was following orders.

His chief aide, Maj. Gen. Courtney Whitney has stated that the general has complied meticulously with all directives he has received.

But as the responsible chief on the ground he undertook to make his full contribution to the formulation of policies in the interest of the United States.

There is no gainsaying the fact that there were differences of opinion between the general and those who tried to put wraps around him which lessened opportunities for victory.

But for the politicians to talk sanctimoniously as though the differences were only those of form, technicality, and discipline is to be grossly misleading.

It is part of the record that President Truman himself was none too meticulous in respecting the legal technicalities. Truman involved the United States in the Korean War without affirmative action by Congress by the device of characterizing it as a police action.

By removing General MacArthur from his command, Truman has in effect removed from the general the inhibitions on his self-expression. Now MacArthur will be released to set forth his ideas for the guidance of Congress and the American people.

None at this stage can add to or detract from MacArthur's record of extraordinary achievement. His record in the rehabilitation of Japan is virtually without precedent, and his great accomplishments on the field of battle in two world wars are recorded in the annals of history.

The slur on MacArthur recalls the fate meted out to the late Andrew W. Mellon, who served two terms as Secretary of the Treasury prior to the New Deal. As a public service, Mellon put his extraordinary fiscal talents at the disposal of the Federal Government. His achievement was epitomized in the reduction of the Federal debt by a billion dollars a year.

On his retirement, instead of erecting a monument to Mellon, the New Deal administration had him indicted for fraud in his personal income taxes. (The fact that Mellon disproved the charges in court is beside the point; it does not erase the record of impudence on the part of vindictive politicians, little men in big jobs.)

President Truman has shown an extraordinary loyalty to cronies and hacks among his employees. He sticks to them stubbornly in spite of revelations of improprieties. But his rejects include such first-rate personalities as MacArthur; Dr. Edwin G. Nourse, former Chairman, Council of Economic Advisers; Admiral Louis Emil Denfeld, former Naval Chief of Staff; and Robert Newton Denham, former chief counsel, National Labor Relations Board. The list of rejects sounds like a roll of honor.

Truman Goes Astray

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two leading editorials published in the Oregonian in my congressional district, one entitled "MacArthur Had To Go, but Now What, Mr. Truman?" which appeared on April 12, 1951, and the other entitled "Truman Goes Astray," which appeared April 13, 1951, as follows:

[From the Oregonian of April 12, 1951]

MACARTHUR HAD TO GO, BUT NOW WHAT, MR. TRUMAN?

This newspaper has been besieged with telephone calls denouncing President Harry S. Truman for the removal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur. Thousands of telegrams to the White House and Congress express similar outrage of the senders. Even some who have opposed the Korean War as futile and mistaken censure the President. This articulate reaction is reported from all over the United States. Defenders of the President have had little to say.

This hurricane of criticism cannot be attributed entirely to the popularity of General MacArthur. American public opinion has long been sharply divided there. Rather, it is the culmination of deep and gradually building resentment and apprehension of the foreign policies of President Truman and his Secretary of State, Dean Acheson. Republicans in Congress, quick to realize this, already are calling for General MacArthur's appearance before Congress—even for impeachment of the President.

When there is a cooling of public anger, the issues will become more plain. These, we fear, will divide the American people as they have seldom been divided in our times.

Fundamentally, the question is not whether General MacArthur as commander of the American and United Nations forces in the Orient was right in publicly advocating the use of Chinese Nationalist troops against Red China and UN bombing of the China mainland. It is not whether President Truman was right in ordering the UN forces to confine the war to the Korean Peninsula, denying the use of their full strength against numerically superior forces.

The basic issue is whether the traditional authority of civil government over military government shall be maintained in the United States. In plain words, General MacArthur defied the authority of the President in advocating foreign policies contrary to those of the civilian government. We think his purpose was laudable—to arouse the American people to the great peril of our men in Korea and thus to obtain the weapons to fight a successful war. But would it have been laudable had he put his words into action, without Presidential or congressional sanction, and carried the war to China—and to the Soviet Union if need be?

This newspaper stands for the supreme authority of civil government. The President and the general, in the situation which has developed, could not carry on their separate authorities. The general's authority was assumed, the President's founded in the Constitution.

But now that the President has asserted his authority, what will the American people say of his policies which have led us into a war which he is unwilling to let us win? The people's anger at the firing of General MacArthur is their answer. The smug satisfaction in the capitals of Europe, the Arab Nations, the Far East, and the Soviet sphere is the goad to their anger.

It was the soft Acheson-Truman policy in Asia—the abandonment of Formosa and Korea to Communist attack—which brought on the Korean War. Our Government, encouraged by the appeasers in the UN, left South Korea helpless and informed the Kremlin that we would not lift a finger to prevent aggression in the Orient. With that invitation, the Communists swarmed over the thirty-eighth parallel and increased their pressure on Indochina, Malaya, Indonesia, and the Philippines.

Now they are saying in London, Paris, Cairo, and New Delhi that the removal of MacArthur opens a new approach to settlement of the Korean War. What does that mean? The only terms the Chinese Communist government has advanced for even discussing a settlement are the cession of Formosa and the withdrawal of UN troops from Korea.

The British and the French are incredibly enmeshed in their fear and self-interest if they believe that with Formosa and Korea in Communist hands, Hong Kong and Indochina will be safe. It is the old, disgraceful story of Munich all over again. For our part, abandonment of Formosa and Korea would mean that in a brief time we would have to draw another defense line against Communist aggression in weakened Japan, the Philippines, and Alaska.

No one in authority has presented an alternative to General MacArthur's demand for the power and the strength to win the war in Korea and stop Red aggression in its tracks. The President's removal of MacArthur leaves Lt. Gen. Matthew Ridgway in the same exposed and helpless position.

This, we feel, is the deep-lying cause of public anger against President Truman and his European-minded advisers in the State Department. Virtually abandoned by the United Nations in a police action the UN approved, our soldiers await the man-mass of Asia, fighting a defensive war on terms arranged by persons and nations with other fish to fry. Now that the President has rid himself of General MacArthur, whose courage and brilliance as a soldier can be questioned by no one, will the policy be one of submission to communism, or will he give General Ridgway the tools to win?

[From the Oregonian of April 13, 1951]

TRUMAN GOES ASTRAY

President Truman's defense of his limited war policy in the Far East—in his hurry-up radio address intended to counteract the national tide of criticism of the replacement of General MacArthur—is inconsistent. Whether his foreign policy is his own—the sole result of his best judgment and consultation with American advisers—or whether it has been influenced by pressures from abroad is of grave concern to the people of the United States. For it may have to be changed.

The heart of his policy of refusing to permit United Nations forces in Korea to defend themselves by bombing Chinese-Russian supply lines and bases in Manchuria lies in his statement: "We are trying to prevent a third world war."

His initial assumption is that the Soviet Union is encouraging and supplying Communist China to make war against the free nations in Korea. This, everyone knows. The Russians armed and trained the North Korean Communists and led them up to the thirty-eighth parallel. The group of MIG jet planes which attacked American bombers a day after General MacArthur was fired were Russian planes, operating from Chinese bases in the "sanctuary," and possibly piloted by Russians.

The purpose of the Soviet Union, the President avers, is to draw the United States into a full-scale war against China, with commitment of land, sea, and air forces to such an extent that the United States would be terribly weakened. This is the fear shared by the Europeans—that American power may be so exhausted by fighting the Chinese that it will not be available to throw back a Russian invasion of Western Europe.

This theory necessarily embraces the belief that the Chinese Reds would fight Russia's war of world conquest in the Orient, as a puppet nation without help or with little help from the U. S. S. R., while the Soviets devoted their entire strength to the conquest of Europe.

But to have their hands free in Europe, the Soviets would have to be assured first of deep and irrevocable commitment of American forces in the Far East.

Neither General MacArthur nor anyone else has advocated commitment of large-scale American land forces to war on the Chinese mainland. All that has been asked is the right to unleash our Air Force where it will do the most good in stopping the mass invasion of Korea by Chinese troops.

We give no consideration here, nor did General MacArthur, to the mutual-assistance pact signed by Joseph Stalin and Mao Tse-tung. It means no more in Communist performance than did the Soviet-Nationalist China nonaggression pact or the German-Russian-Japanese agreement broken in World War II both by Germany and by Russia. Had the Soviet Union been sincere in declaring the Korean War a defensive war by Red China against American invasion, the Russians would already be in the far eastern fighting.

President Truman's case against bombing Chinese bases falls apart if one accepts, as he seems to accept, the premise that the Soviet Union's hope is to conquer Europe while puppet Chinese armies fight the Kremlin's war in Asia. We suspect, along with General MacArthur, that such bombing would hasten China's withdrawal from the Korean War without added hazard of Russian intervention.

Policy Over Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Christian Science Monitor of April 17, 1951:

POLICY OVER POLITICS

The first purpose of the American people in the MacArthur affair should be to clarify and unify their aims in the Far East. There is still hope that a firmer, sharper national policy can be hammered out of the debate which started with so much emphasis on personalities and politics. The general's return may even promote the exercise of good will and good sense.

One unifying development is already in evidence—the purpose to give him a warm and appreciative welcome home. Even those most opposed to the general's views are joining generously in paying tribute to his great services. And General MacArthur shows a desire to speak only in general terms rather than to become the angry spearhead of a crusade. We assume that he will follow through with this tone. If so, he can do much to hold the debate on a higher level.

But the discussion will have to go beyond generalities. Questioning by congressional committees rather than formal speechmaking is the most promising way of digging below the surface of this question. Much will depend on whether the politicians continue to make a political football of the general's dismissal. If the Wherry-Martin Republicans pursue their attacks on President Truman, Democrats will doubtless counterattack, hitting the general on the question of insubordination.

Things have gone so far already that this kind of inquiry may be inescapable. But it is likely to be less useful than an effort to get out on the table all relevant and nonsecret information regarding policy issues. General MacArthur has called the policy which seeks to limit hostilities to Korea a "handicap unprecedented in military history." So far we have not seen why bombing Chinese bases is so vital that to do it America should risk appearing as an aggressor, splitting the United Nations and bringing Russia in. But General MacArthur's reasons should be fully laid out.

At the same time it would be highly useful to have a review and estimate of what has been and is being accomplished in Korea. Although General MacArthur has appeared to be out of sympathy with the recent purposes of UN there, we doubt if he will "throw down" the Korean enterprise as completely as Senator TAFT did a few days ago. The latter seemed to regard as futile all the sacrifices made in Korea.

The vast majority of Americans supported the decision to resist aggression in Korea. If it was right last July, is it not right today? As we see it, the action of the UN there may well prove to be a historic step in the organization of peace. It reversed the policy of appeasement which led to World War II and proved the peace-loving nations' ability to join in halting lawlessness. The Kremlin's plans were upset, the North Koreans overthrown, and the Chinese Reds punished.

Senator TAFT says the Chinese have lost nothing except a few men. American military estimates run from 200,000 to 300,000. The economic drain on a poor country is heavy, and the Reds' military prestige has been seriously damaged. Of course, the situation is far from what might be wished and a happy ending is not readily visible. But let us not undervalue the policy which has united the forces of 14 nations in active resistance to aggression. May we not still hope that Korea has raised a real barrier to Russian imperialism and is giving the free nations time to gain the strength which can prevent world war III?

Declaration of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. O. K. ARMSTRONG
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Speaker, after visiting the battlefields of Korea, after seeing first-hand the tremendous price being paid by our fighting men in dead and wounded, it seems to me that the Congress has overlooked one responsibility of major importance—that of declaring war.

That we are at war is obvious. All the branches of our fighting forces are employed in combat. Our casualties have now mounted to more than 60,000 men, about 10,000 of whom have given their lives in this, the dirtiest, cruelest war in history. The President of the United States repeatedly refers to the war in Korea. We are asked to draft the boys from our States and districts to fill the needs of the war in Korea. We are required to appropriate billions to prosecute the war in Korea.

The Constitution of the United States places upon Congress, and Congress alone, the power and responsibility to declare war. It seems to me an immoral and shameful thing to send our boys to their death in a war which Congress has not officially declared to exist.

I realize that any Member of this House can introduce a resolution for a declaration of war against those who have declared war, by their aggressions against us and other members of the United Nations. However, I am informed that such responsibility rests primarily upon the administration leaders. I, therefore, call upon the majority leaders of this House to assume their duty in this respect. We are at war. Why then should administration spokesmen ignore their clear duty to recognize the war in a constitutional manner?

Radio Poll in Nebraska on Military Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH BUTLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the results of a poll conducted by radio station WJAG at Norfolk, Nebr., giving the opinions of a typical cross-section of Nebraska residents on several questions of current interest relating to our military policy. This poll was completed prior to the dismissal of General MacArthur. I offer a news release prepared by the radio station, giving results of the opinion survey, together with various comments on it.

There being no objection, the news release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Radio station WJAG, Norfolk, Nebr., completed a public-opinion survey April 8, 1951. The survey consisted of three questions, originally broached on the station's noon forum program the Voice of the People. Interest was entirely spontaneous. No prizes were offered. Questions were repeated once each day.

The duration of the survey was 3 weeks. Opinions were received through mail, personal interviews and telephone interviews. The total responses were 756. Of this number 460 were by letter, 200 by personal interview, the remainder by telephone interview.

The tabulated results of the opinion survey were as follows:

Question No. 1: Shall we withdraw our troops from Korea and leave that country to the Communists?

Yes, 46.6 percent.
No, 48.4 percent.
Qualified, 5 percent.
(The popular qualification, stop at the thirty-eighth parallel.)

Question No. 2: Should the President or Congress have the authority to send United States troops overseas?

Congress, 69.9 percent.
President, 5.9 percent.
President and Congress, 15.4 percent.
Undecided, 8.8 percent.

Question No. 3: Should the United States send additional troops to Europe under General Eisenhower's command?

Yes, 39.5 percent.
No, 52.6 percent.
Qualified, 7.9 percent.
(The popular qualification, United States supply troops in fair proportion with European countries.)

Results of the poll have been requested by Senators BUTLER and WHERRY, and Congressman KARL STEFAN, of Nebraska. Senator BUTLER said he intended to insert the results in the RECORD.

Radio station WJAG has drawn these conclusions after completion of the tabulation of the opinion survey:

First. Persons submitting opinions by letter were more extreme; that is, more conservative or radical.

Second. Persons submitting opinions by personal or telephone interviews were by far the more aggressive. These persons tended to favor remaining in Korea and also sending more troops to Europe. A majority personally interviewed bemoaned General MacArthur's present position; most of them feeling he and his troops were not receiving proper support.

Third. That a definite state of confusion exists within the public minds pertaining to United States foreign policy but that the trend is definitely established for more decisions to be made by Congress. Those advocating withdrawal of troops from Korea frequently asked "Why are we there?" Others suggested withdrawal unless we fight more aggressively.

Fourth. Those interviewed complained the public was not being properly informed. Many expressed doubt that Congress was being taken into confidence on foreign issues.

A separate breakdown of the survey by sex showed no substantial change in the above percentages. Women displayed only a slight tendency to avoid conflict by returning our troops or keeping them at home.

Address of Hon. Kenneth B. Keating, of New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a noteworthy address delivered by our colleague the Honorable KENNETH B. KEATING, of the Fortieth District, State of New York, before the New York State DAR luncheon on Tuesday, April 17, in Washington, D. C.:

ADDRESS AT NEW YORK STATE DAR LUNCHEON BY HON. KENNETH B. KEATING, OF NEW YORK

Madam State Regent Cook, my distinguished colleague, Mrs. ST. GEORGE, and Daughters of the American Revolution of New York State, whoever picked out this week for the annual DAR Congress ought to be able to land a job anywhere as a crystal-ball gazer. When your State regent wrote me last November asking me to address your luncheon meeting today, I must confess that in my acceptance I did not envision, as your committee on arrangements seems to have done, the momentous events of last week and this week. You are certainly here at a historic moment, quite in keeping with the traditions of your illustrious organization. My remarks for this occasion were prepared before last Wednesday morning at 1 a. m., hence they will not relate, except in passing, to the great controversy which has rocked the country. Perhaps that is just as well, for if feeling is running as high throughout New York State from which you hail as it is in Washington and as my bushel baskets of mail indicate that it is in my own congressional district, it may be a welcome relief to you to hear, as it is to me to talk, about some subject other than the President's dismissal of a great military figure.

Just let me say this one word. Despite the strong convictions which you or I may have as to the wisdom or otherwise and the justice or injustice of the action which has taken place, the important thing for us as Americans to do is to look to the future. Let us not forget that hundreds of thousands of American youth, our most precious possession, are either in the Far East, or on ships, or in camps destined for that theater of operations. Let us not forget that their welfare and, perhaps, their lives and the lives of you and me and the welfare of our children and grandchildren depend upon keeping our heads and steering the right course in the days that lie ahead.

In other words, the real problem upon which we must focus our attention is not what to do with President Truman or General MacArthur, but what to do with Korea.

Our young men out there are being made targets because someone in Washington or in New York or perhaps London or Paris cannot make up his mind what to do.

We cannot sit still and do nothing. It seems to me we must choose a course and do it soon. We cannot simply sit back and wait for somebody or some event to bail us out. We have gone too far to continue the old policy of "let the dust settle in the Far East."

We must get away from platitudes and get down to business. We have heard enough of phrase making about avoiding a third world war, about the control of the military by the civilian, about the inherent powers of a Commander in Chief—all these so-called issues which are not issues at all. Everyone accepts them as basic principles. At the moment we have only one plan advanced for narrowing the Korean conflict and bringing the Korean War to a speedy conclusion. That may not be the right plan, but it is high time that any others who have any other plan lay it out on the table and let us examine it and compare it with the one already advanced. And in selecting the course to follow, let us base our decision not on personalities, not on a stubborn adherence to positions which may have once been taken but which no longer recognize the reality of the hour, but rather by an open-minded and unbiased appraisal of the evidence which can now be brought to bear on this problem.

One fact emerges starkly from the grim pattern of war and violence—only strength impresses the aggressors. Only strength, military, economic, social and above all, spiritual, can form the soil from which a just, lasting, and honorable peace will spring.

The forces of evil which are loose in the world today are atheistic and lawless, and have no respect for the rights or wishes of either other persons or other nations. Today, much as we may dislike the fact, to be well-intentioned and peace-loving is not enough. America must be so strong that the warlords and dictators will be convinced that they must abandon their announced plans to crush the United States and dominate the world.

The new and terrifying weapons which man has invented have, perforce, altered our conception of our role in the world and our plans for defense of our country. It is no longer enough to possess the productive capacity to turn out weapons in such quantity that we will win the war eventually. Eventually is many atomic bombs too late in this age. With guided missiles and jet planes carrying atomic weapons at hundreds of miles an hour—almost faster than the uninitiated can conceive—our defenses can never be down and our guard never relaxed so long as the forces of aggression continue to demonstrate that they are merely waiting the appropriate time to turn their fury on the free world.

It is startling and unpleasant to have to comprehend these facts, but it is the terrible truth that the world today is, quite literally, sitting on a powder keg.

To spend billions annually on weapons and armies seems a horrible waste of our substance when only a fraction might be spent on projects and activities which would spell permanently a better living for us all. But America must be strong to survive. Some of the luxuries which we have come to take for granted must be sacrificed or postponed until that strength is attained and an era of peace reasonably assured.

We face a long period of personal and national sacrifice in which we all must and will share. The budget for our national Defense Establishment will be increased. Increased taxes—income, excise, and corporation—must be expected. But whatever the price of our freedom, it is small when compared with the alternatives. There is no bargain basement when it comes to buying liberty.

But while we necessarily appropriate more billions for defense we must bear in mind the perils of bankrupting our national economy. America is a tremendously wealthy country, but even we cannot continue to spend extravagantly for both swords and plowshares. We must cut down nonessential spending on the national scene, just as increased taxes and inflated prices force us as individuals to cut down our purchases of luxuries. We must make every possible effort to pare Government hand-outs, subsidies, and peacetime construction to the bone. There is a limit, which I believe has very nearly been reached, to the amount which the Government can extract from the individual taxpayer.

Yet we must attempt to pay as we go as much as possible. The only course of safety and sanity is to cut down on what might be called Government frills.

Our country cannot operate in the red year after year and continue to be solvent. Now that the international situation has become so menacing, it is even more vital that we do everything in our power to balance the budget. If this cannot be completely successful in view of our vast defense expenditures, we must, at least, do all that we can to achieve this goal.

Nothing would please our potential enemies more than to see our economy collapse in a state of national bankruptcy. It would save them the trouble and expense of trying to take us over by other means if we committed national suicide by overextending ourselves to the point of financial exhaustion.

In addition, if we come as close as is possible to balancing the budget by paring unnecessary expenditures, we lessen by that much the inflationary forces. As you housewives know all too well, inflation is no longer merely a threat, it has become the unwelcome guest in your marketing basket and at your dining-room table.

It is a basic economic fact that Government spending which is not balanced by the taxes it collects adds more and more fuel to the flames of inflation, since the Government, unlike business, does not produce wealth or goods when it spends money. It merely puts more money into circulation which in turn causes the prices of all goods to rise.

A dramatic illustration of the effects of governmental spending of more money than is collected can be seen in the price rise from 1933 to the present time. During this time the only years the budget was balanced was during the 2 years of the Eightieth Congress, 1947 and 1948. As a direct consequence, a basket of groceries which cost

$2.59 only 11 years ago in 1939, now costs $5.80—or more than double the amount. Similarly, up goes the cost of guns, tanks, planes, and ships which the Government buys.

Time and time again we have been warned by Kremlin spokesmen of the basic strategy of promoting our destruction by undermining our domestic economy. By this means, it is held, the eventual wreck of the Nation can be accomplished by our enemies just as surely and far more cheaply than by a successful war. By this means we could be made to ruin ourselves. Accordingly, for more than a decade, besides stealing our state secrets and fomenting internal dissension, the Communist effort has been concentrated upon forcing us into a calamitous national bankruptcy from which chaos must ensue.

At the same time there is another peril we must face. If, to finance our defense projects or for any other reason, we resort to the Government taking over private industry or usurping the traditional role of individual initiative in this land, we shall have lost the very freedom we are striving to maintain.

England chose this path in order to finance the cost of rebuilding her war-ravaged country, but without the hypodermics of aid from the United States, she would have been financially ruined. Furthermore, it turned out to be a case of stepping from the frying pan into the fire, since socialism is a false solution and does not represent a real or permanent cure for financial troubles.

If, for any reason, America is led or lured by false promises down this road, we shall have killed the goose that lays the golden eggs, since it is our economic system that has made us the wealthiest and most powerful Nation in the world and made possible the standard of living which, like freedom, we here in America have come to take for granted.

Time and again it has been demonstrated that our free economy has resulted in a higher standard of living and improved working conditions through the initiative and inventiveness of men who are able to reap the benefits of their industry and talent. On the other hand, socialism undermines the character of the citizen and destroys his incentive to better his condition or risk his capital in new ventures.

In a Socialist country, people have no incentive to improve the machine and tools with which they work, since they realize that they will not gain the rewards of their own skill. Anyone will work twice as hard if he is working to improve his own lot in life, and not merely working for the benefit of some vague economic theory or some government bureaucrat. It is only natural and proper that men should wish to improve their economic position in life and thus be able to buy a few luxuries and extras for their families.

People who have resigned themselves to living on government doles or handouts without any hope of improving their status except by government action have forfeited much of the joy of living, and also a vast amount of self respect.

Our country was founded on the desire of men to be independent and free to determine and influence their own futures without arbitrary rule by a Government bureaucrat, no matter whether titled or merely appointed. It was a love of adventure and a willingness to risk unknown dangers, possessed by our pioneering forefathers and inherited by their descendants, that has made our country great, and it is still the chief characteristic of Americans today, whether their ancestors came over on the Mayflower or immigrated last year.

So it is not that I fear that Americans would knowingly sell their birthright for a mess of Government pottage, but I do fear that in the press of defending ourselves from possible outside attack we may unwittingly be sold a bill of socialistic goods in the name of national interest.

At the same time, we must beware of placing undue emphasis on the materialistic aspect. We must devote an appropriate portion of our time and energies to building the spiritual side of our national life.

To combat the forces of communism in all their nefarious and menacing guises, it is necessary to understand thoroughly the nature of the evil we face. Communism has become a religion to its followers. They are fanatics, possessed of the zeal and unreasoning devotion which makes all fanatics dangerous. The early exponents and teachers of international communism understood that to be accepted and practiced, religion and faith in God must be supplanted by an equally intense and deep belief in the Communist state and the ultimate victory of international communism. Since it is the nature of man to worship a power greater than himself, the Communist credo substituted the state and the theory of communism. This was a necessity, since communism requires the complete subordination of the individual to the good of the masses, except that as it is presently practiced the masses are synonymous with the Kremlin masters, who are absolute dictators, ruling Russia and the satellite nations for one purpose and one purpose only, their own personal aggrandizement.

As the forces of lawlessness and atheism continue to dominate the lives of millions of people abroad, we must make certain that we do not neglect our privilege to worship at the church of our choice—that privilege for which our ancestors risked their lives and fortunes.

Confidence in the rightness of our cause and the certainty that right will triumph over the evil forces of totalitarianism and godlessness will lend strength to our convictions of ultimate victory. The realization that our entire civilization and culture are at stake will endow us with the courage to resist this terrible menace, without at the same time becoming panicky or losing our nerve. Free men and women, firm in their faith in their fundamental beliefs, will always be able to defend the most determined assaults upon that freedom.

Thus, with deep religious conviction and trust, we must spend our efforts unceasingly to spread the doctrine of the inherent worth of the individual and his right to live according to his own determination, sustained by our knowledge of the moral rightness of our cause and of the eternal justice of the God in whom we place our trust.

MacArthur's Dismissal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to consent granted, I include as part of these remarks, an editorial pertinent to the times which appeared in the Mount Vernon Daily Herald, of Mount Vernon, Wash., on April 12, 1951:

Not since the sudden death of Franklin D. Roosevelt 6 years ago today has our Nation been so profoundly shocked as it was early yesterday when President Truman, without preliminary warning or notice, deprived Gen. Douglas MacArthur of all commands in the Far East and told him he was free to travel anywhere he pleased as a five-star general of the United States Army.

Never was Mr. Truman's ineptitude or unfitness as the Nation's Chief Executive so clearly shown following a long chain of inexcusable temperamental actions and unpopular quick decisions. A White House press conference was called at 1 o'clock in the morning to flash the Commander in Chief's order around the world, and while Press Secretary Short read the announcement, President Truman went to bed. It is now certain that MacArthur had no advance information until the cablegram was handed to him in Tokyo. His entire staff was astounded. It is worth noting that Secretary of War, Frank Pace arrived in Tokyo some 24 hours previously direct from Washington and had conferred with General MacArthur with no hint of the bombshell about to be exploded.

Now, America does not treat its hero leaders in this fashion, particularly military heroes, of which MacArthur was and is acknowledged to be one. He was not a defeated and unpopular general, like Meade, whom Lincoln removed in the middle of the Civil War to make way for the aggressive Grant. MacArthur has been running a successful war in Korea, with his hands practically tied, as just reported by National Commander Cocke, of the American Legion, in a blistering criticism on the conduct of the war. Before Korea, MacArthur won undying fame in history for his defeat of the Japanese after one of the most brilliant campaigns in modern military history. It was MacArthur who made the peace with Japan and took over control by order of the United Nations. In 5 years he has brought peace, order, and reconstruction to that nation of 80,000,000. We have never heard it denied that he has done a truly remarkable job in Japan. He has spent most of his life in the Far East. It is said—and it is likely true—that he knows the oriental peoples better than any living American. The President in firing him so ungraciously gave him credit for being one of our ablest military leaders and commanders.

Why, then, an amazed and angry public, both Republicans and Democrats and people who are just good citizens without hidebound political ties, want to know was General MacArthur fired in such a humiliating manner at the very top of such a remarkable career of exemplary public service. The official reason given to him was that he was out of sympathy with his Government's policies and talked contrary to orders of his Commander in Chief—the President—contained in an order dated December 6 last that any and all public statements of Army and Navy officers concerning foreign policies must be cleared by the State Department, and therefore disobedient.

MacArthur has been complaining bitterly over having his hands tied by United Nations and being unable to bring the war to a conclusion while thousands of lives were being sacrificed. Undoubtedly he has expressed his views frankly. After all, he is a great general, in supreme far eastern command, successful guardian of the Japanese Empire, a top authority on the Orient, a great pillar in our Asiatic defense. It is pretty hard, if not impossible, to shut up a man of his caliber, carrying such a tremendous responsibility on the other side of the world. It is difficult to make him a mere Army robot taking orders off the board each morning. He was more than a military commander; he was a trained statesman, but denied by the Truman administration as such.

The bald truth is that some of the advice and recommendations of MacArthur have been finding deep roots of approval and stirring up powerful opposition to the policies of Truman and Acheson, who have been getting nowhere in the Korean War or in making peace with China or in holding the friendship of India, or winning Asiatic allies. General MacArthur should have been brought back here months ago to give his views to Congress and the American people instead of being gagged by a State Department under the thumb of United Nations. Both the British and the French have been trying to get rid of General MacArthur for sometime past. It looks as though the English were running our diplomacy, telling us what is best for us in both Europe and Asia, probably because we possess so little aptitude and ability ourselves. The French follow the English of course.

President Truman made a very simple, naive, 15-minute defense talk over the radio networks last night, bearing down on the idea that we were trying to keep the Korean War from growing into a third world war and intimating that General MacArthur was taking us into another global war and therefore had to be removed. Opinions on that score will differ widely. The argument has been going on now for almost a year while 60,000 Americans have been killed, wounded, or taken prisoners. Our United Nations allies have been furnishing only around 10 percent of the forces involved. United Nations isn't any nearer peace now than last June; in fact they may be nearer all-out war with China. We're still fumbling and drifting.

We wouldn't say that General MacArthur has all the right answers and, if left to himself, could bring peace in Asia. We can't see some things as he sees them. But we do assert with confidence that he is abler and better informed than our President, the State Department, and the entire Pentagon army staff and that his views deserve the highest respect and consideration. His loss as a far eastern adviser is a tragic one to the country. We are still wholly unwilling that United Nations should run our foreign affairs and dismiss our commanding generals and civil administrators abroad.

Technically, President Truman may be entirely within the law in firing MacArthur for military insubordination but he should have known better than to do what he did the way he did it. His action may have very immediate and serious world-wide effects involving the welfare and safety of the United States. Definitely, all politics aside, we believe the Truman administration has pulled a first-class boner in the MacArthur incident which the American people will neither forgive nor forget. General MacArthur will undoubtedly return to defend himself and his views, when the full measure of his standing among his fellow citizens will be apparent.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Appeasement, 1951 Style," published in the Altoona Tribune of Friday, April 13, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APPEASEMENT, 1951 STYLE

As the uproar continues over the President's dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur, two aspects of this important incident stand out above all others, and are worthy of serious consideration, uncolored by political bias of any sort.

First, it is sufficiently clear that the President could have averted this uproar by privately asking the general to retire. MacArthur has remarked on various occasions about retiring when his Japan job is done.

Such a move would have been the part of wisdom. It would have prevented showing to the world the demoralizing spectacle of a top military commander being relieved of duty, which spectacle always gives rise to reports of a weak and a divided leadership.

Moscow seized upon this incident at once to declare American leadership is confused. And, indeed, this seems adequate evidence of confusion.

It serves no purpose whatsoever publicly to break MacArthur in this fashion. It is dangerous to American policies in the Far East, for it means loss of face, loss of dignity, in the eyes of the Japanese people, who had the highest respect for MacArthur and, through him, of American leadership.

This ill-advised public dismissal may have dangerous repercussions in Japan, which we had planned to hold against Red encroachment, and which MacArthur so far has succeeded in doing.

Secondly, Mr. Truman, in his Wednesday night broadcast, put his dismissal of MacArthur on the basis of "peace." Certainly, there is room for controversy on this. Yet, it is important to look at Mr. Truman's explanation closely.

The closer one looks, the more it shapes up into appeasement. The mere fact that the President denied it is appeasement does not alter the fact that it suspiciously resembles it.

Mr. Truman appears content to let the UN forces fight the back and forth war that has been going on for so many months, with a toll of some 60,000 American casualties.

Both MacArthur and his successor, General Ridgway, have said there is no hope in sight for military settlement in Korea. And, both have said there is no political settlement in sight.

What then?

Mr. Truman does not answer that. He merely states his position, undoubtedly dictated by Secretary of State Acheson, and, probably, to Acheson from London, that we do not want the war to spread, to develop into general war, and he charges General MacArthur's demand for permission to use Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalist troops, and to bomb China, would invite general war.

Why? He doesn't say. The President doesn't explain that.

Every single move in this cold war has been on Russian initiative. Russia holds the initiative in Korea. She holds the initiative for making general war.

Regardless of anything Mr. Truman might say, Russia is in a position to precipitate general war in Korea just as readily as though we were to carry the war into China.

In fact, Russia's incentive lies in Korea, for there, she held control of the north portion, directly.

General MacArthur was in favor of making war on the enemy. That was his job. To do it effectively, he wanted UN permission to bomb enemy bases and supply lines in Manchuria.

Truman said no, that would invite general war.

What is this but appeasement?

Russia and Communists in general have hailed MacArthur's dismissal. What does that indicate but appeasement?

Certainly, we want no general war. We want peace as soon as possible. But, when did appeasement of the Reds bring peace? The more they are given, the more they demand.

To make a deal with the China Reds, as Britain, India, and some others of the UN want, would be a shameful thing, after all this blood letting in Korea.

Mr. Truman sent our troops into Korea. Mr. Truman refused to let the military wage war. He wants it on the police basis prescribed by Britain, which also wants full recognition of these vicious Reds whom we now battle on the fields and in the mountains of Korea.

The President started this Korean business. But, he can't find the means of ending it, and he refused to let MacArthur try.

That appears to be the substance of this situation. Talk of insubordination and disobedience of orders by MacArthur is just so much wind to blow away the bad smell of prejudice and ill judgment.

To Perpetuate Good Music

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT P. MORANO
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. MORANO. Mr. Speaker, because the editorial is typical of many being printed in newspapers and magazines, large and small, throughout the country, I am having printed in the RECORD the following from the Waterbury (Conn.) Republican concerning H. R. 2524, the bill which would exempt symphony orchestras and opera from the Federal admissions tax:

EXEMPT THE ORCHESTRAS

One particularly unjust tax is the 20-percent box-office levy that adds heavily to the deficits of nonprofit organizations like civic orchestras, dependent on help from their friends to start with.

Amusement is amusement, if you want to look at it that way; but it strikes us as both unfair and unsmart for the Federal Government to take exactly the same kind of cut from the gate receipts at a summer music festival as it takes when some promoter puts on an evening of women wrestlers.

This is why we think it would be wise of Congress to approve legislation introduced by Representative ALBERT MORANO, the Connecticut Representative who took Governor Lodge's place.

The Morano bill is a moderate measure. It doesn't go all the way in drawing the line between cultural and noncultural diversion. It does, however, make a distinction that ought to provide a starting point.

In Representative MORANO's proposed legislation the 20-percent amusement tax that now applies indiscriminately would be modified to exempt nonprofit orchestras—like the Waterbury Civic Orchestra, for instance.

This Waterbury orchestra has had hard going this year. Like all institutions of its kind it has felt the novelty impact of television. Audiences haven't been quite as large as they have been in former years. The civic orchestra, which has to expect each concert will cost from $1,200 to $1,700, has had bad luck with the weather this year, too.

When the Waterbury Civic Orchestra gives its final performance for the season on Sunday, it hopes, naturally, to have a full house. Even if it does, however, it can't hope to break even for the day's event. Musical organizations, like all of us, have felt the effect of higher living costs.

As Conductor Mario DiCecco will tell you, it costs the Waterbury orchestra about $2.50 for each $2 worth of box office receipts.

To help make up the deficit this orchestra, like the world's greatest, is dependent on the generosity of its friends.

But passage of the Morano bill would help a lot, as anyone can see. Of the $2.50 it costs for each $2 ticket, 40 cents is for the Federal amusement tax.

The orchestra's friends could help a great deal if they would write their Senators and their Congressmen urging passage of Representative MORANO's measure, H. R. 2524.

The American Constitution in a Modern World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRAZIER REAMS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. REAMS. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, April 16, the Ohio delegation of the House of Representatives had as their guests the winners of the essay contest held by the American Legion, Department of Ohio. One of these winners is Robert Butz, tenth grade, of Monclova High School, Monclova, Ohio, in the district which I have the honor to represent. Under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include in the RECORD the essay with which this fine young American won an award in the tenth-grade group. It is a lucid and eloquent expression, showing a clear understanding of the Constitution and the practices which will continue to make it the greatest instrument ever devised by man for the government of a free people.

The essay follows:

THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION IN A MODERN WORLD

(By Robert Butz, Monclova, Ohio)

Today, our civilization is complex, our problems are difficult, and the Government has greatly expanded its activities. Under these conditions a higher degree of intelligence is necessary for good citizenship, and a broad knowledge is necessary to have good leadership. More extensive study of the basic principles of our governmental system would give a clearer view of our Constitution.

The powers set forth by our Constitution consist of three main branches.

1. Good laws must be made to satisfy the common needs of the people. This is called the lawmaking or legislative department.

2. The laws must be made to work so that the people may benefit by them. The carrying out or enforcing of laws is called executive department.

3. So that the laws may be understood and the difference of opinion be settled we have the judicial department.

Government is a human product and is no better and no worse than the men and women who are responsible for it. The United States Constitution is the oldest Federal constitution in existence. It was so wisely planned that it has served as the basis for our Government without necessary change for almost a century and a half. Calvin Coolidge, as President, said, "To live under the American Constitution is the greatest political privilege that was ever accorded the human race."

Most other great nations of the world have passed through revolutions that have completely changed their system of government.

At the time of the writing of our Constitution, American life was simple, rural, and agricultural. The leaders of the Constitutional Convention believed that the immediate needs of the country at that time was a practical, strong and stable form of government. The members of the Convention debated many of the issues at great length. Some members took a jealous or selfish attitude and were severely scolded for their thoughtlessness of the country. That was indeed similar to the heated debates and committee reports that are evident in the sessions of Congress today. As a result of these sessions, we are advised as to the findings and we must abide by all decisions. We can understand how the finished Constitution contained a series of compromises, adopted to reconcile the different interests of the various classes and sections of the country. Our American history shows that by broad minded compromise a strong central authority and individual freedom of government that had been established for a new and weak nation more than a century ago is still satisfactory for a great and powerful civilization today. We readily see that by the power of amendment to our Constitution we can, if the need be great enough and due to the change in our life and interests, make our governing laws so that a great many people will show progress.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Gen. Douglas MacArthur Is Fired but 'Mink Coat' Brigade Marches On," which appeared in the Washington (Pa.) Observer.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GEN. DOUGLAS MACARTHUR IS FIRED, BUT "MINK COAT" BRIGADE MARCHES ON

Gen. Douglas MacArthur, one of the most brilliant soldiers and statesmen in the past nearly half century of American history, has been summarily stripped of all his commands in the Far East by President Truman.

The entire world was rocked by the action of the President, which is without precedent in the history of free nations.

President Truman stated that he felt General MacArthur is unable to give his wholehearted support to the policies shaped by the United States and the United Nations. He declared that military commanders must be governed by policies and directives of the Government and in time of crisis this consideration is particularly compelling.

It is quite true that General MacArthur has opposed the policies of the United States, which acts for the United Nations. In recent weeks General MacArthur has been insistent in his demands that something be done to end the aimless war in Korea in which American lives and resources are being squandered to no avail.

There is no record of General MacArthur having failed to perform his duty as commander of the troops of the United Nations and the United States in the Far East, even though he has opposed the general policy.

General MacArthur was discharged because he stated publicly he opposed these policies. He had continued to perform the duties assigned to him. He has never been in sympathy with the Far East policy favored by Secretary of State Dean Acheson and now Secretary of Defense George C. Marshall, acting for President Truman. Our methods in the Far East permitted the Communists to seize China.

Sumner Welles, closely associated with former President Franklin D. Roosevelt for about 10 years, in a recent article in the Saturday Evening Post captioned "What is the matter with our foreign policy?" asserted that Soviet Russia planned to gain domination of Asia and then wage full-scale aggression against Europe and the remainder of the free world.

General MacArthur has contended that Soviet Russia must be halted in Asia and that an all-out war must be conducted in Korea against the Chinese and North Korean Reds. He has advocated use of the troops of Gen. Chiang Kai-shek massed and trained on Formosa.

In his reference to the Far East, Sumner Welles, who attained the rank of Under Secretary of State under President Roosevelt, declared:

"During the years before 1939, I was repeatedly amazed that only a handful of the higher officials in Washington had ever read Hitler's Mein Kampf, although in that book, for all who cared to see, were set forth in fullest detail all Hitler's beliefs and all his intentions. It would be interesting to know how many of those chiefly responsible for our far-eastern policy since 1945 are familiar with the writings of Lenin or with the cardinal doctrines that he and Stalin had laid down with regard to the Far East. For these show that one of the basic tenets of Soviet communism has always been that once the billion and a half men and women in China, India, and Southeast Asia have been indoctrinated with communism and are linked to the people of Russia in the struggle to bring about the world triumph of the Communist ideology, the immense superiority in manpower of that alliance will insure the defeat of western capitalism. Certainly the American policy in the Far East between 1945 and 1950 has expedited rather than retarded the achievement of that aim."

General MacArthur, in his effort to bring a change of policy in the Far East, has insisted that the struggle in Korea is in reality a war to save Western Europe and America. Sumner Welles, one of former President Roosevelt's trusted aides, agrees with General MacArthur.

President Truman, Secretary Acheson, Secretary of Defense Marshall, and their advisers have maintained that it is far more important to stop the Communists in Europe than in Asia. They have sided with Great Britain and France in their handling of affairs in the Far East.

Meanwhile, the United States is furnishing the sinews of war in Korea manpower, munitions, warships, and warplanes.

Our men and resources are being dissipated in a conflict in which no real attempt is being made to defeat the Red hordes of China and North Korea.

It is understandable that President Truman has been annoyed by General MacArthur. But the general's chief offense is that he refused to remain silent. He felt impelled to present his views. It is understandable that General MacArthur who has spent most of his active years in the Far East felt that he, as a representative of the American people, should adopt the course he followed.

President Truman has created a new crisis in the conduct of our foreign policy. His action has been lauded in Europe but has spread dismay in Japan, only remaining contact of the west in the Far East, where the general is held in highest esteem.

It might be stated, too, that Japan is the only nation of the Far East in which the Communists have not been able to make gains.

The American people will have a chance to form their opinion for General MacArthur has stated that he is willing to return to America to continue his fight against policies he so strongly opposes.

The Truman-MacArthur controversy could prove to be the spark needed to arouse America and bring an end to the confused and aimless foreign policy of recent years. This policy has been marked by appeasement of the Reds.

General MacArthur opposes this policy of appeasement. He believes that it is weakening and undermining the strength and resources of the free world, especially the United States.

Removal of General MacArthur from the Far East is continuing a policy of appeasement and can only be pleasing to the Moscow schemers for General MacArthur in the Far East and Marshal Tito in Yugoslavia are the only leaders who have successfully thwarted them in their schemes and plans.

So General MacArthur, a man of integrity and recognized ability, is removed from the post he has filled so capably in the Far East but the mink-coat, deep-freeze, 5-percent, war-surplus, and influence brigades are still in command at Washington undermining our morals and wasting our heritage.

Freedom of the Press

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the fine address on freedom of the press, which was delivered at the Founders' Day banquet of Delta Tau Delta by Benjamin M. McKelway, editor of the great evening newspaper of the Nation's Capital, the Washington Star.

Mr. McKelway began his newspaper career as a Washington reporter 35 years ago. After working as a newspaperman in Washington and in Connecticut, he joined the staff of the Star in 1921, and was successively reporter, city editor, news editor, managing editor, and associate editor. He has been editor since 1946. He is one of the distinguished newspapermen of our time.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

(By Benjamin M. McKelway)

I hope there are no newspapermen present here this evening. I don't trust them. They misquote me. Well, they don't exactly misquote me, but this is the way it goes.

After I say my piece I look at the papers to see if they spelled my name right. And to see if they got my name up toward the top of the story, instead of down at the bottom, and if they put in that part about how the audience applauded, when I sat down.

But what do I find? I find a couple of sentences attributed to me in quotation marks. And I say to myself: "The Lord knows I couldn't have said anything like that. No man could be stupid enough to make a statement like that."

And then I begin thinking over what it was I said and I realize I did say something like they said I said in the paper. But why did they want to pick out that part of what I said? Why didn't they take that good part, down toward the end of the speech, where I said—Oh, well—you know what I mean.

But if I were you I would never make a speech when there are any newspapermen around. They are a dangerous bunch of people. Do you know what they would rather do than anything else? Do you know what gives them the greatest amount of purely malicious pleasure?

Well, I'll tell you. They like to puncture a stuffed shirt, and listen to wind whistling out of it.

And speaking of stuffed shirts, Brother Delts, you take a man who has been out of college for 36 years. You invite him to make a speech at a founders-day banquet of Delta Tau Delta. You butter him up a little, stick him up here at the head table, surrounded by people like a distinguished Justice of the Supreme Court and the other big shots up here, looking out over an audience composed of brother Delts who paid $6 apiece to come here. And what sort of wind comes out of this stuffed shirt?

Well, he is apt to reminisce, and tell you about how we used to run a fraternity. How people like Carl Butman, George Degnan, Rhesa Norris, and Tom Peyton—and I—but I am not going to do that, because if I start it somebody else will begin to reminisce and if there is anything that bores me it is reminiscence, except when I'm doing the reminiscing.

So, perhaps the best place to start is with a confession. For confession is good for the soul. And I confess that I've been a pretty sorry sort of Delt.

I haven't been to a chapter meeting for 36 years. I've forgotten the grip. I've forgotten the password. I've forgotten the secret parts I once was so anxious to learn. And I lost my pin, many years ago, under circumstances that I do not care to discuss here.

But I'll tell you some of the things I haven't forgotten. And I like to think they are more important than some of the things that I was told, as a youngster, that I must never forget.

One is the deep pride I felt when I was pledged and initiated into Delta Tau Delta. Nobody can ever take that away from me. Another is that indefinable sense of kinship I've always felt toward anybody who happens to be a Delt, the sort of kinship that binds people together who share something that no one else in the world can share in quite the same way.

And I have been extremely fortunate, as a father, in being able to experience that intimate satisfaction that came to me when three sons, going to two colleges, far apart, went Delt.

And I shall not forget how it felt, when they were in college, to visit them and to enter a chapter house, not merely as another dad, but as a Delt, and to find out that I was mistaken when I concluded that Gamma Eta Chapter in 1916 was composed of the finest group of youngsters ever assembled under one roof.

For I found that these other groups, assembled under other roofs, 25 years later, were even finer—and I think they get better with every generation of young Americans.

It is a great honor, which I feel deeply, to be here this evening as one of a group of Delt newspapermen who have been singled out for pleasant distinction of being mentioned at a Founders' Day banquet.

It is a great honor to be here with such fine newspapermen as my friends, here at the head table—Oliver Hoyem, Bob Estabrook, Rad Mobley, and Charley Gridley—as well as others who are in the audience.

And I find it hard to tell you how pleased I am that a younger Delt, Bill Murphy, back from the wars, is here with us. Everybody who knew his father, loved him, and if young Bill becomes even half as good a newspaperman as his father was, with his father's sense of honor, his gentleness, and his understanding of the responsibilities that newspaper work imposes—young Bill will have something to be proud of.

It makes me very proud of being a Delt and of being a newspaperman to know of how many good newspapermen are Delts.

And now that I have you here, I would like to tell you something of my idea about where that noble calling of free journalism, that we newspapermen try to serve, fits into the great struggle that is going on in the world today between two sharply antagonistic ideas of living and what we call freedom in living.

I believe that the nature of this debate over freedom in the world today is very well illustrated by the outlines of the debate over freedom of the press.

For the debate in the world over freedom of the press goes to the heart of the whole, larger debate over all individual freedoms. And if we understand something of this debate over freedom of the press, we may understand more of what lies behind the debate over all the other freedoms that you and I enjoy as American citizens—freedoms that have never yet been won, or, having been won have been snatched away, from over half of the people of this world.

One of the odd things about this debate over freedom of the press—and it is true, more or less, in the debate over other freedoms—is that there is really no clear conflict over the idea that a free press is wholly desirable in any form of society. Everybody champions the idea of a free press. Everybody defends it.

The argument, in fact, is not over freedom of the press. The argument lies in what we mean by freedom of the press; in other words, freedom from what?

The Constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Constitution of the United States both guarantee freedom of speech and freedom of the press.

The Russian Constitution, after setting forth such guaranties, injects a condition to the effect that this freedom depends upon, and here I quote the words, "conformity to the interests of the working people, and in order to strengthen the Socialist system. * * *"

Our guaranty of press freedom in the United States is contained in these simple words from the first amendment to our Constitution:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. * * *"

The essential difference, then, between the Russian Constitution's guaranty of freedom of the press and that which is contained in our own Constitution is that the Russian freedom of the press is contingent upon its use in behalf of the working people and the Socialist system.

In our own Constitution, this freedom is guaranteed without qualification. In Russia, freedom of the press means freedom from private control; in our country, it means freedom from Government control.

Thus, the Russian might argue as follows in defense of his brand of freedom of the press: "In Russia we have a free press. It is free to publish. It is free to use a printing plan. It is free to obtain paper and ink. It is free to use labor and skill of the men who produce it. It is free from private control. And it is free to print the news of what is going on, and to interpret the meaning of that news—provided, that what is printed serves the interest of the working people and is used to strengthen the society under which they live."

But here we interrupt this defender of the Russian brand of freedom. We ask, "Who decides whether what is printed happens to be in the interest of the people of Russia and the system under which they live?"

The answer is, "government." And who is government? The government is the rather small group of men and women who happen to control it, and who look on government as the master, rather than the servant, of the people who live under it.

The decision of what is fit to print in the interest of the people of Russia is left with the people in control of government. They may ban the publication of information they believe is not in the interest of the people.

They regard their press as an important instrument of government, as much a part of government as the army, the police, and the utilization of slave labor, for no dictatorship can survive unless the press is controlled by the dictator.

If the men in control of the Russian Government believe it is in the interest of a people to be told only one side of the story, only that side is told.

If they believe it is in the interests of the Russian people to receive a distorted version of how the people in other parts of the world conduct their affairs, that is the version they receive.

If they believe it is in the interests of the Russian people to be told nothing, then the people are told nothing.

Freedom of the press in Russia, then, means freedom from all control of the press—except the exclusive control exercised by government.

We correctly associate this government control of the press with totalitarianism. And because totalitarianism as we know it today is regarded by us now as something rather new, there is a disposition sometimes to regard the totalitarian idea of press freedom also as something new under the sun. And its apparent newness attracts a following.

As a matter of fact, that idea of government control of the press is about as old as the device of printing words on paper.

The really revolutionary idea of the free press is that which is written into our own Constitution—a press that is free of all government control.

This idea, relatively new in the world and still under trial, emerged from the struggles and the experience of men who lived under a government-controlled press.

They came to know and to feel its tyranny. The invention of the printing press placed a powerful instrument in the hands of government. And the government of a few centuries ago—whether church or state, or a combination of the two—recognized and used that instrument for their protection, just as current dictatorships use it today.

The power to license the printing press gave the government the power to control what was printed; therefore, the power to suppress new ideas. Men were imprisoned and sentenced to fearful forms of torture for the use of unlicensed presses which turned out material not approved by the sovereign. And there is little doubt that such control over what is printed has always been explained or defended by the government on the ground that control is necessary in the best interests of the people.

The great poet, John Milton, was one of the men who gave wings to words in proposing the revolutionary idea of a press free of government control. He was rebelling against government control of the press in a speech to Parliament some 300 years ago when he said:

"And though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so truth be in the field, we do injuriously by licensing and prohibiting to misdoubt her strength. Let her and falsehood grapple; who ever knew truth put to the worse, in a free and open encounter."

We believe in a free press in this country. But our idea of a free press is a press free from the control of government. We believe that our press serves the people. But we do not believe that any government should decide whether what is printed is or is not in the public interest. That decision should be left for the people themselves.

Our press is controlled. But it is controlled by men of every conceivable doctrine, in politics, in economics, and in religion. The man who runs a newspaper may be a conservative. Or he may be a radical. He may be one who opposes any change in our form of government and uses his newspaper to resist such change. Or he may believe that our form of government should be changed to something modeled on the Russian plan, and he uses his newspaper to advocate that change.

"He" who controls a newspaper may be a labor union or a religious sect or the owner of a copper mine or a chain of grocery stores. "He" whoever he may be, is the owner of one, or a combination of several, of the 1,850 daily and 9,661 weekly newspapers in the United States.

The result is that when these newspapers speak, they never speak as one voice, as do the newspapers of Russia or other countries where government controls the press. They speak in a multitude of voices, confusing, argumentative, clamorous. But from the babel there is apt to emerge the truth. And we leave to the people rather than to government the recognition of where the truth may lie.

That is the theory behind our freedom of the press. This freedom of the press is something that belongs to the people. It is their property. It is not the property of the owners of newspapers. We know that the idea of press freedom—freedom from Government control—was planted in a fertile soil and cultivated by men who valued freedom above everything else and had staked their lives, their fortunes, and their honor to win it.

It was an idea that was given a new legal basis by being written into the Constitution itself. That legal basis placed it beyond the reach of Government, in contrast to the constitutions of other governments which place conditions on press freedom and permits its curtailment in certain emergencies.

Our freedom of the press does not depend upon the views of the government in power, nor is it affected by some real or imaginary emergency.

The American press is free—with rare and narrow exceptions—to obtain and to print any news that it can secure of what is going on in Government or anywhere else. Its freedom of comment, even to the extent of ridiculing Government and its officials in the harshest of terms, is restricted legally only by the laws of libel, and these are rarely invoked.

This freedom of the press has been encouraged by what might be called a characteristically American attitude toward constituted authority. Americans do not like to be pushed around by Government and are inherently suspicious of any governmental action which suggests the prospect of being pushed around.

The men who wrote our Constitution, for example, were fearful the Government they were creating might, like the governments against which they had rebelled, use the crime of treason to punish citizens who did not agree with Government. So treason, a crime for which thousands of men have been imprisoned and executed in other lands—and for which they are being tried and executed today in the iron curtain countries—is so tightly defined by our Constitution that our Government is rarely able to prove it. The Federal Government has never executed a citizen for treason in the 160 years of its existence—years which included a civil war.

The American press has been able to identify its own interests with those of the public which it serves, and to a degree that is found in no other country of the world. Newspapers thrive on the exposure of wrong from which the people might suffer. They are often the first to challenge the exercise, by any official of government, of anything savoring of dictatorial powers.

American newspapers more often take up the cudgels for the underdog than for the top dog, on the theory that the function of the press, as Mr. Dooley defined it, is "to comfort the afflicted and to afflict the comfortable." For this approach means circulation. And advertising revenue, on which the papers depend for existence, follows circulation and approval by the people of the paper they read.

And so long as this press is free—free to print the news of what is going on, free to place before the people the questions that only the people are capable of deciding for themselves, free to point out what it regards as the shortcomings of government along with the things to be praised in government, free to compete for attention and respect in the market place of ideas—our freedoms are protected.

For we must always remember that freedom of the press is not an isolated freedom that stands by itself. Our various freedoms and rights—freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom of assembly, and of petition, the right of trial by jury—all of these are interdependent, and the destruction of one can bring down others with it.

It is only our people who can preserve these freedoms. And these people must be well informed on the news of the day; they must feel the responsibilities that go with citizenship in a free country; they must take part in their Government by voting; they must stand for good government by voting for good men. They must be bound together by some of those honorable ties that are singled out for mention in the creed of Delta Tau Delta—education, in order "to live and learn the truth," brotherhood, friendship, and a foundation that rests on conscience.

We are probably strong enough to protect ourselves from attack by other powers in the world today, although the threat is grave and always present. But we must be strong enough to protect our freedoms from the less easily recognized menace of those who promise new and glittering rewards, sometimes called rights, in exchange for those basic rights and freedoms that were won for us by men who had learned through bitter experience the dangers of an all-powerful government.

A great lover of freedom, a great defender of the common people, the late Justice Brandeis expressed that thought in words that I would like to leave with you as I close:

"Experience should teach us to be on our guard to protect liberty when the Government's purposes are beneficent. Men born to freedom are naturally alert to repel invasion of their liberty by evil-minded rulers. The greatest dangers to liberty lurk in insidious encroachment by men of zeal, well-meaning, but without understanding."

The War in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEVERETT SALTONSTALL

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, the leading editorial in the New York Times of today, Wednesday, April 18, entitled "The Initiative in Korea," which, as I see it, states the problem in that area in a very clear manner.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE INITIATIVE IN KOREA

The removal of General MacArthur from his far-eastern commands symbolizes a decision on at least one issue of world-wide significance. Insofar as the United Nations and the United States can control the course of events the Korean war will remain limited to Korea and will not be extended to Communist China. This decision is another demonstration that while the United Nations and the United States continue to resist aggression at the point where such aggression is taking place, they will do all that they can to preserve the larger framework of world peace and to avert a new world war. As such a demonstration, the decision can be welcomed and supported.

But this decision does not end the Korean war. It does not provide any basis for a peaceful settlement. On the contrary, the war continues with increased intensity, and the storm precipitated by General MacArthur's dismissal has served to obscure the vital fact that the United Nations forces have crossed the thirty-eighth parallel in force. This is a war which for the moment is being fought in a military and diplomatic vacuum.

Militarily it remains a war of maneuver as the best method of disturbing the enemy's preparation for a spring offensive, and as the only available alternative to an impossible positional war, which, in all expert military opinion, would lead to the destruction of the United Nations forces. In that respect the Korean war continues to resemble the Duke of Wellington's peninsular campaign against Napoleon in Spain. And its achievements are substantial. It has thrown back Communist aggression to beyond the point from which this aggression started. It has saved South Korea, which was the original purpose of the United Nations, even if it has been unable to achieve the larger United Nations objective of unifying all Korea in a free and democratic state. It has upset the Communist timetable of conquest. It has provided relief for other areas under Communist pressure—areas including not only Indochina and Malaya but also Europe. And it has provided a proving ground for western men and arms which has already led to a complete reorganization and reorientation of western strategy and tactics.

But for the present the Korean war must remain, as General Bradley pointed out yesterday, primarily a defensive war, which could result in a military stalemate. This fact, however, puts added responsibility on both the United Nations and on the statesmen of the Western World to take the initiative in seeking a political solution of the issues involved, and if such a solution is immediately unattainable to issue a new and unequivocal declaration of purposes, so that both the fighting forces at the front and the nations supporting them will know what they are fighting for. If the free world fails to do this, the initiative will inevitably be taken by the Communist world. The first attempt at this is already under way, as shown by the North Korean messages to the United Nations proposing, amid insolent diatribes against the United States, a conference of all the countries concerned in the Korean conflict, including Communist China and Soviet Russia, to establish peace on Communist terms.

These messages from the North Korean puppets or the Chinese puppets of the Kremlin have obviously been sent for propaganda purposes and need not be taken too seriously. But they are a token of what may be expected along the same line, and the new Communist peace offensive will not be discouraged by the indecision which continues to mark all United Nations activity with respect to Korea, or by the timid inquiries addressed to Peiping by India, based on the false proposition that the removal of General MacArthur has also removed the main obstacle to peace.

Having repudiated the soldier's solution of meeting force with maximum counterforce, it is the duty of the United Nations to speak out clearly and plainly, not only to define the aim of the war but also to abate the confusion which the dispute about General MacArthur has created. The effort must be to reunite the moral forces of the world as in the brave days of last June, when the Korean action got under way.

Televising Hearings of Congressional Committees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD three editorials from the pages of Broadcasting magazine, the first entitled "Faultless Reporter," from the issue of March 26; the second entitled "Puzzle: Find the Television Cameras," from the issue of April 2; and the third entitled "The Congress and TV," from the issue of April 16. These editorials deal with televising the hearings of congressional committees. I do not altogether agree with the conclusions reached in the editorials, but the arguments made in them are so well stated that I feel strongly they should be made available to the readers of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Broadcasting of March 26, 1951]

FAULTLESS REPORTER

To evaluate the true significance of television as a spectator at public hearings like those of the Kefauver committee, it is necessary to ignore much of the emotional debate that rages on that subject these days and to view the arrival of this incomparable instrument in proper historical perspective.

To a large extent the evolution of government from the monarchial authoritarianism of feudal times to the parliamentary democracy of today has depended upon the opening of government activity not only to public participation but also to public scrutiny.

The star chamber courts, whose dark secrecy protected the most unjust verdict, gave way to public trials and the jury system. Lawmaking was removed from the inaccessible throne room to the public meeting house of parliamentary bodies.

This evolution has been slow and at times painful (the U. S. Senate met behind closed doors until 1792 when forced by editorial pressure to admit the public), but it has been made inevitable by the very nature of democratic progress. True democracy requires that all branches of the government function in full view of the people.

In television, there is at hand an instrument that brings this evolutionary process to very nearly an ultimate stage of development. If one is to accept the theory that corruption and ineptitudes flourish in concealment and wither when exposed, one must also believe that television is the greatest enemy of governmental chicanery and bumbling yet invented.

In the debate that ranges these days as to the propriety of television's presence at public hearings like those of the Kefauver committee the question has been raised (surprisingly, by some thoughtful persons) as to whether a witness' rights to a fair trial are abrogated if he is required to perform before an audience larger than can be accommodated in the hearing chamber.

We submit that his rights are not impaired. Indeed they are protected to an extent undreamed of by the great jurists who conceived and advanced the principle of public trial. If 50 spectators in a court room enhance a defendant's chances of fair trial, how much greater insurance is provided by an audience of millions?

There is another argument that says television injures the dignity of proceedings, that its lights demean a hearing room to the level of a carnival, that participants are apt to adjust their behavior in recognition of the fact they are being observed and so neglect the essence of the case at hand in their concern for making a favorable impression on the audience. This argument is faulty too.

The lights to which objections have been raised are not necessary to television, but are put there by newsreel cameramen. In itself television provides no greater distraction to the sensible participant than the audience that is present in person.

The onus of propriety in the conduct of a televised hearing is on the examiner and the witness alike. Television has an absolutely impartial eye and ear. It does not edit or interpret. It simply sees and hears. It cannot turn a hearing into a carnival unless the hearing itself is so conducted. It cannot make a man a bum unless he is one.

At every stage of progress since feudal times there have been powerful men who for selfish purposes have endeavored to counteract reforms, to perpetuate the status quo essential to their own survival. There is no doubt that the introduction of television as a spectator at Government proceedings represents an important stage of this continuing evolution, and as a consequence it has its enemies.

Who are the enemies of television? They are those who cannot stand its merciless inspection.

Its friends are all those who believe the star chamber and the unquestioned king are obsolete and that the struggle toward democracy has been worth while.

PUZZLE: FIND THE TELEVISION CAMERAS

Take a close look at this picture.

It was made during a Washington session of the Kefauver committee. The picture was distributed by Acme Newspictures, which serves newspapers, so it could hardly be argued that the photographer was going out of his way to plan a shot that would be especially favorable to television.

Look at the picture.

There are five still cameramen crouched under the nose of the witness. They are waiting to explode flash bulbs in his face.

There are eight motion-picture cameras ranged against the wall. Notice the bright Kleig light at top, left of center. If somebody extinguished that light, the eight newsreel cameras couldn't make a picture that would be decipherable.

Over in the right top corner is one television camera. If that Kleig light that is so necessary to the newsreels were to go out, the operator of the TV camera would make a quick adjustment of its lenses and continue to transmit a picture of high quality. TV doesn't need that blinding light at all. It doesn't need illumination any brighter than that ordinarily provided in a public meeting room.

This picture does not show all the news coverage equipment that was in the room at the time. There were two other TV cameras, and there were also other newsreel cameras (and other newsreel lights) as well as other still cameras (fitted out with flash guns), including the one that made this shot.

It shows enough, however, to emphasize the foolishness of the hullabaloo being raised these days by critics who claim television defaces premises to which it is admitted.

We are publishing the picture because we think it goes a long way toward establishing just which of the news-coverage instruments causes the more distraction to a witness.

A lot of people are confused on this point. They associate television with strong lights and whirring cameras. The gamblers Kleinman and Rothkopf who refused to answer questions last Monday night were represented by an attorney who protested that TV cameras were grinding and that the bright TV lights were on. He also mentioned the presence of newsreel and still photographers, but the emphasis was on TV.

Newspaper reports of the Kefauver committee hearings for the past 2 weeks have repeatedly referred to television lights—so repeatedly indeed that bright lights and TV are by now fixed as inseparable in the minds of many.

To listen to the objections of bashful gamblers and their shrewd attorneys and to read the newspapers, it is easy to believe that there is so much TV equipment in a hearing chamber that there is scarcely room for anyone else. This picture tells a different story.

If contempt proceedings against the reluctant witnesses, Kleinman and Rothkopf, are prosecuted, the legal precedent establishing the rights of TV will unquestionably be set. These rights will also be influenced if the Senate agrees to proceed with a general investigation of the subject.

We suggest that this picture constitutes an excellent piece of documentary evidence in such proceedings. It shows that TV is not the medium that upsets the decorum of a hearing. Indeed, it is the least obtrusive instrument in the place.

[From Broadcasting of April 16, 1951]

THE CONGRESS AND TV

The roar of congressional and editorial comment aroused by the telecasts of the Kefauver committee hearings has, thank heavens, diminished.

We take advantage of what may be only a temporary calm to make a few comments of our own. Such considered opinions, carefully expressed, as were projected in recent weeks were, we fear, drowned out by the greater din of those who joined in an argument that was without articulation and pretty much without thought.

The general hubbub over the Kefauver telecasts did not add up to an enlightening record. So many people rushed to print or rostrum with a frantic contribution, lest the popularity of the question expire before their names and quotes were noticed, that the main issues were utterly deserted. A man anxious to get into an act as big as the Kefauver critical chorus is apt to cast about for a unique angle not theretofore covered by the others. This sort of thing, multiplied by a majority of all those in the act, does not guarantee coherent discussion.

Looking back over the main currents of the argument, one cannot avoid concluding that the debate did not rage over television at all. The thing that was really worrying most of the arguers—although they may not have recognized it themselves—was the conduct of Congress.

Judge Samuel S. Leibowitz, the noted New York jurist, told Yale law students that TV could become a "sinister weapon of slander * * * if safeguards are not set up to control its use."

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican, of Wisconsin, introduced a resolution calling for a senatorial study of the intricate problems raised by telecasts of congressional proceedings.

Walter Lippmann strayed from global conundrums long enough to recommend that telecasts of congressional hearings be prohibited until a policy on the subject can be defined.

What worried all three of these distinguished commentators was that somehow the dignity of congressional procedures and the rights of witnesses were jeopardized by television. That is rather fuzzy thinking, coming from such usually sensible minds.

Visualize a telecast session of a congressional committee at which an intemperate interrogator makes an accusatory and unanswerable statement against a witness. It is true that this would be an offense against the dignity of the proceedings and the witness' rights. But we wish to point out that television would only report the offense. It would not commit it.

Indeed, TV would report the incident more accurately than any other news instrument or agent in the room.

The newspaper reporter writes his version of the offense. His story is edited by a copy reader and may be further altered by an editor operating under a policy that either favors or opposes the parties involved. A headline is written, intended not only to summarize the story but also to do its bit in avoiding a decline in the newspaper's sales.

The chances for error, exaggeration, or distortion in the newspaper system of covering news are appalling and constiute an omnipresent problem for the conscientious newspaperman.

What similar chances are run by television? None.

Television is essentially an electronic transmission of a news event as it happens. The system is virtually incapable of error or distortion.

Now what Judge Leibowitz and Senator Wiley, and Mr. Lippmann are really talking about, it seems to us, is that they fear a danger in exposing congressional proceedings to public observation. That is to say, exposing them just as they happen, without editing, without interpretation or—more to the point—protection of any kind.

In one way or another all three of them have participated in, and certainly observed, many congressional sessions. It may be that because of their first-hand experience in these matters their fears are not without ground.

It is conceivable that the political fortunes of some Members of the Congress would not be enhanced if their behavior were projected, undisguised and unvarnished, directly to the citizens. Indeed it is quite possible that the regular and comprehensive telecasting of proceedings would exert a profound change in the personnel and deportment of the Congress.

Such a change would be forced because television, being totally unbiased, shows up a man exactly as he is, whether a phony, a bumbler, or a sensible statesman.

Since Messrs. Leibowitz, Wiley, and Lippmann are learned men and conspicuous champions of democratic government, it is difficult to understand how all of them have fallen into inconsistency in commenting on the subject of congressional television. If any one of them were individually refused admission to a public hearing of Congress or any of its committees, we are sure his protests would be heard from coast to coast.

How possibly, then, can they object to the admission of a larger audience? What the Congress can do in the presence of Messrs. Leibowitz, Wiley, and Lippmann it should not hide from the other citizens of the United States.

The question of television's place in the family of newsgathering media is destined to be argued in the courts and in the Congress. We fervently hope that its place will be defined for what it is—the most impeccable reporter ever to witness and report a news story—and that it will be given free access to all those occasions that the electorate is guaranteed a right to scrutinize under our parliamentary democracy.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "With Time Comes Reason," which appeared in the Charleston (W. Va.) Gazette of April 17, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WITH TIME COMES REASON

A week has elapsed and sober thinking is returning since President Truman released a bomb-burst over the head of General MacArthur.

It has been interesting to watch the gradual descent back to earth of sane Americans who in the heat of the moment popped off into an indignant emotional spree.

Highly significant has been the quieter tone lately adopted by antiadministration newspapers whose first reaction was a barrage of bombast, ballots, and abuse against the President and Commander in Chief of all the Armed Forces.

But with their reasoning returned they now are counseling the people, and the politicians, to restrain themselves, to think this thing through, and above all, not to crucify President Truman.

These pleas for reason are being made through the editorial columns of newspapers where blood pressures ran high and thinking was distorted at first encounter with the news.

While toning down their attacks on this score, however, they have not lifted their guns from Mr. Truman entirely and he still is the recipient of blame for all phases of Government action, even the target of those who seek political favor in city halls.

Frothing outcries of "impeachment" which arose from headline-conscious politicians also have faded to whispers. All the cries, of course, came from Mr. Truman's Republican foes who thought that here was the supreme chance to loosen the axe.

But after realizing what they charged could in no way be supported, and after hearing wiser counsel, they have preferred to forget what they first demanded so vociferously.

The newest charge is "appeasement" of Red China and Soviet Russia and that Mr. Truman has manufactured a new Munich. Mr. Truman is to blame solely, they scream.

It is inconceivable that President Truman, Secretary of State Acheson, General Marshall, and General Bradley would seek to appease any person or any nation for the benefit of communism. The American people know this. Yet when President Truman is charged solely it is inescapable that the same thing is leveled at Acheson and the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The case in point is that Mr. Truman, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the State Department, acting with the United Nations, had laid down a policy which General MacArthur was to follow. He disagreed and abrogated that policy, sincere in the belief that he was right and that Mr. Truman and his advisers were wrong.

It was then that Mr. Truman chose to exercise his civilian authority over all the Armed Forces and fired the general. The Constitution gives him that authority.

After General MacArthur concludes his triumphal return, one which we think he richly deserves, it is certainly within his rights to tell Congress and the American people what he believes and what he has so strongly advocated. The President was among the first to acknowledge that this is right.

We believe that General MacArthur will say plenty, so much in fact that many prominent Republicans who have geared themselves for a try for the Presidency in 1952 will find their own chances in jeopardy.

Then we will see the usual carping and backfilling of those who have whipped up a bandwagon of steam for a great American soldier-statesman. His present adulators, we predict, will be the first to desert him if they find their personal ambitions are about to be thwarted.

Only events ahead in these historic months will prove or disprove President Truman's stanch adherence to the course that has been set in world affairs, a course that General MacArthur could not follow.

But we believe that, whatever the outcome, history will record that President Truman acted with tremendous courage in firing General MacArthur and that whatever the opinion of him held by the people he rose a great step in personal stature.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. JENNER
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD on article under the headline "Under the Navy's procedures," disclosing information with reference to the case of Stephen Brunauer and the inquiry into his loyalty. The article appeared in the Wisconsin State Journal on April 16, 1951.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNDER THE NAVY'S PROCEDURES

Just for the record:

One year ago Senator MCCARTHY read off the names of Stephan Brunauer, explosives researcher for the United States Navy, and his wife, Esther, in connection with his charges of subversive influences in Government.

For which Senator MCCARTHY was promptly and thenceforward called 17 kinds of a nasty name.

On Tuesday, the United States State Department announced the suspension of Stephan Brunauer "under Navy Department loyalty and security procedures." Esther also was suspended from her post on the Navy's United Nations relations staff pending further action on her husband.

Ex-Senator Tydings' further comment is respectfully solicited.

Home Rule for Alaska

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH BUTLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, a few weeks ago I had inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a collection of editorials from Alaska newspapers endorsing my proposal that Alaska be given at this time the right to elect its own governor, rather than statehood. Through some oversight one of the editorials I intended to insert, from the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner, of Fairbanks, Alaska, did not appear with the others. I therefore now ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial on this point entitled "First Things First."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FIRST THINGS FIRST

The stage is set in Washington for the introduction into the Eighty-second Congress of legislation to grant Alaskans the right to elect their own governor.

This is a right already enjoyed by all other Americans and by the people of Puerto Rico—it is a right that has been long in coming to Alaskans and one which is needed now as never before.

Never in her 83 years under the American flag has Alaska so required the wise and understanding leadership of a governor whose primary interest is exercising the will of Alaskans in the administration of Territorial affairs. In the years ahead the Territory will be faced with difficult decisions and knotty problems, and the solution of these problems come only through the expressed will of the people if Alaskans are to take their rightful place as full-fledged members of the American Republic.

It is unthinkable that the Territory and its people should be deemed incapable of producing and electing their own chief executive, thereby making a first and wholly logical step toward mastery of their own governmental affairs.

No valid arguments have yet been presented by opponents of this move, but a number of flimsy smoke screens have been set up to becloud the issue.

Principal opponent of legislation providing for the election of the Governor of Alaska is, strangely enough, a man who is himself elected by the people.

Delegate E. L. BARTLETT has refused to endorse or lend his support to the proposed legislation, taking the stand that he will settle for nothing short of statehood. BARTLETT's affection for federally appointed Ernest Gruening has long been known, but it has never been suspected that this friendship runs so deep as to blind BARTLETT to the desires of the people he represents.

Ernest Gruening would naturally find a gubernatorial election extremely distasteful, and he can be counted upon to exercise all of the power and influence of his political machine to defeat the bill which would bring to an end his Juneau gravy train. Gruening is no doubt very aware of the fact that if his name ever appeared on a ballot he would be laughed out of the Territory by the citizens over whom he has ridden roughshod during his tenure of federally appointed office.

BARTLETT's action in refusing to support legislation permitting Alaskans the right to rid themselves once and for all of this man is totally unexplainable even to those who voted him into the office of Delegate.

His sole defense for his action is based on his statement:

"I regret that I cannot agree with you that Alaska is only entitled to an elective Governor. * * * I stand for an elective Governor plus many other things. Some of those changes would be far, far more important than the privilege of electing our own Governor."

In other words, having placed the cart before the horse by urging statehood before we have proven we can govern ourselves, BARTLETT refused to permit the horse to be returned to its rightful place. Like a petulant child tutored only to sing one tune, he cries: "I want statehood immediately or nothing at all."

The plain fact of the matter is that the bill to elect our governor would in no way hinder or retard the Senate action on statehood. Even the most ardent proponents of statehood now agree that there would be a lapse of years between the time the enabling bill is passed by Congress and the time actual statehood is achieved.

This lapse would be due to the necessity of electing delegates to a constitutional convention who would draft a State constitution, after which this constitution would have to be approved or amended by the Congress of the United States.

Alaskans agree that the major need for statehood lies in the desire of the Territory to be freed from the bureaucratic system of Federal controls by which Alaskan development is now hamstrung. And in the drafting of both the Statehood Enabling Act and the State constitution special care must be given to see that this primary aim is accomplished, for without a complete divorcement from present Federal controls statehood would be an empty achievement indeed.

In view of this, does it not seem illogical that the drafting of the Statehood Enabling Act and of the State constitution should be carried out under the direction and supervision of a Federally appointed governor? Where is the guaranty or safeguard against perpetuation of the Federal bureaucracy?

Does it not seem more logical and more in the best interests of the Territory that this work be completed under a man elected by the citizens of Alaska—a man who Alaskans know will carry out their expressed desires and wishes?

Alaskans should now—this year—begin laying the solid groundwork of self-government that will lead to statehood by proving themselves capable of maintaining their own house in good order. They must not be misled by job-conscious politicians who attempt to confuse the issue so as to remain securely in office.

The first move in achieving self-government is to urge Congress to pass immediately the bill granting us the right to elect an Alaskan governor.

Senator McCarthy and Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. JENNER
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "'Jumping Joe' in Action," published in the Spring Valley (Wis.) Sun of April 12, 1951.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"JUMPING JOE" IN ACTION

Saturday night in the Fort Atkinson city auditorium, Senator JOE MCCARTHY spoke to an audience of 700 skeptics. We were among them.

Attending the Wisconsin Press Association in convention at Milwaukee Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, we had been assured by our friends of the Milwaukee Journal that MCCARTHY would deliver a speech of mild generalities in Fort Atkinson.

"On the Fort Atkinson platform he won't have the protection of his senatorial privilege," they told us. "He won't dare name names."

But the Irishman from Green Bay did name names. He branded as Communists three men currently serving in the State Department, one holding a vital executive post in United Nations.

To our satisfaction, at least, JOE MCCARTHY answered the most frequent of the criticisms directed against him: That he wouldn't say as an unprotected citizen what he says as a protected Senator.

If JOE MCCARTHY dealt in falsehoods Saturday night, he uttered slander against at least five citizens, who can sue him for all he possesses and imprison him for criminal slander.

But he won't be sued, he won't be forced to pay damages, he won't be imprisoned.

Our friends at the Milwaukee Journal and the Madison Cap-Times won't tell you why JOE MCCARTHY won't be sued, but we can tell you. He won't be sued because Saturday night JOE MCCARTHY was exposing a sad situation which exists in high governmental circles, especially in our State Department.

The Milwaukee Journal has a circulation approximately a third of a million. The Sun has a circulation of 2,000. Logically, the Journal should be at least 150 times smarter than we are, and they probably are. But unfortunately the toilers in the editorial vineyards of the mighty Journal and Cap-Times suffer from the same human frailties as us lesser mortals. They love to hear the sound of their own wind whistling past their noses, and they love to choose up sides. To the Journal and the Cap-Times anti-McCarthyism is a fascinating game, pleasing to their ego and pleasing to their circulation departments.

That we can understand. But Saturday night two images kept getting in the way of our understanding of the Journal and Cap-Times motives.

There was the day Dr. E. H. Fast, Spring Valley Legion commander, came into the Sun office to tell us that his brother had been slain in Korea. There was the day more recently when Mom Woodmansee came in to tell us that Jimmy had been killed on the same front.

To Dr. Fast and Mom Woodmansee, McCarthyism and anti-McCarthyism is no game. If it is a game, it's a game in which the chips are all red with American blood.

We supported Bob LaFollette against JOE MCCARTHY. We fought JOE MCCARTHY with all the ammunition we had. But this is no moment for political buffoonery. This is the moment to ask ourselves: Would Dr. Fast's brother and Mom Woodmansee's son have had a better chance to be alive today if the situation JOE MCCARTHY describes didn't exist?

If you forget politics and the sometimes silly political games we mortals play, the answer can scarcely be anything but "Yes."

In the waters bordering Formosa our Seventh Fleet is engaged in the task of keeping the 700,000 soldiers of Chiang from attacking the Communists on the mainland, so that the Communists on the mainland may freely attack and kill Americans on Korea.

What do the Journal and the Cap-Times say about this? That there is grave danger that the hungry hordes of Chiang would desert and move over to the Communist ranks once they were turned loose.

Yet in the same issue of the Journal in which this plausible explanation is advanced, we read that American citizens have been sentenced to death and long imprisonment for revealing atom-bomb secrets. If the situation were reversed, if Chiang were seeking aid from us, he could reasonably reject it with equal logic by the evidence of the Journal's own headlines.

The favorite device of dictatorships has been the splitting of their opposition by planting the seeds of distrust. These seeds have fallen upon fertile grounds in our State Department and in the editorial rooms of the Journal and the Cap-Times.

When JOE MCCARTHY had finished Saturday night, there were few skeptics in the jammed auditorium. We were in a position to witness perhaps 400 of the 700 in the audience. Only two remained seated. The rest rose as one person, clapping and cheering. Among them were four able Fort Atkinson industrialists, two competent Fort Atkinson labor leaders, a half dozen loyal Democrats. When the Journal calls these men spineless hacks, the Journal engages in senseless name calling as regrettable as the angry impulse which prompted Senator MCCARTHY to refer to the Journal and the Cap-Times as the "Wisconsin editions of the Daily Worker."

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement entitled "Americans All," by Dr.

Daniel A. Poling, on the subject of General MacArthur's dismissal.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICANS ALL

(By Daniel A. Poling)

GENERAL MAC ARTHUR'S DISMISSAL

Even if the basic arguments for General MacArthur's dismissal are granted—arguments which center in divided authority and the primacy of Washington—this other basic fact stands clear. MacArthur was a civil administrator as well as military. He was the shaper of the democratic destiny of Japan. Almost immediately he would have been at the peace table. His repudiation now brings dismay to all anti-Communist forces in the Far East. It was without discrimination between his two responsibilities. The President not only fired the general, he removed the statesman.

There was a better way than this—infinitely better. Also those responsible were given ample time to discover it. But now we know that it was too much to expect that the State Department would find that way.

The editions carrying the announced forced retirement of Douglas MacArthur also printed on their front pages the news that Britian's Government had formally asked that Red China be invited to sit in on the Japanese peace conference, that the proposed peace terms be submitted to Peiping in advance, and that negotiations proceed looking to the return of Formosa to China. (Britain recognizes Red China.) To all of this the American people will not consent—make no mistake about that. Only the complete reversal of our far-eastern policy can now atone for a moral debacle that could very quickly become an irretrievable political and military disaster.

At this writing the administration's decision makes Nehru of India glad; also the British Labor Government; also the Hongkong vilifiers of the great general; and Owen Lattimore, with all other supporters of the "agrarian revolution"; and, of course, the Far Eastern Affairs Division of the State Department. Finally, this dismissal confirms and justifies the strategy of Moscow and Red China.

Throughout the postwar period Douglas MacArthur, of all administrators in occupied areas, has had the clearest vision in dealing with Communist Russia. Also he has been the most implacable though courteous foe of Red Moscow's advance toward world revolution. In two recent visits to the Far East, both of which took me to Japan, Korea, the Philippines, and China, and on the second of which I visited Formosa, I found MacArthur to be communism's No. 1 hate. Now they are free of that—or are they?

It is our good fortune that so competent a general as Matthew Ridgway succeeds to the command in Korea. What he has been handed in Tokyo is quite unfair to him. In Tokyo and at the peace table, as well as for the continuing administration of Japan's new democracy, the wisdom and genius of MacArthur were the first imperative.

Now let the people call General MacArthur home—call him home to make his report to Congress, to give his full story so long suppressed. Let the wild talk of impeachment be dismissed as wild. But there should be a complete investigation of the State Department's far eastern policy and program—an investigation reaching back to the infamous white paper and behind it, and finding answers to the questions: Why the "cease-fire"? Why the determined effort to impose a coalition government upon Chiang? Why the 2 years' of delay in releasing General Wedemeyer's report and the continued refusal to release the Korean section of that report? I believe that inevitably this investigation would expose the fallacy of the arguments advanced to justify rejecting Chiang's offer of troops for Korea. The Korean war is not an all-out world war, but it is a major war for us—count the casualties.

In the President's radio address following MacArthur's dismissal, he offered no alternatives to the General's recommendations. And when our United Nations allies acclaim the dismissal as strengthening the hope for a negotiated peace, always the terms they suggest or imply, involve paying blackmail to Red China.

Douglas MacArthur states and believes that he has followed his directives, been punctilious in keeping his place, and that he has violated no military amenities. Conscious of his dual relationship, for which he was not responsible, he has made an utmost endeavor to be at once a good soldier and a wise administrator of civilian affairs.

It was not without significance that while every Secretary of State since 1945, when the General was given supreme command in the Far East, has made repeated trips to Europe, not one—Byrnes, Marshall, nor Acheson—went to see him. They went to London and Paris, Moscow and Berlin, but they never went to Tokyo. Their failure to travel west was something more than a vote of confidence in MacArthur. This State Department indifference, this lack of knowledge, this failure to include the General and those associated with his convictions in the shaping of high policy, have contributed to a program is Asia almost completely the opposite of the program in Europe.

In the Far East freedom and democracy go forward as with hands manacled and hopping on one leg. But we have faith to believe that they go forward.

As for Douglas MacArthur, again he has fought to win a war as quickly as possible, saving as many lives as possible, and he has not fought in vain. Perhaps he has just begun to fight.

It was pointed out that MacArthur couldn't be spared from his duties long enough to permit him to go all the way to Washington. Thus it was that President Truman journeyed to Wake Island, met and conferred with MacArthur there. They parted after their conference with the general going back to Tokyo and President Truman returning to Washington.

After that conference President Truman was at pains to express confidence in General MacArthur and his conduct of the Korean war. But it seems clear now that the conference was an attempt to get MacArthur to play ball with United Nations policies instead of trying to direct things himself. Nobody wanted to embarrass the great MacArthur. But we know now that the general was determined to sing the prima donna role. He refused to sing in the chorus as he was ordered.

All along MacArthur has been mollified and coddled because he was temperamental and prone to spectacular actions and startling pronouncements. Some of his acts and statements smacked so much of melodrama that we couldn't help feel that there was a stage manager in the wings. Most likely it was MacArthur himself who pulled the strings to keep the name of the general in the headlines.

No, there most certainly has been no persecution of a great man. Instead there was remarkable patience with a man who became particularly obstreperous whenever a reporter took out his pencil or when the photographers' flash bulbs began to pop.

The idea of permitting a discharged military man to appear before Congress to tell his side of the story is absurd. If you fail to obey orders in your job, you will get fired, too. Will you then clamor for a public meeting at the courthouse to tell the public why you think your boss was wrong?

General MacArthur finally overreached himself in his prima donna pose. He had been petted and pampered so long that he thought it would always be so. But President Truman's patience must have worn extremely thin long before he took action. It was necessary to put an end to pampering and that's what Truman did.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Patience Worn Thin," which appeared in the Fairmont (W. Va.) Times of April 13, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PATIENCE WORN THIN

Just how far is the President of the United States supposed to go to preen the fine plumage or polish the brass of temperamental military genius?

Now that General MacArthur has been dismissed for what amounts to insubordination, there is such a hue and cry from Republican MacArthur worshipers that you'd think a saint had been insulted.

Don't you remember when the President felt it was necessary to sit down and talk with MacArthur? Did President Truman order him to Washington for a conference? Of course not. Instead, President Truman bent over backward to make it look good for MacArthur. The President agreed to meet MacArthur on a Pacific island.

Proposed Assistance for Israel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very fine speech on the subject of aid to Israel, delivered by our colleague, the distinguished Junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] before the members of the Temple Beth Israel at West Hartford, Conn., on Monday, April 16.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Among the many engagements I have made in a crowded schedule for this one week in Connecticut, I take particular pleasure in this meeting with you. One reason is that it gives me a welcome opportunity to pay simple tribute to one of your members. I have come to know and respect him for his service in Congress, his integrity, his insight on public questions. Certainly it is one of the happier phases of my service in the Senate to be associated with a man of his capacity. I refer, of course, to your distinguished member, and one of the most distinguished Members of the House of Representatives, ABE RIBICOFF.

Further, I was very glad this evening to talk to you briefly about some aspects of our foreign policy, particularly in relation to the grant-in-aid for the State of Israel which I have joined in sponsoring in the Congress. This project, within the area of our foreign policy, is especially related to my own past experience and my present interest in nonmilitary programs in aid of our foreign policy objectives. In the early 1940's when I served as consultant to Mr. Nelson Rockefeller in the Office of Inter-American Affairs, his brilliant leadership worked out a pattern of economic and technical assistance which was the forerunner—the grandfather as it were—of the present Point Four program. Later, in my capacity as Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs in the two years immediately following the close of World War II, I worked at close range with those other non-military aspects of foreign policy, diplomacy, and economic and foreign information policies in all their varied forms.

In setting up this distinction between military and non-military aspects of foreign policy, we must be on guard against the distortions and unjustified criticisms of these nonmilitary programs by some of their opponents in Congress, and by some of our critics abroad—on either side of the iron curtain. In no circumstances do I assert, nor have we built these programs on the assumption, that polemics about the American way will stop military force. Further, let us beware of the fallacy at the other extreme—that the need for military force in appropriate instances shows that nonmilitary programs are a waste of the taxpayer's money.

Once aggression has taken the form of military force, it can only be repelled with effective forces of defense. That is the meaning of UN action in Korea. Further, where military force is ominously threatened, we must employ military assistance to forestall its use. That is the meaning of our Greek-Turkish program, and of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization which we are now implementing.

On the other hand, it is ultimate suicide to place our faith in those who want us to rely on military assistance alone. We must help our friends throughout the world to build economic sinews, for defense against military aggression as well as against economic and political subversion. We must take the lead in helping to develop and improve the economic life in those many areas of the world where economic or political backwardness provide the prime breeding places of communism. Here we have the prime points of weakness in the free world around the Soviet perimeter. As Nelson Rockefeller reported recently in his brilliant report, "To do nothing is to invite despair; to act is to hope." The gains of ECA in rolling back communism in Europe show that this hope is tangible and realizable.

In the area of information policy, no informed observer will question the urgency of the great campaign of truth I have long advocated—to combat the falsehoods of Communist propaganda about the motives behind our economic assistance, our diplomacy, and our military aid. But beyond that wholly defensive effort, we must fortify the spirit and the will to resist. Without this spirit, weapons would be useless. What good is a machine gun in the hands of a man who doesn't want to pull the trigger? Further, we must marshal the great leadership and influence of America in the modern world, in advancing the goals of human rights and free institutions, wherever and whenever we can. A brilliant plan along these lines is the McMahon-Ribicoff resolution of which I am proud to be a sponsor, to get the truth to the Russian people themselves.

All of these objectives and goals and programs are included in this vitally important area which I am calling the non-military aspect of foreign policy.

All these major objectives in American foreign policy would be substantially advanced by enactment of the legislation authorizing a grant-in-aid of one hundred fifty million dollars for the State of Israel. This legislation is in response to the request which has formally been submitted to the State Department by the government of that country. Senators MCMAHON, DOUGLAS, and TAFT, and many other Senators of both parties, about thirty-five in all, have joined in sponsorship of this important measure. In the House of Representatives, sponsorship has been equally widespread and nonpartisan.

This bill in my judgment is in line with the long-standing policy of the United States, and especially of the Truman Administration, to help establish a Jewish commonwealth in Palestine, or rather, to help re-establish on this sacred soil the commonwealth which flourished there in ancient times and for which the Jewish people throughout the ages have never ceased to aspire, to work, to pray, and to die. All of us here tonight can take great pride in the fact that the United States exerted strong leadership in the United Nations to give legal as well as moral sanction to the State of Israel.

My good friend, Lester Markel, Sunday editor of the New York Times, has summed up our profound interest in the new State in these terms:

"There are not one but three Israels—the land of the past, the land of the present, and the land of the future—and to the free world—the story of Israel is a vital and intimate part of the story of mankind."

The Prime Minister of Israel, David Ben-Gurion, has spoken of its future in terms which are indeed prophetic:

"I do not think of Jews as being the chosen people. But we have a dream—to build a civilization in (Israel) knowing that this country occupies a special place in world history, which will be free of the evils of our time. It must be a civilization based on the teachings of our prophets and on the strength of modern science. When I say prophets, I mean the ethics of their teachings; when I say science, I mean the material means to make this country a model for the entire Middle East."

These high goals should have a special reality and vividness for all the people of the United States because in many significant ways the birth and development of this small country of Israel so closely resemble our own. Its people are now moved by the same pioneer spirit as we were. It is the scene of a great migration movement which reminds us to the influx into the United States within the last century. It was born in a revolutionary war which recalls our own. Indeed, history may someday record that the emancipation of Israel's people meant as much for the independence and liberation of the Middle East as 1776 meant to this Hemisphere. Yes, this little country of Israel fashions its daily life and its institutions in the image of western democracy. It respects human personality. It defends the right of its people to be free. It encourages private initiative—Fortune magazine has praised Israel's foreign investment law as a model for other countries. While it vigilantly guards the freedoms of its citizens, it mobilizes its economy to raise the living standards of all.

Here is a laboratory for the democratic way of life in the Near East. Here is a pilot plant in an area of the world potentially as sensitive and dangerous as any other anywhere. Here is Israel, within the framework of democratic institutions—businessmen and workers, industry and labor, working together in devotion to the common welfare. Here, as in America, is demonstration to the world that a democratic system which fosters free enterprise and simultaneously stimulates cooperative effort can make tremendous strides for the welfare of all.

The great migration movement is at once the most remarkable feature of the new state and the source of its present economic embarrassment. Those who worked for the creation of the state of Israel—and there are many among you who took the lead—told the free people of the world, they told the Congress, they told the United Nations, they told the people of the United States—that the state if established would provide a sanctuary for all who wanted to go there—that the doors would not only be thrown open but that they would stay open. Now I do not think that many of you ever anticipated that in less than three years the DP camps of Europe would be emptied of all Jews; that Israel's population would be increased by almost six hundred thousand men, women, and children—a seventy-five percent increase in three years. Such a voluntary mass influx has no parallel in recorded history. The United States never in any single year increased its population by more than three percent. By the end of 1954 the State of Israel will have increased its population by two hundred percent. The anticipated increase within the next three years alone would be equivalent to an immigration of seventy million people to the United States. This immigration has been called not a melting pot, but a pressure cooker.

This movement is further remarkable for a great and unique reason; the criterion of admission has not been the welfare of the existing community, but rather the overriding necessity of those who entered. Moreover, the ever deepening crisis in international affairs serves to increase the scale and urgency of this immigration.

I need not tell you here tonight about the significance of this human tide. Too many of you have been closer to the problem than I have. But let me mention the aspects which have impressed me most strongly. This is the emphasis on the welfare of children. Special programs for the movement of orphaned children have been developed with the utmost care and love and effectiveness. They are now pouring into the country at the rate of about one thousand a month, and they come, mind you, from sixty-two different countries, with all the problems and the needs that that single fact implies. As the parents of three orphan children—three of Mrs. Benton's and my children are adopted children—you will understand the strong emotional appeal which this great program has for us.

Receiving and expanding and aiding this great human stream is a remarkable economy geared to long-range economic goals as well as to the urgent problems of immediate rapid growth. Among the many achievements are the growth of thousands of small manufacturers and other independent businesses, in a great variety of fields looking to the self-sufficiency of the country in the not-too-distant future. In a single issue of a monthly publication of the Jewish Agency for Palestine which crosses my desk, entitled "Economic Horizons," I have read in concrete terms the story of new rubber tire factories, of chemical plants, of nonferrous industries, of manufacturers of shoes and clothing, of hotels, shipping, dairy cattle, handicrafts, of new pipelines and agricultural settlements, of new forests and new fisheries. American capital has been the major stimulation of these new and vital horizons in free enterprise in the Middle East—the General

Tire & Rubber Co., the Ford Motor Co., Kaiser-Frazer, and many others. Think a moment of this amazing fact: Investment in new enterprises in Israel was equivalent to more than twenty-five percent of the national income in 1949 and more than thirty percent of the national income in 1950.

The population of Israel itself has tightened its belt to a degree not known in our country—or in Great Britain even in wartime. The United Jewish Appeal has contributed astonishingly more than a total of more than two hundred thirty million dollars from individual Americans between 1948 and 1950. The United States has granted loans through the Export-Import Bank, at interest, to help finance this great capital expansion upon which the future of Israel depends. Yet the need for hard currency continues at high and emergency levels. In order to bridge the gap until the expanded economy of the country can come into balance with the consumer needs of this growing population, Israel will continue to require great economic help from the outside. Otherwise, it cannot maintain its economic gains and fulfill our hopes. The grant which is provided by the legislation now pending in Congress will greatly help in bridging this dollar gap.

Since World War II the United States Government has helped to restore many countries impoverished by the conflict. Its program of assistance has been threefold. It began with direct relief to people in need (UNRRA). Secondly, we went on to stabilize their economies and thus strengthen the democratic institutions of their governments. Finally, we are now assisting them to erect their military defenses.

This three-prong policy has braced the free world. Nations menaced by subversion have been enabled to maintain their freedom. Nations threatened by aggression have been encouraged to buttress their defense and to affirm their determination to resist attack. New vitality has been given to the great concepts of liberty and human rights.

President Truman's chief messages to Congress this year have stressed the importance of continuing now our foreign-aid programs. Military aid predominates in Europe, economic aid in the Near and Far East. President Truman has put it well: "Economic stagnation is the advance guard of Soviet conquest—economic development is the spearhead of freedom." By far the greater part of our foreign aid in recent years has been in the form of grants; in 1950, grants represented ninety-two percent of the total, to countries all around the world. The presently proposed legislation will include Israel.

The Point Four assistance which Israel has thus far received—in the amount of only one hundred thousand dollars—has been devoted entirely to technical assistance. Fortunately this has not been devoted to such areas as elementary sanitation or education, important as these are, but rather advanced techniques in industry and agriculture to the techniques directed to the special problem of this semi-arid country. The newly proposed grants of one hundred fifty million dollars would be a specialized form of Point Four assistance, in the highest and best sense of that program.

Mr. Sidney Sherwood, Secretary of the Export-Import Bank, has publicly paid tribute to the economical and effective use made by Israel of the loans advanced through that agency. With the safeguards written into the proposed legislation, and with the degree of private investment which Israel is achieving, there can be no question of the effectiveness of the grant to accomplish major objectives of the Point Four program; to help other people to help themselves, to develop the means of production and of livelihood, to advance the goals of freemen everywhere.

Israel has already returned compensating benefits to us by its refugee-resettlement program which has vastly reduced the burden of displaced-persons camps on international relief agencies and upon the United States Treasury. The grant now proposed is a substantial investment in progress which will bring far greater dividends per dollar than anything we could spend on the displaced-persons camps. We should consider ourselves well rewarded if, in this critical area of the world, on the bridgehead of three continents, close to the dividing line of east and west, we help to erect a sturdy democratic nation, dedicated to the defense of freedom, determined to resist aggression, pledged to stand firmly in the front ranks of the free world.

Five Years of CARE

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FOSTER FURCOLO
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. FURCOLO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Springfield (Mass.) Republican of March 11, 1951:

FIVE YEARS OF CARE

It was just 5 years ago that CARE, the Cooperative for American Remittances to Europe, dispatched its first relief shipment, and since that time an estimated 10,000,000 parcels have been distributed by the agency. Of them, Germany, Austria, Great Britain, France, and Italy have received the greatest share.

Paul Comly French, the executive director, points out that when CARE was organized late in 1945, its program was simple. The agency, established by several large relief and welfare groups, had acquired a stock of surplus Army rations. They could be bought by individuals in this country and CARE arranged the shipping and guaranteed delivery to specified friends or relatives overseas.

Today there are more than 20 different packages from which a donor in this country may choose. While most of them consist of food selected to meet the diet preferences or shortages in various countries, there also are clothing and textile parcels. The program even has been broadened so that packages may be sent to unspecified individuals or institutions. This general relief aspect of the program has enabled CARE to send books and plows as well as food in wholesale quantities.

While the agency has retained its original name, its activities have shifted more and more to the East. It has been shipping supplies to Algeria, Morocco, Tunisia, Egypt, Israel, Jordan, Iraq, Syria, Pakistan, India, Ceylon, Burma, Thailand, the Philippines, Okinawa, Korea, and Japan. Of the packages shipped last year, 490,000 went to Germany, 106,000 to Great Britain, 56,000 to Israel, 43,000 to Austria, 37,000 to France, 32,000 to Japan, and much smaller numbers to other countries.

Food made up about 85 percent of the 1950 parcels. It is expected that the total number of packages shipped this year will exceed the 1950 total because of new food needs in many areas. Prices range from $4 to $18.25, although the standard food package still is $10. Everyone who has sent CARE packages to needy persons abroad is well aware of the gratitude expressed by the recipients. Many beneficiaries have written long letters in appreciation of the gifts.

It is good to note that CARE is functioning today as faithfully as when first it was established. It has achieved a great deal, too, in acquainting Americans with persons in other countries and in cementing friendships among them.

Profiteering and Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH B. MITCHELL
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, labor organizations, joined together in a mutual purpose, have constantly pointed out the profiteering practices of a number of America's largest industries and called for the Government to stop profiteering. In an article published in the American Federationist, Mr. Boris Shishkin, the American Federation of Labor's nationally recognized economist, protests that "while the Korean crisis was testing the mettle of all Americans in their ability to respond to the great threat to us and to all the free world, quite a lot of corporate enterprises were kindling the fires of inflation at home."

Mr. Shishkin's article follows:

PROFITEERING AND INFLATION

(By Boris Shishkin, economist, American Federation of Labor

Inflation is a menace to everyone. When prices are rising, the dollar buys less. The worker receiving the same number of dollars takes a wage cut. His real wages decline. When a manufacturer earns the same profit, but the dollar buys less, his company's real earnings go down.

To stop inflation is everybody's business. On the stable value of the dollar depends the future worth of our savings, pensions, and insurance policies. Much more depends on it: the future stability and growth of our country; even the future of the free world.

If inflation is to be stopped, sacrifices are inevitable. But inflation controls will not work unless the anti-inflation program is even-handed. No group of people will be willing to give up things they need and want when they see others enriching themselves at the same time.

Workers who work for wages are willing to make their full contribution toward inflation control. But in doing so they want to be sure that the goods and services they produce do not become the source of enrichment, at their expense, to business in which they are employed.

How has the average worker in manufacturing fared during the past year? Between January 1950 and February 1951, average earnings, without overtime, of manufacturing workers increased 9.1 percent. But during the same period the cost of living, as measured by the consumers' price index, went up 9.3 percent. So, actually, the real wage of the manufacturing workers went down during this time. Workers in retail trade fared even worse and in a service trade, such as the laundry industry, the workers had a cut of nearly 4 percent in their real wages.

No one can claim that the explosive inflationary spurt which took place after the Communist invasion of South Korea, driving the cost of living up 8 percent in 6 months, was due to any cause other than shameless, speculative profiteering. Surely it was not due to an unbalanced Government budget; for once our Federal budget was balanced. Even Government spending was quite a bit less in 1950 than it was in 1949. And certainly it was not due to rising wages.

Our country's national income in 1950 rose 10.8 percent above 1949. And compensation received by all employees in America in 1950 was also 10.8 percent above 1949. But remember that in 1950 more people were employed—this accounts for a good part of the increase—and that those employed worked longer hours than in 1949. So that there was no disproportionate increase in wages.

The favorite myth of the antilabor propagandists—that higher pay of workers enables them to splurge on thick steaks and finery, bringing on higher prices—is completely exploded by the fact that between 1949 and 1950 personal consumption expenditures increased less than the national income.

Now look what happened to commodity prices during 1950. Wholesale prices of nonferrous metals went up more than 40 percent; lumber up 20 percent; livestock up 24 percent.

The real riot of speculation and profiteering—profiteering out of national emergency—followed the Communist invasion of South Korea. In 6 months, July to December 1950, the average American was taken to the cleaners by the get-rich-quick boys. He got fleeced both as a consumer and as a taxpayer who in the end must meet the jacked-up cost of defense.

In the last 6 months of 1950 wholesale prices of fats and oils jumped 61.7 percent. Hides and skins up 38 percent. Cotton goods up more than 35 percent. Woolen goods up 32 percent. Tires and tubes 23 percent. Paper and pulp up 22 percent. And so on. For the American people this was pretty bad business. But many of our businessmen evidently thought that making a quick profit was good business and the public be damned. So wherever they could they tried to buy cheap and sell dear.

Corporate profits in 1950 were 45.6 percent above 1949. In the fourth quarter of 1950 they were 74 percent above the fourth quarter of 1949. Even after taxes 1950 profits were 32 percent above 1949, and in the fourth quarter they were 58 percent above the same period in the previous year.

Take Montgomery Ward & Co. In 1949 their net profit was $48,000,000. In 1950 it was $74,000,000, a gain of 55 percent. Did they sell more goods? Well, their dollar sales increased 8 percent but, since prices were up, they evidently sold less goods for lots more money.

While the Korean crisis was testing the mettle of all Americans in their ability to respond to the great threat to us and to all the free world, quite a lot of corporate enterprises were kindling the fires of inflation at home. And they cannot blame it all on some foreign villains for jacking up the prices of raw materials we get from overseas.

Look at the facts—make a simple comparison of net profits of our corporations in 1949 and 1950. Do clothes cost you more than a year ago? Well, according to the Wall Street Journal, the net earnings of 24 textile companies went up 56 percent. Rubber? Profits of 12 rubber corporations went up 90 percent. Paper? Twenty-one pulp and paper corporations increased their profits 63 percent.

Twenty-three electrical and radio companies increased profits 42 percent. Twenty-five chemical companies raised profits 40 percent. Twenty-eight iron and steel companies earned 43 percent more in profits, and 14 mining and metals corporations earned almost 68 percent more in 1950 than they did in 1949.

These are some of the facts that the Director of Defense Mobilization seems to have missed in his report to the President on April 1. Indeed, Congress and the Government economic stabilizers have been missing such facts all along.

For example, on March 1 the Office of Price Stabilization gave a 3½-percent price increase on automobiles. Did this constitute relief to impoverished and hard-pressed auto manufacturers? Well, on March 5 the General Motors Corp. announced that in 1950 its $834,000,000 profit was 27 percent higher than in 1949, breaking all-time records.

The first step to get the American people behind the anti-inflation drive is to stop profiteering. Labor asks that an even-handed program of just economic stabilization be put into effect before we have to resort to a parade of bigger criminals than have yet been seen on television.

St. Lawrence Folly

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the editor of the Portland (Maine) Express in the edition of January 31, 1951, asks the following pointed question: "Of what use to our national-defense efforts would a frozen ship canal be?" In his editorial which follows he discusses the question more fully:

ST. LAWRENCE FOLLY

Well, of all things.

The Fair Dealers, casting about for ways to spend money faster and faster, have dusted off the old St. Lawrence River canal and waterpower scheme as a likely prospect. They sure could squirt a good many billions of tax dollars into that rathole—if the taxpayers' Representatives in Congress would just, please, give them the nod.

Anyway, the administration now is getting set to give this old chestnut another big boost. It has had the foresight, moreover, to sell its waterway arguments to certain nominal Republicans. Among these we find Wisconsin's Senator ALEXANDER WILEY and New Hampshire's liberal Senator CHARLES W. TOBEY.

WILEY says it would be "an absolute sin" not to squander our money, right away, deepening the St. Lawrence waterway to permit large ocean-going ships to enter the Great Lakes (small ocean steamers can and do go inland to Cleveland and Detroit now, through the existing canal system.)

And TOBEY, sounding for all the world like any typical Fair Dealer, would have us believe that "our long-term national defense, the economic growth of our good Canadian friends" (who, by the way, have all but put our port of Portland out of business and who have certainly taken no pains to heighten the living standards of Maine coast fishermen and lobstermen, with whom they compete) "the future of heavy industry and commerce of our own great Midwest, the electric-power hunger of our industries and consumers in New England and New York, are all tied up in the success of the St. Lawrence seaway."

No kidding!

What the Senator means, presumably, is that if the present St. Lawrence River canals were widened and deepened to permit the passage of larger steamers that can now navigate above Montreal, big ore-carrying ships could travel from Labrador to Buffalo and Cleveland and Lorain—and that would, undeniably, be important from the national defense viewpoint.

There is just one flaw in this pleasant picture of a steady stream of ocean-going ships linking Duluth, Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, and the other Great Lakes ports with the Seven Seas.

Still, it is a big flaw: Ice.

As Senator TOBEY probably knows, the Canadian cities of Quebec and Montreal, on the St. Lawrence River, are important seaports during 7 out of every 12 months. But during the five winter months, they are as much inland cities, and as completely cut off from the sea, as are Winnipeg or Kansas City. They are cut off from the sea by ice which no steamship can negotiate.

The ice which locks the St. Lawrence from shore to shore all winter would also, just as certainly, lock tight the system of ship canals which Senator TOBEY and his Fair Deal playmates want to build—largely to promote "the economic growth of our good Canadian friends"—with more dollars withheld from the pay envelopes of working people in Maine, New Hampshire, and 46 other States.

Of what use, to our National defense effort, would a frozen ship canal be?

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WINT SMITH
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, here is a copy of a letter that I have received in protest against the firing of General MacArthur. This letter was written by the high school students of Downs, Kans. Here is what they said:

APRIL 12, 1951.

The Honorable HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We as a group of high-school students wish to express our opinion regarding the ousting of General MacArthur.

In the first place we question your reasons for dismissing General MacArthur as commander of the United Nations forces. We are aware of the fact that you had given the general orders not to express his opinion in regard to foreign policy. But we also have been taught as Americans to take pride in the fact that we have freedom of speech. Does General MacArthur have freedom of speech? We believe that any American regardless of position, is free to express his opinion. It appears to us that you are afraid to have such a respected man as General MacArthur express an opinion that conflicts with yours. We, as American citizens, are intelligent enough to choose from varying foreign policies.

We feel that you, as President of the United States, should be more concerned with representing the people of America rather than being influenced by foreign elements. If communism is the enemy of democracy, then why cannot all forces opposing communism be turned loose to fight it? If we are opposing the Chinese Reds in Korea, why cannot the Chinese Nationalists be permitted to fight the common enemy?

We question your discharging personnel who have proved themselves worthy, when others who have had evidence brought against them proving them unworthy, remain as our public servants.

It is our earnest desire that this letter be received by you as further evidence of the dissatisfaction of the American public with your actions.

Yours sincerely,

(Twenty-six signatures.)

The Question Never Answered

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Los Angeles Times of April 10, 1951:

THE QUESTION NEVER ANSWERED

Alger Hiss was smoked out about 10 years after Whittaker Chambers told his story to Adolf Berle for transmission to Franklin Roosevelt. When the House Un-American Activities Committee caught up with the Hiss case, the FBI had known about it for 8 years.

In 1946 the late Canadian Premier Mackenzie King made a special trip to Washington to tell President Truman what he had learned of the Russian spy ring in the United States as a result of the Canadian spy inquiry.

In the course of the recent spy trial of the Rosenbergs and Sobell it was disclosed that the FBI had much of the information in the case back in 1947.

THE FBI HAD THE EVIDENCE

The FBI also knew for years that the Amtorg Trading Co. in New York was the clearing house for Russian spies, whence our techniques in the production of chemicals, war materials, electronic devices and the atom bomb were transmitted to Moscow.

Why was action put off for so long in these and other such matters?

The Hiss case never would have come to trial if the Un-American Activities Committee had not been diligent. Other cases might not have been subject to official action to this day if the arrest of Klaus Fuchs in Britain early last year had not forced the hand of the American administration—for the Fuchs confession spotlighted espionage in the United States so clearly that action could no longer be withheld.

More than a year after Mr. Mackenzie King talked to him, President Truman told the press (on August 19, 1948,) he believed that no war secrets had gotten out of this country. (We shall let the reader off with only this one reference to "red herring," an epithet which Mr. Truman has employed several times since 1948.)

But again the question, why was nothing done when it could have been done, when action on information available might have saved some of our secrets and alerted the Nation for the future?

NOTHING WAS DONE

Nobody outside the Government knows exactly, but it is certain that somewhere in its executive branch some person or group of persons of great influence has kept the bloodhounds leashed. Here is some testimony which hints at where to look for this person or persons:

Larry E. Kerley is an ex-FBI man who once pursued a Russian spy called Arthur Adams. When he had made his case against this man he was ordered to let the spy leave the country unmolested. The order, Kerley said, came through the State Department, whereupon he resigned from the FBI in protest of what he believed was a betrayal of his country. That was in October, 1945.

Kerley was called to testify before Senator PAT MCCARRAN'S Judiciary Subcommittee investigating subversive aliens in September of 1949. He said:

"Russia's espionage activities in this country continued almost unchecked throughout the entire course of the last war. In accordance with instructions from the State Department * * * the Federal Bureau of Investigation was not even permitted to open an espionage case against any Russian suspect without State Department approval."

Senator O'CONOR asked: "Did you understand that that was to include also American participants?"

"Yes," said Kerley, "because if they were arrested that would disclose the whole apparatus, you see."

Senator O'CONOR asked: "Mr. Kerley, was the information that was gathered in connection with espionage activity to which you have referred forwarded to the State Department or was the State Department made aware of the nature of the disclosures?"

"In all cases," Kerley said, "they were kept closely advised."

FREE HAND FOR RUSSIANS

It should be borne in mind that Kerley quit the FBI just after the war was over. So it could be explained that what he told the committee about was a tactful wartime accommodation—that State Department officials, along with officials of other departments who fawned on our democratic Russian allies, acted on the belief that the brotherhood of battle entitled the Commies to steal everything which was not nailed down—or which we had not already given them under lend-lease.

But that explanation would not be valid for the lack of action in and after 1946, by which time Secretary of State Byrnes had learned in Moscow, right from the "horse's mouth," that Russia was not a friend but a foe, something which "nonliberal" Americans had been convinced of for 25 years.

We know that the American Communists and their Russian friends have been gingerly handled right down to the present. We know that the Government has taken no action against any of them except under pressure. The trial of the 12 Communist Party leaders in New York resulted from the heat generated by congressional investigation and was an attempt to turn this heat off.

These are facts for a citizen to bear in mind whenever he hears a "liberal" disparage the un-American investigating committee or any like congressional group. If we ever are to learn who in the executive branch of the Government protects the Communists, and why, Congress is our only instrument. The fix is still on in the executive branch.

Equal Status in Medical Professions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH B. MITCHELL

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, in this time of national emergency and mobilization, the various health professions are making a vital contribution by maintaining the health of our civilian population as well as those directly engaged in the defense effort.

Because I believe it is pertinent and important to the selective service and the UMT measure, I am placing in the RECORD excerpts from a statement which was directed to the House Armed Services Committee by Mr. George P. Sheridan, director of Legislative Affairs for the International Chiropractors.

The statement by Mr. Sheridan urged the committee to recognize the part the chiropractic profession occupies in the defense effort by specifically granting equal status with other health professions under deferment provisions of the Universal Military Training and Draft Act, Senate 1:

INTERNATIONAL CHIROPRACTORS ASSOCIATION,
Davenport, Iowa, March 5, 1951.

Hon. CARL VINSON,
Chairman, House Armed Services Committee, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN VINSON: Your committee currently has before it for consideration, Senate 1, Universal Military Training and Draft Act.

As adopted by the Senate, this measure would deny to the chiropractic profession equal status with other healing professions under deferment provisions designed to maintain the national health, safety, and interest.

The nation's manpower requirements, both foreign and domestic, will undoubtedly necessitate the service of doctors and students of chiropractic and they patriotically stand ready to provide whatever share is needed.

A very concrete and serious problem is presented, however, as to the policy which the Congress establishes with regard to the drafting of doctors of chiropractic, in order that there will not be indiscriminate calling of doctors without reference to community needs and without proper safeguards to insure maintainng an adequate balance of supply in each area.

This same problem extends to the educational level and the training of students in chiropractic schools and colleges. Action at the local level which does not conform with national policy will disrupt both the curricular and financial structure of these institutions as well as adversely affect the systematic flow of new doctors to supply the requirements of those who depend upon chiropractic.

The situation is especially important in view of the recognized deficiency of practitioners in the healing arts currently required to meet the minimum health needs of the Nation.

The chiropractic profession is the second largest of the healing arts. Comprising approximately 19,000 doctors, it renders health service to 30,000,000 Americans. As such it represents a vital segment of the total manpower available to administer to national health requirements.

A recent survey by the International Chiropractors Association, using the 12-State yardstick formula adopted by the Federal Security Agency as a basis, establishes 1 chiropractor per 4,000 people as the minimum consistent with health needs. This compares with a present ratio of 1 chiropractor per 8,900 persons. The survey found an existing need for more than 18,000 chiropractors to satisfy minimum requirements. Taking into account population increases and attrition from death, retirement, and so forth, 2,840 replacements must be supplied annually by chiropractic colleges.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Actual present enrollment in the seven largest schools, comprising 80 percent of total enrollment, is 2,492, according to a January 1951 survey. Of these students, 5x.6 percent are in the age bracket subject to present selective service regulations, and a large percentage of the remainder are subject to call as members of the active Reserve. It is estimated that but an approximate 750 students will graduate from chiropractic colleges annually on the basis of the present enrollment in standard 4-year courses.

From this survey the conclusion is inescapable that the civilian health will be endangered and the survival of the chiropractic profession threatened unless adequate provision is made to insure an equitable quota of chiropractic practitioners and students.

The Congress has indicated that it recognizes this problem as applied generally to all the healing arts. We desire to point out, however, that chiropractic has been held as a separate and distinct profession by the courts and by provision of the licensure statutes in most States. Experience demonstrates that unless chiropractic is specifically named it will not be accorded equality of status with other healing arts when provisions of this bill are carried out within the various jurisdictions.

The chiropractic profession asks no special consideration. It does plead for equal treatment with the other healing professions in order that it may continue to fulfill its demonstrated important part in the public health and welfare.

Deferment of a fair proportion of chiropractic personnel will have no appreciable effect on meeting military requirements, whereas failure to do so will deny to an increasing percentage of people the opportunity to obtain adequate health care.

It is respectfully urged, therefore, that your committee amend Senate 1 by specifically including chiropractic by name in the provisions of the act dealing with deferment of individual doctors and students of the healing professions.

Respectfully,

GEORGE P. SHERIDAN,
Director of Legislative Affairs,
International Chiropractors Association.

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WINT SMITH
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all Members of Congress have received many letters and telegrams which contain many fine statements over the midnight firing of General MacArthur.

Here is a telegram that I think is most significant both as to the context and to the number of persons signing it.

Glen Elder, Kansas, a fine prosperous little town in North Central Kansas has a population of 580 people.

Yet within a few hours after the MacArthur discharge was heard, 115 voters had put their names on a telegram protesting this degradation of MacArthur.

Here is what the telegram said:

Impeach the red herring from the Presidential chair and clean up our State Department. If we are going to lose our Government to communism do it honorably on the battlefield.

(Signed by 115 persons.)

Selective Service System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN V. BEAMER
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. BEAMER. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous leave to extend my remarks, I enclose a letter that expresses the feelings of the farmers in many sections in regard to the selective service board membership:

THE PENDULUM SWINGS FROM ONE EXTREME TO THE OTHER

BRODBECK BROS.,
Wabash, Ind., March 19, 1951.

JOHN V. BEAMER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JOHN: You will perhaps be interested in knowing that the county agricultural extension committee of which you are a member met Friday to discuss the selective-service law in its relation to the deferment of local farm boys who are irreplaceable and more particularly to the over-all level of agricultural production of food, feed, and fiber. The discussion was carried on on a high level and was not injected with petty personal grievances. Mr. Ward Vandegrift, the local draft appeal agent was present and discussed the weaknesses of the draft law from the standpoint of the appeal agent.

We are still so close in point of time to World War II that the abuses of the Selective Service System as then administered are not forgotten.

In the first place, too many men without any true agricultural interest, background, and experience left the city to farm and were granted agricultural deferments, thereby escaping the draft. Second, farmers of financial means bought up more land, equipment, and livestock to qualify sons for deferment under the system of points of production units that was set up as a standard or basis for such deferments. Naturally, such abuses were undemocratic and aroused the ire of city people and farmers of less financial means whose sons had to serve in the Army because of failure to qualify for deferment.

So now the pendulum has swung in the other direction, and perhaps too far, so far that, unless the situation is corrected soon, far greater damage will be done to the Nation's security through a reduction of vital foodstuffs than was ever done by the inequalities in World War II.

Three factors are causing many local draft boards to swing to the opposite extreme in administering the Selective Service Act at the present time. First, the pressure of urban public opinion resulting from these aforesaid abuses of the last war period that the farm boy is no better than theirs (in which they are duly justified). Second, the fact that the law does not require that one member of the local board should be a bona fide farmer, and third, that no standard or yardstick was provided for the guidance of the local board in making their deferments. The absence of such a yardstick or standard makes for a very great lack of uniformity of action among the various county boards and leaves entirely too much up to the local boards whose decisions too often seem to be guided by prejudice rather than facts and economic considerations of maintaining our farm production during periods of national crisis. For example, one board member in Wabash County said that the board did not care whether farmers produced any food during the next 4 years or not as there was plenty of surplus on hand. As another example, in a neighboring county, a man who was appointed to the draft board made the statement that he did not really want the job, but that he would like to be on it long enough "to slap some of those d—— farm boys into the Army." And as a further example, taken from the higher level, out of 55 cases that have been cited to the State Appeal Board by our local appeal agent, 54 cases have been flatly denied by a vote of 3 to 0, and the other one by a vote of 2 to 1. Obviously, the intent of selective service becomes null and void and it becomes instead a universal draft.

At this point, we grant further that if there were plenty of manpower in every productive segment of society, industrial, scientific, and agricultural, then the universal draft would be democratic and theoretically desirable. Equality of opportunity in our democracy carries with it equality of responsibility and sacrifice so one man is no better than another, provided he were not irreplaceable.

But such a satisfactory balance and supply of manpower is not available in the scientific and agricultural fields as compared to the industrial for several reasons: First, because of the lure of short hours and high wages paid by industry, labor has been drained off the farm to a dangerously low level. Second—because a very high percentage of farm owners and operators are now past 50 years of age, and so are no longer able to carry on with their usual vigor and vitality, some annual replacements of manpower on the farm are just as necessary and logical as replacements of machinery, fences and soil fertility.

From whence shall these replacements come? The proponents of the universal draft propose drafting all the farm boys and the bringing in of foreign labor such as Mexicans, and Jamaicans to replace them. True, such labor can help in periods of peak labor loads in harvesting seasonal crops such as tomatoes, sweet corn, sugar beets, etc. But they are not fitted either by training, background, or inclination to carry on the many skilled operations necessary to modern farming, such as tractor and equipment operations, feeding livestock, producing butter, eggs, milk and so on.

Now, having stated the existing ills and dangers to our economy in our present minor conflict, and more especially should we get into an all-out global war with Russia whereby we would again be called on to feed our allies as well as ourselves, it is the opinion of this group as well as that of many other straight-thinking farmers that two remedies should be applied at once.

An amendment to the existing bills now pending in Congress that whenever possible a bona fide farmer should be appointed on the draft board, should be made a part of the new law.

Second, an amendment to this same legislation directing or mandating the director of the draft to furnish a reasonable and workable yardstick or standard to local draft boards as a basis for their decisions in hardship cases and that of irreplaceable draftees. Such a standard would secure much greater uniformity as between counties than now exists, where everything is left up to the judgment of the local board.

Third, this standard or yardstick should also be furnished to the State appeal boards for their guidance in appeal cases.

Anything which you may do to present this viewpoint to the committees in charge of this legislation to make this draft law more reasonable and keep it truly selective will be very much appreciated.

Incidentally, the vast majority of our people feel that we had no business in Korea in the first place, and that we should get out of there promptly, or either give MacArthur authority to fight in such a manner as to bring the war to a quick conclusion rather than sacrifice American lives unnecessarily in a long-drawn-out stalemate.

Also, the majority of our citizens in this section approve the deferment of students in the upper brackets in colleges as we just cannot afford to kill off the potential scientists of tomorrow upon the grounds that they are no better than ordinary unskilled labor. They may be no better, but they are certainly far more valuable to the Nation's future welfare. To put them on the firing line can become national suicide.

Very truly yours,

L. A. BRODBECK.

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WINT SMITH
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, many say that the youth of our country do not think and are not interested in the world affairs. Here is what an 18-year-old wrote in regard to the firing of MacArthur:

APRIL 18, 1951.

Representative WINT SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. SMITH: My name is ———. I am 18 years old and a senior in high school.

The people of the United States are not asking for any more than can be expected from any full-blooded American. They just want to live nice, comfortable lives, with the assurance of good, clean, and sound government and all this yakatea-yaky stuff, that we hear all the time, left out.

There is no sense of any man, whether butcher, baker, or President to offer to those associated with him so little cooperation. This alone proves some of the qualities of any man. Mr. Truman is definitely deficient in this quality; the least he could do is aid Congress, at least a little for the people. No one man, whether President or industrialist, is sufficiently infallable to decide the fate of a nation, without at the very least some of the views of the people and the Congress taken into consideration.

We want peace; there must be unity and coherence, and, above all, integrity and fortitude in the Government. At present we have the most notorious problematical predicament any country has ever known. We have disunity, dishonesty, and little or no courage in all our governmental functions.

The word "peace" is a great, big, and wonderful word. In my dictionary it says it means a state of rest or tranquillity; freedom from war or disturbance. This word, in my estimation, is badly abused.

Did you say peace? Well—look back a little. This country hasn't had a decent day of peace for so long that it had ought to be ashamed of itself. We try to help everyone and look what we got—world war III, we're in it, we were in it, and we will be in it for a long time to come.

I am not saying this in my stupid way, so that I won't be drafted or have an easy life; quite on the contrary. I sincerely believe that all these wonderful Americans had ought to be treated at the very least fairly and honestly.

I think you will find, Mr. Smith, that if this country doesn't do something drastic within the next few days, weeks, or months that this country is lost and may God help us and have mercy on us.

I definitely want Mr. Truman impeached along with Acheson as so many Americans do who love their country. I do believe, however, that Mr. Truman and Acheson are not all our trouble. All Communists and atheists must be extirpated from all branches of our Government.

As far as Mr. Truman's action against MacArthur. I was very sorry to hear this because I believe Mr. MacArthur is a very capable man. He is reliable, efficient, and has demonstrated many of his abilities throughout his life. He gave his entire life for his country and that is something Truman hasn't and doesn't intend to do.

The people of the United States are on the uproar. Why? The people of the United States have been led around by the nose and have listened to this, that, and everything, including true and untrue communistic statements and ballyhoo. Is there any wonder why we have all this confusion.

I pray to God to give to you strength, courage, and guidance through the years to come and may God protect all of us.

Sincerely yours.

Statement by the President of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a statement by the President of the United States released today at 4 p. m.:

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT

The United States is moving steadily forward in concert with other countries of the Pacific in its determination to make ever stronger the position of the free world in the Pacific Ocean area.

In connection with the reestablishment of peace with Japan, we are discussing with the Japanese Government the implementation of its expressed desire for a post-treaty security arrangement pursuant to which United States Armed Forces might on a provisional basis remain in and about Japan.

The United States maintains, and expects to continue to maintain, its Armed Forces in the Ryukyus, particularly at Okinawa.

In the Philippines, the United States is accorded certain military operating rights and facilities pursuant to an agreement with the Government of the Philippines and the whole world knows that the United States recognizes that an armed attack on the Philippines would be looked upon by the United States as dangerous to its own peace and safety and that it would act accordingly.

The Governments of Australia and New Zealand, in connection with the reestablishment of peace with Japan, have suggested an arrangement between them and the United States, pursuant to articles 51 and 52 of the United Nations Charter which would make clear that in the event of an armed attack upon any one of them in the Pacific, each of the three would act to meet the common danger in accordance with its constitutional processes; and which would establish consultation to strengthen security on the basis of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid.

The possibilities of such an arrangement were fully explored by Mr. Dulles at Canberra, Australia, and Wellington, New Zealand, and have since been informally discussed with the appropriate subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House.

I have now asked the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, and Mr. Dulles, as my special representative in relation to the Japanese peace settlement and related matters, to pursue this matter further concurrently with the prosecution of the other negotiations necessary to bring the Japanese peace settlement to an early and satisfactory conclusion.

The series of arrangements and dispositions outlined above, will strengthen the fabric of peace in the whole Pacific Ocean area, where security is strongly influenced by sea and air power. They constitute natural initial steps in the consolidation of peace in that area and also will contribute to the building of universal peace as sought by the United Nations and under which great goal the efforts of our Nation are now being largely dedicated.

Danger! Communists at Work

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURR P. HARRISON
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix, I include an article by Bruno Shaw, radio news analyst and foreign correspondent, which appeared in the April issue of the Elks magazine.

This article points up the work of the House Committee on Un-American Activities in acquainting the public with the insidious operating mechanics of the Communist Party in the United States:

DANGER!' COMMUNISTS AT WORK — LOOK BEFORE YOU SIGN, FOR UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES ARE SKILLFULLY HIDDEN

(By Bruno Shaw)

"Danger! Communists at work." Every high school and college in the country; every industrial plant; every association, group and church of every denomination, should carve that slogan on its doorstep—should exert every last ounce of effort to impress it unfailingly in the minds and hearts of its students, members, employees and associates.

"The Communist Party is like a submerged submarine," said J. Peters, former Russian head of a Communist spy ring in the United States; "the part that you see above water is the periscope, but the part underneath is the real Communist organization; that is the conspiratorial apparatus."

Communist and Communist-front organizers exploit to full advantage the naturally questioning and even rebellious attitude of American youth toward authority. Countless unwary youngsters have been enrolled in renegade organizations such as American Student Union, American Youth Congress, Friends of the Campus, National Student League, World Youth Council, and many more.

Thousands of young Americans on high-school and college campuses from coast to coast, under the delusion that they were joining a liberal, patriotic organization, became members of American Youth for Democracy. Unknown to most of them is the fact that this organization was formerly the Young Communist League.

The House Committee on Un-American Activities, in its report for the year 1950, takes a grim view of Communist activities in the United States. "With the Armed Forces of the United States actually pitted in conflict against the legions of international communism," says the report, "the Communist Party of the United States can no longer be viewed passively as a group of mere political and ideological dissidents, but must be looked upon with all seriousness as a military fifth column actively aiding our enemies."

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

The House committee is convinced that members of Communist-front organizations which advocate policies designed to weaken the United States resistance to Communist aggression (as all of them do), are, wittingly or unwittingly, enemies of the Nation; and that those who sign Communist-front petitions, offered for their signatures under a variety of disguises, are either extremely naive or fools or knaves.

Representative JOHN S. WOOD, of Georgia, is chairman of the House committee. It is possible now, says Mr. WOOD, for American citizens to secure from the House committee information about any petition, appeal, or organization they may be asked to sign or to join. There is no reason in the world, he declares, for anyone to allow himself to be tricked into participating in an un-American activity.

What, precisely, is an un-American activity? "Any action of any individual or organization," says Mr. WOOD, "which seeks to alter or change the form of government of this Nation by other than the method pointed out in the Constitution, or who seeks by violent and unlawful methods to interfere with the orderly operations of the Government or any of its subdivisions—is un-American."

Does the committee stifle public debate? Does it tend to exercise thought control? Does it threaten freedom of expression on behalf of causes which may be unpopular at the moment?

Representative FRANCIS E. WALTER, of Pennsylvania, ranking member of the committee, says "No." "The House committee," says Mr. WALTER, "is solely an instrument of investigation and education. It has no punitive power. It may subpena persons and question them about their activities and associations. It hopes that, by revealing the genuine nature of subversive groups in the United States, Americans will become more careful about lending their names and support to causes they have not personally investigated."

There are plenty of such causes. The newest publication of the House committee, Guide to Subversive Organizations and Publications, lists 624 Communist or Communist-front groups and 204 newspapers and periodicals of a similar nature, actively operating in the United States.

Labor unions are a prime Communist objective. How unions become subject to Communist control is described in the committee's series 100 Things You Should Know About Communism. In the labor section of the series, David Dubinsky, president of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, who waged a successful fight against Communist infiltration, exposes Red techniques. He cites, as an example of their deliberate intent, the Communist-led strike of 1926, which cost $4,500,000 and left in its wake a chaotic garment industry and a crippled union.

Among the Communist-led unions the House committee has helped to expose are the United Office and Professional Workers of America; the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America; the International Fur and Leather Workers. Eleven such unions already have been expelled from the CIO because of their Communist domination, including those three.

WHAT THEY BELIEVE

Communism, in the opinion of the House committee, is the clear and present danger. Prominently displayed on the flyleaf of 100 Things You Should Know About Communism, is the sworn statement of William Z. Foster, head of the Communist Party in the United States: "No Communist, no matter how many votes he should secure in a national election, could, even if he would, become President of the present Government. When a Communist heads the Government of the United States—and that day will come just as surely as the sun rises—the Government will not be a capitalistic government but a Soviet government, and behind this government will stand the Red army to enforce the dictatorship of the proletariat."

Does the House committee investigate subversive activities other than Communist? It does, but only to a limited extent. This may be accounted for by its limited budget and staff. On February 7, the House appropriated $200,000 for the committee's expenses for the current year. The staff numbers 34 persons, of whom 8 are investigators. Criticism was expressed to me even in congressional quarters that the committee has not been sufficiently diligent in exposing the man-on-a-white-horse groups, right-wing totalitarian organizations, and racist antiminority groups, the respectability of which rests solely on the slender reed that they, too, are anti-Communist.

Louis J. Russell, 39-year-old former FBI man, is senior investigator of the House committee. What the committee is able to fry at its hearings depends to a large extent upon the number and quality of fish Mr. Russell and his staff are able to gather in their nets.

Mr. Russell and his assistant, Mr. Donald T. Appell, gave full and complete answers to the endless questions I raised in my search for information about the Communist conspiratorial octopus whose tentacles pry into every corner of American life. They seemed to enjoy, for a change, the novelty of being in the witness box.

In addition to the strain of what might be considered their normal activity of searching out and interrogating persons suspected of subversive activities, the committee is harassed by a variety of crackpots and lunatic-fringers who believe that the only way to preserve democracy is to abolish it, and who wear down the flagstones of the House corridors with their unflagging visitations. Most of these eager-beavers find their way to Mr. Russell's office with plans that range all the way from appointing a chancelor of the United States to abolishing Government altogether.

How does the committee's expressed purpose work in action? Generally, in the public interest. It has uncovered or helped to make known to the public hundreds of individuals and groups engaged in operations designed to overthrow the Government and destroy our freedom, all the way from Soviet spies and saboteurs to American youth group organizers.

AGENTS UNCOVERED

The apparatus of the Communist conspiracy exposed to public view by the House committee includes figures such as Semen Vasilenko, who escaped to Russia with vital metallurgical research and atomic-energy information; Arthur Adams, a Soviet agent who obtained information relating to the atomic bomb; Eugene Dennis, general secretary of the Communist Party, who defied the authority of the House committee to subpena him for hearing and was sentenced to a $1,000 fine and a year in jail, where he is at present.

The 81 pamphlets published by the committee in 1950, describing Communist and Communist-front activities, reveal the nature of the Communist conspiracy in our midst. Typical of the views held by many of those engaged in it is the following brief excerpt from the testimony of Steve Nelson. At hearings held in June 1949, Steve Nelson (alias Louis Evans, Joseph Fleischinger) was questioned by Representative MORGAN M. MOULDER, of Missouri, a member of the House committee:

"Mr. MOULDER. Mr. Nelson, in the event of war between the United States and Russia, to which country would you owe your allegiance and loyalty in such a conflict?

"Mr. NELSON. I refuse to answer that question."

Steve Nelson was cited for contempt for refusing to answer direct questions throughout the hearings. At subsequent hearings before the committee, the full shocking details of the activities of Nelson and his accomplices were told by Matthew Cvetic, undercover agent for the FBI. Nelson was identified as a Communist organizer specializing in securing control over labor unions in vital industries.

A vast amount of time consumed at committee hearings is spent in an endeavor to persuade recalcitrant witnesses to answer direct questions. After examining thousands of pages of verbatim testimony, one begins to understand the need for almost superhuman patience when dealing with elusive, frustrating characters who, standing on their constitutional rights, and guided by expert lawyer-quibblers, are dedicated to the destruction of the very constitutional rights they call upon for their own protection.

The testimony of Philip A. Bart, general manager of the Freedom of the Press, publishers of the official Communist Party organ, the Daily Worker, is a case in point. The hearing was held on June 21, 1950. Here is a brief excerpt of the questioning by Mr. Frank S. Tavenner, Jr., committee counsel, and the replies made by Mr. Bart:

"Mr. TAVENNER. Have you ever been out of the United States?

"Mr. BART. I refuse to answer.

"Mr. TAVENNER. Have you ever used the name John William Fox?

"Mr. BART. I will not answer this question, which, in accordance with article V of the Constitution, may be used by this committee to incriminate me.

"Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Bart, I hand you a photostatic copy of an application for passport signed in the name of John William Fox, and I will ask you to look at the photograph appearing on the second page and state to me whether or not that is a photograph of you?

"Mr. BART (after examining document), I refuse to answer."

The House Committee has no power to mete out punishment to those whose subversive activities may be proven, or even to those who refuse to answer the committee's questions. Punitive action rests with the Attorney General and other prosecuting agencies of the Government. And no legal action can be taken against a witness until, and unless, that person has been indicted by a grand jury in the district in which the hearing has been held.

MEANS OF EVASION

Witnesses who refuse to answer questions usually resort to one of three means of evading them. First, by quoting the first amendment to the Constitution, which provides for freedom of speech, press, and assembly; secondly, by declaring that the House committee is not legally constituted and is without constitutional authority to conduct the hearing; and third, by claiming immunity under the fifth amendment to the Constitution, which provides that "No person * * * shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself."

The first two of these inviting avenues of escape proved, in many cases, to be blind alleys, and witnesses who attempted to employ them ultimately found themselves in jail. Outstanding examples of witnesses who claimed immunity under the first amendment were the Hollywood Ten: Alvah Bessie, Herbert Biberman, Lester Cole, Edward Dmytryk, Ring Lardner, Jr., John Howard Lawson, Albert Maltz, Samuel Ornitz, Robert Adrian Scott, and Dalton Trumbo. All were sentenced to $1,000 fine and a year in jail. All had refused to answer the question: "Are you a Communist?"

The courts have held that the first amendment does not provide immunity because there is no abridgment of speech in requiring a direct "yes" or "no" to the question. The courts have held, too, that the House committee does have constitutional authority to conduct hearings and question witnesses. The claim of immunity under the fifth amendment still remains to be decided definitely by a test case.

LINE ON FIFTH COLUMN

According to the committee's 1950 report, "some 1,300 witnesses have testified in public and executive hearings held in the past 12 years. The committee's continuing study of Communist activity since 1938 has resulted in a voluminous collection of information concerning the leaders of programs and aims of an entrenched potential fifth column made up of the 54,000 members of the Communist Party and its half million followers, and their increasing efforts in behalf of the forces of international communism. The committee has unearthed information concerning the activities and methods of foreign agents intent on missions of propaganda, espionage, and sabotage. This information will serve as a valuable tool in the protection of our country against espionage and sabotage from within in this period of national emergency."

Witnesses who have appeared before the committee included several whose purpose was to protest against injury to their reputations, either because of the way they were listed in committee files or because of misinterpretation of information supplied by the committee, which, because of incorrect evaluation, caused personal injury to loyal American citizens. Though complaints of this sort have been comparatively few, they are responsible for major criticism of the committee's methods of recording and reporting.

COMMITTEE'S ATTITUDE

The conduct of the present House committee hearings is a far cry from that of the capricious Dies committee, which had seven incandescent years of existence from 1938 to 1944, inclusive, or that of the J. Parnell Thomas committee, which came later. It is unlikely that the present committee, under the chairmanship of Representaitve JOHN S. WOOD will ever be known as the Wood committee. Mr. WOOD is not, apparently, that kind of a headline hunter. He is not averse to headlines. He would like more of them; but for the committee and its work, and not for himself, in order that the public may better understand the nature of the menace of totalitarianism of any kind.

Mr. WOOD is the kind of person described by novelists who WAX sentimental over Dixie, as a southern gentleman. You have a feeling, sitting in his office in the Old House Office Building, of being welcome and at home. You know, because of the burden of his committee work (he is a member of several committees) and because of his congressional duties, that he is a hurried, harried man. But you would never know it when his time is yours for the moment. That segment of time, no matter how small or how large it may be, is yours entirely.

It seems deplorably true that we have not changed very much since Barnum said: "There's a sucker born every minute." Mr. WOOD points, for example, to the Communist-inspired Stockholm peace petition campaign of last year. Marcel Schere, an individual with a long public record of Communist Party affiliation and activities, who has been identified as closely associated with a Communist atomic espionage ring, appeared before the House committee on June 21 and admitted that he WAS one of those in charge of this drive in New York City.

Thousands of American citizens throughout the United States affixed their signatures to this Moscow-inspired peace petition. The Cominform officially claims that 2,000,000 Americans signed it. Their names and addresses will constitute a gigantic and valuable mailing list for the Communist Party which will bombard them with deceptively worded literature and solicit them for funds under innumerable disguises.

What the Stockholm peace petition actually called for was the adoption of the Soviet plan for restriction of atomic energy. The peace petition called for a pledge to ban the use of the atomic bomb, but without any international inspection of Soviet activities in atomic bomb production. It did not mention the desirability of banning the tremendous armies and armament the U. S. S. R. and its satellites have built up since 1945, nor did it mention the illegal rearmament by the U. S. S. R. of Hungary, Bulgaria, and Rumania far beyond the limits imposed in the peace treaties. And, of course, it did not mention that this plan, disguised as a peace petition, was overwhelmingly rejected time and again by the majority of the United Nations.

PEACE IN NAME ONLY

A similar subversive call to peace was issued by the Daily Worker on February 1 of this year, calling for a peace pilgrimage to Washington to be held on March 1, under the auspices of the American Peace Crusade, one of the many fronts that more honestly could be called the Moscow sabotage operation.

The American Peace Crusade is the same old Kremlin wolf in a new sheepskin. It is an offshoot of the Communist conspiracy known in 1949 as the Partisans of Peace movement. Its original plan was to collect 400,000,000 signatures throughout the world, of which 5,000,000 were to be secured in the United States. The American Peace Crusade took over early this year with a call for UN forces to get out of Korea, and for Red China to be seated immediately in the United Nations.

On February 19 the House committee published the March of Treason, which lists the leading Communist and Communist-front sponsors of the American Peace Crusade. With information of this kind available for the asking (schools and organizations can get these leaflets free of charge from the committee), there is no reason why any intelligent person should allow himself to be beguiled into signing Communist-inspired petitions.

Before leaving Washington I called once more on Representative FRANCIS E. WALTER, who, among his colleagues, is one of the most highly regarded members of the House. I asked him for his estimate of the Nation's awareness of the nature and extent of Communist activities.

"Not 2 percent of the American people realize that communism is a world-wide conspiracy," said Mr. WALTER, "or that when Lenin said, and Stalin reiterated, that our two forms of government could not live peacefully side by side, and that only one of them could survive, they really meant it."

A line needs to be drawn between loyal, intellectually honest Americans who may be in open disagreement with current national policy, whose freedom to express their views must not be impaired or curtailed, and whose persons and reputations must be given every safeguard if we are to remain, in fact, a free people; and those who, for ulterior motives, support policies or actions inimical to our national security.

But clearly, if Mr. WALTER'S estimate is even approximately correct, much educational work remains to be done. Equally clear is the fact that in the present clouded ideological climate there must be available a responsible source of information concerning individuals and groups whose activities are subject to question, and a tribunal before which those persons may be questioned. The record demonstrates that the present House committee serves this useful and essential function in our national community, and that we would be badly off without it.

The record provides unmistakable warning. In addition, that it is high time for all Americans — men and women, boys and girls—to pause for reflection before signing petitions and appeals for projects which, on the surface, seem in accord with their own liberal views, and that, remembering the submerged submarine of the conspiratorial apparatus among us, they should bear in mind: "Danger; Communists at work."

Warning on Toronto Stock Frauds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD A. GARMATZ

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. GARMATZ. Mr. Speaker, recently several Members of the House have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, articles from the St. Louis Star-Times, regarding the Toronto stock frauds.

It appears that some Toronto brokers and dealers have been promoting the sale of stocks in gold, silver, uranium, cobalt, and oil—all worthless projects. They have obtained lists of prospective American investors and have been circularizing these prospects from the east coast to the west coast, with excellent results, and with intent to defraud. It is estimated that they take as much as fifty-two millions of dollars annually from Americans. Such promotions are illegal in the United States, but are permitted in the Province of Ontario.

These circulars have also reached my district, and while I know some of my constituents have not been gullible, others may fall for this propaganda. Therefore, I am taking this means of bringing this matter to their attention, so they may be duly warned against investing in any stock offered by Toronto brokers, without prior investigation. I am also requesting the Post Office Department to check into the matter to see what can be done to prevent such mail from coming into the United States.

Address by William Green

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, last night I attended a dinner meeting of a type that undoubtedly is held in great numbers throughout our Nation. A panel of distinguished persons presented their views and opinions on the Far East conflict and our international relations. At this dinner conference of the Council Against Communist Aggression, presided over by Mr. Marx Lewis, the best analysis and approach to the subject under consideration was, in my opinion, contained in the address of Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor. His message I commend to my colleagues for their consideration:

ADDRESS BY WILLIAM GREEN, PRESIDENT, AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR, AT A DINNER CONFERENCE OF THE COUNCIL AGAINST COMMUNIST AGGRESSION, WASHINGTON, D. C., APRIL 17, 1951

Today the menace of Communist imperialism presents the entire free world with a clear and immediate danger. If there was once a time when vain hopes and wishful thoughts could be safely indulged, that time is past. If we now prepare for the worst, we are not likely to be disappointed.

The first shot fired into the back of the free Republic of Korea should have sufficed to awaken the most distant and complacent of nations to an awareness of peril—if any new alarm were still required at so late a stage. That vicious attack was aimed not at one small republic only, but at the institution of human freedom itself.

Regardless of subsequent events, it will stand to the everlasting credit of this Nation that it acted with supreme courage in the face of this critical challenge to its role as the champion of liberty and international morality. In rallying the moral and material support of the United Nations to the defense of Korea, it accomplished an unprecedented feat of diplomacy. It gave renewed confidence to all who stand for freedom and decency against heavy odds elsewhere in the world.

If this brutal crime against humanity had been allowed, through our default, to find reward rather than retribution, we would be meeting here tonight in desperation rather than in hope. The moral and physical defenses of the free world would have suffered an irreparable breach. The will to resist aggression in India, in Iran, in western Europe—in every nation around the whole circumference of communism—would have been undermined.

It is well to remember that fact when these issues are drawn into the arena of partisan contention, to be reexamined in the clear light of hindsight. It is well to remember also, when tardy voices are raised in criticism of the decision which committed us to the defense of Korea, that our own freedom would have been lost long ago if it had been left in the charge of the summer soldier and sunshine patriot.

The vital questions today are concerned with the future rather than the past. The next steps are the important ones.

Honest men may disagree on what these steps should be. But all responsible citizens must surely agree that there can be no drawing back on our part at this late date in the campaign against Communist aggression.

The basic all-pervading issue today, on which there can be no disunity, is the clear and unmistakable one of survival versus extinction. To relax our efforts and to indulge the comfortable illusion that the worst might be past would be to court extinction. To concentrate our forces unwisely, or to seek refuge in grand isolation, would be to assure it.

The dangers we face are impartial and nonpartisan. Democrats and Republicans; liberals and conservatives; workers, farmers, and industrialists—all share the common risk. The chains that are forged in Moscow are designed to fit all groups and individuals, without favor or privilege. We shall all be enchained together unless we prove capable of united resistance. Out of the division and acrimony which surrounds us now, some workable basis must be found for a new popular front—a popular front against Soviet imperialism.

When the survival of freedom is finally assured, there will be time enough for the pursuit of partisan aims and ambitions. For the present, we have but too little time in which to take those necessary steps which will assure the survival of freedom—so that our normal pursuits may ultimately be resumed.

The line of battle in the fight for survival is not remote from any individual, though Korea is half a world away. It is a continuous line, extending from the front in Korea, back over the channels of communication and supply to Washington, to the factories, the farms, the shops, and the homes of America.

Our line of defense extends through the front in Korea in a continuous chain around the entire globe. Korea is but one small segment of the full arc of Communist encirclement and pressure.

The military aggression in Korea is but one of the manifold forces which the Communist conspiracy has set in motion to challenge the peace and security of the free world. Our military endeavors are no more than one phase of the general campaign which will be required to frustrate those forces.

Korea is a small part of the universal pattern of Communist aggression—a pattern which includes systematic obstructionism in the United Nations, sporadic violence in India, a Moscow-inspired civil war in Indochina, the cynical Stockholm petition campaign in the United States, sabotage in England and Western Germany, threats against Iran, the exploitation of race hatred in Asia and Africa—and all the other uses to which slander, subversion, sabotage, and civil strife lend themselves.

It is an old formula, in particularly expert hands—exploit every weakness, divide and conquer.

The constant threat of attack by the forces of communism should be apparent to all. What is not so apparent is where the next blow is likely to fall and what form it will take. We can only be sure that it will probably strike at what the Kremlin considers to be our point of greatest weakness, wherever that might be at any given time. To concentrate all our strength and attention upon any one area is to invite an attack upon other vital areas.

The issue will not be resolved by any simple means nor by any single classic military maneuver, no matter how brilliantly executed.

The enlightened defense of the free world today is the most complex task ever undertaken by man. It encompasses the entire range of human activities—political, social, economic, as well as military. The international activities of free trade-unions, the Marshall plan, the point 4 program, the Voice of America, and grain for the starving masses of Indian are as much a part of it as the North Atlantic Treaty alliance and the United Nations action in Korea. Success in any of these spheres can be more than offset by failure or neglect in another. They all involve contact with instruments and avenues of Communist expansion and aggression.

It is vain to debate the relative importance of Asia and Europe in the strategy of opposition to communism. We cannot afford to indulge the luxury of a choice between the two. Nor can we safely concentrate on any one set of weapons—military, economic, political, or moral—in this conflict. Both areas are vital and all the weapons we can muster are needed.

We must attain military superiority all along our entire line of defense. We must develop a system of working unity with all the free nations of the world, in Asia as well as Europe. We must expand our programs of economic assistance and development so as to give the masses of the world a genuine stake in freedom and to demonstrate the superiority of democracy over Communist despotism.

These primary tasks are sufficient to absorb all our energies and resources for a long time to come. They will require foresight, sacrifice, and courage of a high order.

The price is high, but no price is too great to pay for the preservation of human decency, liberty, and world peace. Our only concern must be to see that we receive full value in return for the price we pay by disposing our resources and forces in such a manner as to best contribute to the ends we seek.

American Eagle Is Dead

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, the following speaks for itself:

OBITUARY NOTICE

American eagle is dead. Long live American eagle! She died of exhaustion, caused by loss of blood resulting from the thousands of parasites sucking her lifeblood. These parasites proved fatal to American eagle.

American eagle resisted gallantly until her last breath. She fought for her life; but, the thousands of blood-sucking parasites were too much for American eagle to survive.

American eagle was done to death by parasites known as: "5 percenters," "muscle-inners," "traitors," "homosexuals," "pinkos," "sex perverts," "gangster politicos," "RFC grafters," "deep freezers," "gimmick patrioteers," "mink coaters," and thousands more parasites, of like species.

Turkey buzzard, the bird with the red beak, will be successor to American eagle.

American eagle was a faithful bird. She was 175 years old, when done to death by parasites. She always flew high. She never winked her eye.

American eagle's passing will be mourned by millions, including American soldiers, wearing the uniform of their country; and laying their lives on the line "that freedom and liberty might not perish from the earth."

This obituary notice is being sent to friends of American eagle, everywhere.

Friends will please omit flowers.

Public Speeches by Military Officers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Bradley Utters the 'Party Line'," by David Lawrence, which appeared in the Washington Star today.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRADLEY UTTERS THE "PARTY LINE"—HEAD OF JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF OUTLINES THE VIEWS ADMINISTRATION WANTS GENERALS TO PROPAGATE

(By David Lawrence)

If anything were needed to prove how uneven and unfair the Truman administration has been in trying to apply to General MacArthur its so-called rules or orders about public speeches, a reading of the speech just made by General Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, supplies that need.

For General Bradley, though disclaiming that he is making a foreign policy speech, goes on to make a speech which is identical in subject matter with the statements of General MacArthur.

General Bradley, however, utters the "party line"—the views the administration wants the generals to propagate. Presumably they are the honest convictions of General Bradley and are not affected by any fear that, if he expressed himself otherwise, he, too, might be fired.

So what America sees now is a system whereby only what the Government puts out can be spoken. There is no such thing evidently as a pro and con debate by the military men about our military situation in the world. They can only say what they are told to say. Hence much of what they do say will be discounted as political in the sense of following a "party line" and not really a military judgment on subjects on which there are obviously differences of opinion. The people will never get the truth that way.

General Bradley himself, moreover, was contradictory. After noting that the Communists in Korea were building up for another drive, he said in his speech:

"There is no assurance that even when this attack is dispelled that the war will be over."

Having, therefore, confirmed what General MacArthur has been saying—namely, that a "stalemate" is in prospect unless American troops can defend themselves against air attack by bombing the enemy bases—General Bradley goes on to say:

"If at all possible, Korea should be settled on the present battleground."

But who will assure any settlement in any place? The enemy which is building up its drive as immunity is given to its own air bases in Manchuria, or the UN forces who are compelled to stand still and take day-by-day punishment without moving forward to win a victory? What soldier ever advocated such a doctrine before to explain 60,000 casualties?

General Bradley does not seem to take account of anything the enemy may do to our troops in Korea, as most soldiers would, but simply contents himself with the statement: "Fundamentally we Americans are apt to become impatient with a situation that has no foreseeable conclusion. We all would like to know when the war in Korea will be over."

That is a masterpiece of understatement. It reflects the whole floundering viewpoint of the administration today. For General Bradley has no answer except to continue negotiation in this world-wide conflict as long as possible.

General Bradley takes his political cue directly from Mr. Truman in making the following observation:

"Enlarging the battle to a full-scale war is never an economical or morally acceptable solution to a limited conflict."

But who limits the conflict? The aggressors who are supposed to be defeated or the defenders who are supposed to stand still indefinitely?

The plain implication is that General MacArthur deliberately wants to provoke a large-scale war. There is not a word of proof to back up such an allegation. General Bradley makes a serious mistake in swallowing the political chatter of the administration when he adopts the assumption that our troops in Korea are to be attacked but not permitted to defend themselves with maximum force.

The crowning irony of General Bradley's speech is in this disclaimer:

"In outlining my thoughts on this matter, I have no intention of entering the foreign policy field or even urging a particular policy in the conduct of foreign affairs. Conduct of foreign affairs is a civilian responsibility. But a soldier can often see strategic perils that the layman might overlook."

General MacArthur, too, saw those perils. He also claimed that he was discussing not foreign policy but only military policy and its strategic perils. But he was fired because he ventured to differ. He did not know that in America freedom to speak by Government officials was accorded only to those who follow the party line.

Someday the Voice of America had better reexamine the glowing things it says about the virtues of free America and concede it is talking fiction when it says an opposition view is not suppressed in America and that purges cannot happen here.

Civilian Supremacy in Our Constitutional System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
SENATOR WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter which appeared today in the Washington Post. The letter deals with the importance of civilian supremacy in our constitutional system. It is signed by a group of distinguished American political scientists, including the President of the American Political Science Association, Professor Peter Odegard.

Mr. President, this is not a partisan document. Both Democrats and Republicans are included among the signers. For this reason I wish that all thoughtful Americans could have the privilege of reading this brief but eloquent statement.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MACARTHUR AND THE CONSTITUTION

It is General MacArthur, not President Truman, whose actions have imperiled the basis of our constitutional system. The Declaration of Independence, in listing its complaints against George III, contains these words: "He has affected to make the military independent of and superior to the civil power." That was one of the issues which made our forefathers decide to create a new Nation and organize a new system of government.

The Constitution of the United States, over whose drafting George Washington presided, declares with unmistakable clarity that the President is Commander in Chief. All military officers swear an oath of allegiance to the Constitution which automatically requires their obedience to the directives of the President. To argue for or to act upon any other view is to be subversive of the Constitution.

Policy in international relations is determined in our country by the officials whom the people elect and send to the Congress and to the White House. It is not to be determined by Army, Navy, or Air Force commanders.

This principle holds good, irrespective of the party in power for the time being. It would apply with the same force if the President were a Republican and a military field commander were a partisan of the Democrats.

Indeed, it was precisely this situation which confronted Abraham Lincoln, and he met it in precisely the same manner. To hold otherwise is to lay this Republic open to the dangers of Caesarism, and to discard twenty-five centuries of political experience in the Western World.

We, the undersigned teachers of political science, including both Republicans and Democrats, stand by this fundamental principle of democracy and of the Constitution that civilian authority must always be paramount over military authority. Considering the facts that are of public record, we think that the President, who has sworn in his oath of office to uphold the Constitution, was left with no alternative but to dismiss General MacArthur.

"Why Is My Son Fighting in Korea?"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MORGAN M. MOULDER
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. MOULDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial written and published by David Lawrence on the subject of why American boys are fighting in Korea:

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

"WHY IS MY SON IN KOREA?"

(By David Lawrence)

The mother of a boy twice wounded in Korea asks this writer: "Why is my son fighting in Korea?" The question was not a protest, but an earnest search for a definition.

American boys are fighting in Korea—

1. Because the sacrifice being made in Korea can save millions of young men now at home—the 18-year-olds, the 16-year-olds, the 12-year-olds—sparing them the necessity of fighting another world war.

2. Because from those who fought at the Marne and Chateau-Thierry, in Tunisia and at Anzio, in the Battle of the Bulge, at Midway, on New Guinea, Guadalcanal, the Philippines, Iwo Jima, and Okinawa—from those brave men there has been passed down the responsibility to preserve the American tradition for which so many of them died. This generation now is demonstrating in Korea that a great nation, untainted by the materialism of territorial ambition or the greed of conquest—having twice fought for principle and laid down its arms without a single act of selfishness toward its allies or a single act of dishonor toward its enemies—still will fight for principle and the cause of humanity.

* * * * *

4. Because an attack against free men anywhere is a menace to democracy everywhere. A readiness to meet the aggressor in Korea can deter the master of that same aggressor from precipitating a larger-scale war elsewhere.

5. Because America cannot allow the aggressor to come by sea or air or land to our shores. If aggression were to be successful in Korea, the Russian-Chinese alliance could then invade Japan and its northern islands and secure air bases for attack on nearby Alaska. If Northwest territory were threatened, so would our own Pacific coast cities soon be threatened, too.

6. Because America must mobilize her strength and not risk the defeat that can come if the whole free world is conquered and the total resources of our present allies are then appropriated by our enemy and its satellites for a final strike against us.

* * * * *

9. Because it is essential to the peace of the world that an international organization, such as the United Nations, stimulate a will to peace, and this means also a will to fight against aggression. Unhappily among our allies it has been questioned whether a shell-shocked populace can regain the will to fight. What we do in Korea can revive the fighting spirit of European peoples and demonstrate to peoples everywhere that the American will to fight for a just cause has not perished.

10. Because the American boys who fought and came home and the boys who never came back from World War I and World War II will have fought in vain if there now is a disintegration of spirit, a dissolution of the great moral purpose that guides brave men to give their lives in a noble cause.

11. Because, just as Christianity does not condone the suicide of the individual, Christianity rejects the suicide of the state—the basic fallacy of pacifism.

12. Because we are our brother's keepers and because, as we see a drowning man struggling to reach the shore, the instinct is to go to his rescue. What that instinct means to the individual, it means to a nation whose greatness today, as in the past, is still sublimated by an unselfish effort to relieve human suffering and to emancipate men, women, and children from slavery. On the battlefields of Korea our youth is saving our own democracy from its sins of materialism and its indulgences and making it strong again. And it must be strong to insure the survival of the forces of good in the world and their triumph over the age-old forces of evil.

13. Because the troops in Korea and the airmen and sailors nearby are the crusaders of our time—crusaders for justice and crusaders for the rights of freemen to live in this world free from fear, free from the perennial terror imposed upon us by evil men.

14. Because the brave youth in Korea are putting to shame those thoughtless brethren in Britain and France and even in America who begrudge the dollars and pounds they now must forego, who worship the false gods of creature comfort even as the battalions in Korea, despising such weakness, lift their faces to the next ridge with the immortal courage that makes them worthy of man's finest accolade.

"The Hundreds of Thousands of Communists Now Buried in Korea, Where Our Entire Force Numbers Less Than Enemy Fatalities, Evidence the Foolhardiness of Launching an Attack by Ground Troops Without Proper Air Coverage and Power"—Gen. Carl A. Spaatz

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, I believe the preponderance of thought of the Members of this House is that the first line of national defense is our Air Force. They furthermore believe what Joseph Stalin stated to Winston Churchill while the Battle of Stalingrad was still in progress, when he said:

The bravest of all troops are helpless if they lack adequate air protection.

Moreover, every thoughtful Member is in agreement with "Tooey" Spaatz when he said:

The hundreds of thousands of Communists now buried in Korea—where our entire strength was even less than the number of their dead—gives evidence to the foolhardiness of the Communists launching an attack by foot soldiers without proper air coverage.

The Honorable Thomas K. Finletter, Secretary of the Air Force, even in his capacity as a private citizen, has for many years been one of America's greatest exponents of maintaining an adequacy of air power for the peace and security of this Nation.

There has never been any difference of opinion whatsoever between the Secretary of the Air Force and Gen. "Tooey" Spaatz, ex-Chief of Staff, United States Air Force, whom General Eisenhower once characterized as "the world's greatest air strategist."

Secretary Finletter and "Tooey" Spaatz have worked hand-in-hand to achieve "air supremacy" for these United States—and to do so at the minimum expenditure of tax dollars.

Mr. Speaker, both Houses of Congress are now concerned with a manpower bill—and the struggle is still on with respect to the number of troops that we are to send to Europe. It seems appropriate, therefore, that I should extend my remarks and include in the RECORD the article addressed to me by my son, Rob, as published in the Air Force Magazine of April 1951—by Gen. Carl A. Spaatz, USAF, retired.

General Spaatz' article entitled "The Airpower Odds Against the Free World," freely discusses the reliance which the military is placing on the number of divisions of ground troops we are sending to Europe—with apparently little or no thought going toward building up our Air Force commensurate with the tactical and strategic strength needed to support the ground troops.

The article by General Spaatz is not alone thought-provoking—it was downright disturbing for me to read that—

In the United States, arsenal of democracy and leader of the free world, we are looking backward and groundward in our military thinking. We are more sentimental than practical in our allocation of manpower for defense, inconsistent and lagging in our scheduling of military and related equipment. We seem reluctant to profit by the military truths gained from hard-won experience in World War II, and blind to the military truths emerging from the Korean campaign. In our approach to the mission in Western Europe we may be betraying not only the youths we would draft for those battlefields but also the war-scarred people of Europe who once again live under the gun.

It is high time we face some facts and live up to them.

Our ability to win this battle and properly support our troops cannot be gaged by looking down and counting our doughboys on the ground, but only by looking up and counting the Russian planes in the air.

Most of the principals in the great debate have finally concluded that it is useless to attempt to match the Russian ground army, man for man. That is rather an obvious deduction, but still a sign of progress. In counting our airpower needs, however, our leaders are left with no alternative. They must out-match Russia in numbers of modern planes, and must build aircraft toward that goal.

To meet the Finletter Commission's survival recommendations—the airpower production needs are more than double the estimated number of aircraft that will be produced for the Air Force this year. To meet the requirements of the 95-group program—more than triple the estimated number of aircraft must be produced for the Air Force this year. To meet the requirements of an air battle with Russia is still another story.

It is because you all know "Tooey" Spaatz and Tom Finletter—know their sincere love of country and devotion to duty—that I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include in the RECORD the article published in the April issue of the Air Force Magazine, entitled, "The Airpower Odds Against the Free World."

The article reads as follows:

THE AIRPOWER ODDS AGAINST THE FREE WORLD—WE ARE LOSING THE BATTLE FOR COMMAND OF THE AIR AND PROTECTION OF OUR TROOPS IN EUROPE—WE ARE LOSING IT IN WASHINGTON—THE RESULT MAY SPELL DISASTER

(By Gen. Carl A. Spaatz, USAF, retired, chairman of the board, Air Force Association)

"The Germans were able to concentrate in this area great reserves of aviation, and in the air in the ratio of 2 to 1. We have nc' enough fighters for protection of our forces from the air. Even the bravest troops are helpless if they lack air protection."

In these words, written October 5, 1942, Marshal Stalin commented to Winston Churchill on the Battle of Stalingrad then in progress.

It has often been said that the Russians will never forget Stalingrad. It hasn't been said often enough that Stalin and Russia will never forget, as a result of Stalingrad, the helplessness of ground troops under air attack, the deficiencies in fighter aircraft, the lack of air superiority—and their meaning in modern warfare.

If Stalin and Russia need current evidence of the plight of ground troops when air superiority is lacking, they are finding it in their Korean experience. The hundreds of thousands of Communist dead in this campaign are grim testimony to the fallacy of launching a surface attack without adequate air cover. Certainly, had Stalin not had every reason to believe that the United States would not retaliate against aggression in Korea, he would hardly have become a party to this aggression. While he now permits Russia's satellite forces to be slaughtered in Korea without air protection, we can be sure he will never allow such a situation to prevail whenever his own well-trained troops might be involved. The Korean experience, it is safe to assume, has stimulated Russia's interest in air superiority to new heights.

The Russians are realists. Are we? Is the free world approaching the threat to its very existence with equal realism? In the answer lies the hope for the future of western civilization.

I must report, on the basis of the evidence available, that unless we call a halt to the present trend, shift our gears, and take off in another direction, that hope is thin indeed.

In the United States, arsenal of democracy and leader of the free world, we are looking backward and groundward in our military thinking. We are more sentimental than practical in our allocation of manpower for defense, inconsistent and lagging in our scheduling of military and related equipment. We seem reluctant to profit by the military truths gained from hard-won experience in World War II, and blind to the military truths emerging from the Korean campaign. In our approach to the mission in Western Europe we may be betraying not only the youths we would draft for those battlefields but also the war-scarred people of Europe who once again live under the gun.

It is high time we face some facts and live up to them.

We must recognize, first of all, the so-called great debate over American divisions for Europe for what it really is—more a diplomatic than a military argument. We must settle the issue with dispatch—provide the minimum divisions required to give the western powers the courage to build up their own strength—and meanwhile get on with other matters more vital in the long run to the people of Western Europe as well as to ourselves. And we must get on with them quickly, for time is running out.

There is no questioning the fact that the free world must be unified, virtually at all cost, to prevent and if necessary to combat further Russian aggression, and if this demands four more American divisions, or whatever number General Eisenhower deems necessary, on the Continent, it may well be a worthy investment. But we must not delude ourselves for a moment that these ground divisions, even if magnified in number many times, will give the powers in the Kremlin a single sleepless night.

Wall-of-flesh strategy is not the answer to our problems or to the problems of Western Europe. It is, in my opinion, the sure way to disaster. And yet, it is the prevailing philosophy in Washington today.

While our leaders are sapping their time and energy over how many ground divisions to send to Europe, over the minimum age of our new draftees, and similar problems, the only deterrent we have to Russian aggression, the only real preventive to all-out war in the world today, goes wanting for lack of adequate attention.

We have created a mental bomb shelter in the belief that our superiority in atomic weapons is the full measure of this deterrent force. It appears easy to forget that a superior atomic stockpile is useless without superior atomic bombers and without a superior air defense to help protect both the stockpile and the bombers. If we remember at all, we take final refuge in the B–36, seemingly unaware of the few B–36's we have on hand and equally unaware of their weakness in sustaining power. We seem undisturbed by the fact that Russia has the motive and the capability for producing intercontinental bombers more modern than those we are now operating, and can be counted on to produce them.

The strengthening and modernization of our own intercontinental bomber fleet must be our first military priority—come what may. Against the military requirement, we are proceeding far too slowly.

While we pursue the wall of flesh philosophy, we are losing the first and crucial battle in any possible war with Russia—the battle for command of the air.

All our responsible military commanders know that command of the air is the first priority of modern warfare. Air superiority, as a prerequisite to all military action on land or sea is inherent in the operational doctrine of all our Armed Forces.

Yet, if she so desires, Russia can command the air over Europe and Asia.

Though we have known and lived with this cold fact since the end of World War II, it becomes a startling revelation when we see it before us in cold print. Let us consider what it means. Let us think back to May 10, 1940, when Hitler began his blitzkrieg of the Low Countries and France. The Allies had 155 ground divisions in the field at that time, well trained and well prepared—for the wrong kind of war. Hitler did the job with far less ground strength (it is reported that 60 percent of the German fighting was accomplished by 10 Panzer and 5 motorized divisions) but he also had command of the air. German superiority in tanks played a major role in the campaign, and this gave new emphasis to tank warfare. Out of World War II came the military axiom that "the only answer to a tank is another tank." And yet, as was reported in the last issue of this magazine, fully 75 percent of all enemy tanks destroyed in Korea have been destroyed from the air. We must proceed cautiously with these axioms from World War II.

It should become known by one and all that the ground divisions the free world hopes to muster by the end of 1952 in Western Europe, if called upon to fight, must do their fighting without the protection that comes through command of the air. Let us consider what this might mean.

In Korea where we enjoy air superiority—at Russia's discretion, of course—our casualties number some 60,000 against hundreds of thousands of enemy casualties. And we now know that 47 percent of these enemy casualties have been attributed directly to airpower. Thus, in a situation where air superiority is not ours, we must be prepared to think of the enemy's casualty rate in Korea as our casualty rate in Western Europe, and perhaps magnified somewhat. We must consider whether the countries of Europe, already torn by the ravages of a recent war, are capable of accepting such casualties. And we must consider whether the mothers of America are prepared to accept them.

In the hands of Russia, command of the air leaves Europe naked and paralyzed, no matter how many ground divisions the free nations may be able to put in the field.

In the hands of the free world, command of the air becomes, not only war-tested insurance that ground action has a fair chance to succeed, but also an added deterrent to Russian aggression (since realistic Russia knows it cannot win without air superiority).

Yet, command of the air over Europe and Asia has been lost to the free world since the end of the last war, and will continue to be lost to it for some time to come. If there is a surer way to national suicide, in a world threatened by international bandits, I have yet to hear about it.

This is a good time to explain—as it seems so necessary to do when discussing air power these days—that air power's priority position in modern warfare in no way implies that air power can do the job alone. The American Navy, now the most powerful in the world, must be kept the most powerful in order to fulfill its important mission in any war with Russia; and the Navy can contribute to the air superiority mission, particularly in the Pacific theater. The American Army, it should go without saying, is equally vital. Let there be no mistake on these points. But we must see the three services in their proper perspective. In a war with Russia there is not, for example, the remotest chance that our ground forces can defeat the Russian Army by coming to full grips with all its divisions. The Russian Army must be strangled by the bombing of the industries behind the troops, the industries supplying them with the weapons of war. Our own ground forces, outside of some local attacks to secure specific positions, must be considered as a supporting force holding the air bases from which we pound the life out of the heart of the Russian military machine. Any other concept is, to my mind, dangerously unrealistic. War with Russia, should it come, will be decided by air power supported by surface forces, and not by surface forces supported by air power. We must recognize this relationship before it is forced upon us by the hard facts of combat.

The battle for command of the air begins, not over the battlefield, but in the White House, in Congress, in the press, on the drawing boards, and on the production lines. In these spheres of military activity (and in a democracy they are all of that) we are certainly losing the air battle to Russia.

We are losing the air battle, first, because our thinking is muddled with regard to the basic requirements, the true goals, in this battle. There is, for example, a dangerous tendency in this country to approach the question of air support for ground troops in terms of the number of ground troops to be supported. We hear, even among Air Force people, that we can provide the necessary support aviation only after we have determined how many ground divisions we will have to support. This is the type of thinking apparently being applied to the military build-up for Western Europe. Establish the ground strength available, so this reasoning goes, then slap an air umbrella of protective aircraft over the heads of the troops as they check in on the Continent—much as you issue them dungarees and mess kits—and you have created the "unified" air-ground team.

This may be the way to get the team, but it is hardly the way to keep it alive.

The air support of our ground troops, in Western Europe, in Asia, and anywhere else in the world, does not begin with the air umbrella over the battlefield. It begins at the source of trouble, the enemy's homeland, and with our only conceivable threat to that source—our strategic air power. And simultaneously it begins with the battle that will determine, in the long run, the personal fate and military contribution of both the airmen in a B–36 over Moscow and the doughboy in a foxhole in Berlin—the battle for command of the air.

Our ability to win this battle and properly support our troops can be gaged not by looking down and counting our doughboys on the ground, but only by looking up and counting the Russian planes in the air.

Most of the principals in the "great debate" have finally concluded that it is useless to attempt to match the Russian ground army, man for man. That is rather an obvious deduction, but still a sign of progress. In counting our air-power needs, however, our leaders are left with no alternative. They must outmatch Russia in numbers of modern planes, and must build aircraft toward that goal.

The current furor over how many divisions for Europe, from a military standpoint at least, is not the primary point to be argued. Whether we send 4 or 400 divisions to Europe, we must first build and maintain air strength capable of mastering the air strength of Russia. Without this mastery, Western Europe becomes a huge trap for our soldiers and for the soldiers of all the free nations. Without it, our mobilization efforts and mobilization dollars will be wasted.

In our preparation for the battle to command the air we can find little refuge in our stockpile of planes in storage from World War II. Only a few of the light bombers now in mothballs might be utilized in this battle and they will not be adequate much longer. This part of the air-power job calls primarily for fighter aircraft and the thousands of reciprocating fighters we have in mothballs will be useless. This will be a job for jets because Russia has them by the thousands.

An evaluation of our position in an air battle for Western Europe must begin with a comparison of our jet-fighter strength and that of Russia. We can eliminate from the figuring our jet fighters which must be held in Korea or in other parts of the world, depending on the situation of the moment, and those we must hold in North America for the air defense of our homeland, and we cannot depend for several years at least on other nations of the Atlantic Pact providing us with many jet fighters for the air battle. The few jets our allies will be able to produce, even under the best conditions, will be sorely needed for their own local air defense. Great Britain especially will need all the jets she can produce and then some for the defense of her own shores, within which lies some of the free world's most important air bases.

There are many other factors, of course. Quality of equipment and quality of manpower are two important ones, and in neither of these categories should we sell Russia short. As the engineering battle rages today behind the scenes for command of the air, we can find little solace in the knowledge that Russia is building her jet-fighter fleet with the help of and from the designs of some of the world's greatest fighter-plane experts—the German scientists and technicians she obtained as booty from World War II. They put the first combat jets in the air and in 1944 were at least 5 years ahead of the rest of the world in jet-fighter development. Perhaps we have overcome this technological lead, but it would be faulty military thinking of the first order to depend and plan on it. As for the Russian airmen, we know enough about them to judge them with respect; our superiority in this field, if one exists, must not be overemphasized in our planning. All in all, we can presume—but not count too heavily on—a qualitative edge in this battle for command of the air, and this is more than outweighed by Russia's vast quantitative superiority.

The problem resolves itself, of course, on the production lines of America. Here it becomes evident that as a nation we are not taking our own best advice or even meeting our own production programs, much less matching Russia's output.

With the billions appropriated for the military, it is hard to believe that we are not building an air force of the strength recommended as far back as 1948 by the President's Air Policy (Finletter) Commission as a minimum requirement for survival in the air age. It is even harder to believe when we realize that this committee's report preceded evidence of Russia's atomic developments, the Berlin airlift and the war in Korea. And yet, the fact is that we are not measuring up even to this survival program.

True, it has been announced that we are shooting for a 95-group air force by the end of 1952. And the President has announced that we will increase our aircraft production five times by the end of 1951. But let us weigh announced production objectives against production line facts.

Jet engines are the key to our air-power production effort. Shortly after the President's announcement, a leading engine manufacturer stated bluntly that we could do no better than triple our aircraft production by the end of 1951. At the current rate of expansion programing, we will be fortunate to achieve two and a half times the production rate in 1951, and again in 1952.

Our 95-group program is moving slower than planned. We cannot possibly realize it by mid-1952. And even if we could, this program would not equal in numbers of planes or in sustained striking power the 70-group air force recommended by the Finletter Commission. The reason, of course, is that the Commission's program calls for sizable aircraft and manpower reserve—all told, an air force totaling 97 groups, including 27 in the Air National Guard, all equipped, trained, and ready for immediate action in the event of war, plus 34 adequately equipped groups in the Air Force Reserve. The 95-group program, which will absorb virtually all organized Air Reserve and Air Guard groups available, obviously does not call for such reserve strength.

By pulling planes out of mothballs we would have enough aircraft to equip, in numbers, a 95-group air force by the end of 1952. But this would be providing an air force half equipped with obsolescent planes. And we would still be faced with the basic problem of providing by that time sufficient trained personnel.

In terms of the modern planes needed to match Russia in the air—the only terms worthy of consideration—we are building the equivalent of a 50-group air force through 1952.

What are our air-power production needs? To meet the Finletter Commission's survival recommendations—more than double the estimated number of aircraft that will be produced for the Air Force this year. To meet the requirements of the 95-group program—more than triple the estimated number of aircraft to be produced for the Air Force this year. To meet the requirements of an air battle with Russia is another story.

But this is the only story that holds the key to command of the air and, therefore, to the defense of Western Europe. And it is the only story that counts for our ground troops who, however brave, as Russia learned at Stalingrad, "are helpless without air protection."

That we are not preparing to give our troops, and those of the other free nations, even the minimum air protection they deserve, by all the rules of modern war, is apparent in the production deficiencies now staring us in the face.

The air-power odds we have created and continue to create against the ground forces being built up for the defense of Western Europe are nothing short of appalling. From the best available published figures, it can be concluded that in numbers of front-line modern aircraft available for an air battle over Western Europe today, Russia holds at least a 10 to 1 margin; and on the basis of our present production tempo, even if we assume no increase in Russia's current air strength (an implausible assumption used only to emphasize our own position) it can likewise be concluded that the free world will still be on the short end of at least a 5 to 1 margin in Western Europe at the end of 1952. And even this doesn't reveal the true measure of Russia's air superiority in Western Europe, for we must assume that her air strength includes, in addition to front-line aircraft all crews that qualify for such an air battle, and a reserve of planes and crews, also qualifying, as replacements against combat attrition. By the very nature of our air-power buildup, such reserve strength cannot be assumed, under present programing for our own Air Force.

Let us think for the moment of only the front-line odds, of what it means to be outnumbered 10 to 1 or 5 to 1 or even 2 to 1 (as Russia was outnumbered at Stalingrad) in a struggle for command of the air. Think of what it might mean to our troops down below, to the tide of battle in Western Europe, to the whole war effort of the free world.

In these air-power odds against us, we find the cold, hard facts of modern war, of inadequate mobilization—of potential disaster.

There can be no more fiddling with our air power. With wisdom and courage we must strive for command of the air. It may not yet be too late, and whether it is or not, we have no alternative but to go after it. We must not deviate from our goal. We must use all the skills and tools necessary for the job. And we must conquer, at the very outset, the one real barrier that faces us. Before we can broaden our mobilization base to achieve command of the air, we must first broaden our mobilization thinking. This is the crucial step in the air battle, and we must take it today.

The MacArthur Incident

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM C. LANTAFF
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. LANTAFF. Mr. Speaker, one of the most distinguished and respected columnists in America, Jack Bell, of the Miami Herald, has just written a brilliant, sensible analysis of the MacArthur incident. I urge every Member of the House of Representatives to read this article and to especially note the admonition of this eminent journalist that humanity and world peace must be placed ahead of partisan politics.

The article follows:

THE TOWN CRIER
(By Jack Bell)

Our President has fired Gen. Douglas MacArthur. It had to be. The aging MacArthur who has made his own rules in the Far East for a long, long time had to go or the United States had to scrap the United Nations.

MacArthur was supreme military commander for United Nations. All my Army life—and I've had my share of it—I've heard them say, "As a military man it isn't my duty to shape the policy. My job is to carry out the orders of the State Department and the President."

General MacArthur has gone far beyond that. He openly criticized our State Department, as well as France, England, and other United Nations governments with troops in action in Korea.

More than once, at first surreptitiously then openly, MacArthur has demanded that our Navy be used to ferry Chiang Kai-shek's troops from Formosa to an invasion of southeast China; even when he knew the diplomatic corps felt that would lead to a general war in the Far East.

As a military government ruler in postwar Japan, MacArthur seems to have done a fine job. As a field general or battle strategist, he has shown very little. In World War II we can understand he hadn't the men or equipment to stop superior Jap forces, and that ultimate defeat of the Japs was largely a naval task. But in Korea, MacArthur's tactical mistakes have been obvious, tragic, and too well known to escape censure.

I can understand MacArthur's wishes. He is a soldier, and he realizes the impossibility of defeating the enemy with the men and tactics at hand. In the soldier's code, any war should be all-out war, and that is what he demanded. Our President and leaders of other United Nations governments are working on the premise that all-out war should come only when every possible alternative has failed.

WORLD IS THE STAKE

It has been obvious for some weeks that other United Nations governments were not going along with this all-out war policy. So President Truman, although I believe he agrees with them, virtually had to demote MacArthur or withdraw from United Nations. It is inconceivable that the United States is going alone into a general war with China, which, in fact, means China with Russia as a supply base.

As for the United States political aspects of the MacArthur removal, they make me ill. American troops are dying. American young men are going into service by the hundreds of thousands. Our Nation, our world, is the stake.

And the Republicans rise up and yell en masse. The Democrats pretty firmly support the President. The writers in Washington get the political aspects into the first paragraph of their stories.

Can it be possible that all Republican leaders really want an all-out war with MacArthur in command, or do they think this will help them in the election? And do the Democrats all feel this was the only move, or are they fearful it will help kick them out of office? Is no one in Washington thinking of humanity first, world peace rather than election to office?

Don't forget, in the meantime, that MacArthur has been replaced by a great soldier, a thorough gentleman, a true American, and, I'm sure, a pretty shrewd diplomat. I predict a great change for the better in the Far East diplomatic friendliness toward this Nation. And God knows we can use some.

A Golden Opportunity for General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

SENATOR WILLIAM BENTON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "A Golden Opportunity for General MacArthur," by Anne O'Hare McCormick, published in the New York Times this morning. In this article, Mrs. McCormick shows her customary brilliant insight in her advice to our great returning soldier.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ABROAD

(By Anne O'Hare McCormick)

A GOLDEN OPPORTUNITY FOR GENERAL MACARTHUR

It seems impossible for Americans to talk about anything but General MacArthur, and his triumphant homecoming adds to the general absorption in a single theme. This is an extreme example of the familiar phenomenon that the public cannot get excited over more than one sensation at a time. Other events on the world scene are just as importunate as they were, but they fade into the background like figures on a stage when the lights focus on one spot. In this case the appearance of the general in person steals the light from the political conflict that rages around him and fixes it on the soldier. As he emerges from the clouds of distance and controversy and steps on the home ground he is not so much a burning issue, or the commander relieved of his posts, as he is the conquering hero returning from the wars amid the plaudits of his countrymen.

The all-American welcome is to the great captain of the Pacific campaign. The President has done his part in accenting the soldier's role by clearing the way for a demonstration in the capital and canceling a speech he was to have delivered on Thursday to the American Society of Newspaper Editors in order not to detract from MacArthur's Day.

SIGN OF CONTRADICTION

There are many anxious Americans who wish that the general could hold that note. He comes home to a country rent by angers and dissensions and frustrations. He comes at a moment of crisis when the defense of the free world rests mainly on the United States. The people he has not seen for fourteen years have changed in the interval; they are at once more mature, sobered by the knowledge of what they have to do, and more uncertain, confused about how the heavy task is to be accomplished. Between conflicting counsels at home and pulls and tugs from abroad—all inspired by the same hopes and fears—they are in danger of losing the sense of direction, and the sense of proportion, which will determine the course of many nations besides our own.

General MacArthur comes as a sign of this contradiction. He can add to the confusion and uncertainty. The circumstances of his recall and the time of his return make him the storm center of differences wider than divergences on war policy, and pettier and more partisan than a great Nation, ready to respond to clear and confident leadership, can afford to indulge in at an hour when it must make national and international decisions of crucial importance. He can easily become the means of aggravating these differences, the shiny new instrument of a stale party opposition that works to weaken a policy the majority of Americans have supported at every test vote, and undermine our position in the world.

General MacArthur could do something else. He has not spoken since he was relieved of his commands, and what he intends to say in addressing Congress and the Nation in Washington tomorrow is still a matter of guesswork. He may defend his own course or he may speak in general terms and wait until later to expound the views in regard to Korea and China which put the commander in the field in open opposition to the policy of the United States and the United Nations.

But as a student of history and a lover of drama what an opportunity he has to make history and drama on the grand scale. He has the power to turn the present anticlimax into the climax of a brilliant career. A high American official of the United Nations, developing this theme a day or two ago, grew eloquent in pointing out the electrifying effect it would have if the General could bring himself to say that nothing mattered so much as American unity in the face of danger—neither the President nor himself, neither Republican nor Democratic political strategy, neither personal ambition nor personal grievance. "What an occasion it would be," said this official, "if MacArthur confounded his critics by refusing to be the storm center of debate and becoming the rallying point for national unity."

Such a course would confound the general's supporters as well as his critics. It seems a little beyond the bounds of probability and human nature. The debate on foreign policy, which now involves preparation for peace or war, is likely to go on, whether or not MacArthur allows himself to be used as the Big Stick for the Republicans who want to stop the fighting in Korea one day and extend it to China the next.

THE GREATEST SERVICE

The point is, however, and it will doubtless become clear to the general as he hears at close range the true voice of America, that the country as a whole is already unified behind the policies we are now pursuing. The doubts and confusions of today are not on the central issue of who or where the main adversary is and what we have to do first to save ourselves and a world in which it is possible for free men to live. The misgivings are on the competence of our political leaders, on how to end the Korean stalemate, how to deal with the irritations that are inevitable in partnerships between unequal allies. The problem today is to reunify the people around a policy which has already been accepted because there is no viable alternative.

We are where we are for lack of another place to go, another line to follow. The need is not for debate but for a clear restatement of the principles and limitations which dictate our policy. General MacArthur could perform the greatest of all his services to the country by recognizing these inevitables and persuading admirers to follow him.

Famine in India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLINTON P. ANDERSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Christian Science Monitor entitled "Making Communists," and an editorial from the Washington Post entitled "A Race With Death," both of which were reprinted as a public service by the International Latex Corp., of Dover, Del., in the Washington Post on April 10, 1951.

These editorials point out that our continued failure to relieve the impending famine in India is a serious blow to our moral position throughout the world in the struggle with communism.

In reprinting these excellent editorials the International Latex Corp. has again performed a public service by calling attention to the urgency of a pressing world problem.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAKING COMMUNISTS

(An editorial in the Christian Science Monitor)

Some Members of Congress who, on paper, are most passionate anti-Communists have found an extremely effective way of making Communists. It is to let 100,000,000 people in India go hungry while Americans sit tightly and comfortably on a stored surplus of wheat amounting to several times the famine need in that land.

Congress has had before it since February 12 a recommendation to give India a needed 2,000,000 tons of grain besides the roughly 2,000,000 tons that nation is buying in the United States and 2,000,000 tons it is buying elsewhere.

Meanwhile, a great deal is said in many quarters about convincing the rest of the world of the advantages of democracy and free enterprise, about "selling" capitalism instead of communism.

In the State of Bihar in India the grain ration has been reduced below nine ounces a day and is considered less than enough to assure survival for long of those who depend on the ration alone. Relief of such conditions takes weeks even after shipment of grain is authorized, and other provinces are approaching similar distress.

In such circumstances discussion of ideologies becomes academic, but Communist incitement and agitation thrive. So great an American as Senator Borah, an authority on the United States Constitution and its importance, said in 1934, "The people can't eat the Constitution."

The people of India cannot satisfyingly fill their stomachs with preachments on freedom and opportunity if they have not the opportunity to eat. It rests with the Rules Committee of the House of Representatives to put on the Legislative Calendar a bill which would give them a little nourishing evidence of the free world's efficiency and its interest in their fate.

A RACE WITH DEATH

(An editorial in the Washington Post)

It is not pretty to watch Congress dawdle while the specter of famine hovers over India. Even if legislators act with all possible speed to approve the bill giving India 2,000,000 tons of grain, it will be a close race. The grain must be sent to ports, and ships must be broken out of storage; it has been impossible to keep them ready on a standby basis. Yet unless grain is in Indian hands by June, a breakdown in the rationing system is likely; already the people are on a 9-ounce minimum ration, and even this is not available in some areas. President Truman, in his request to Congress in February, put April 1 as the deadline for delivery of the first million tons.

The depressing part of the affair is that it has become confused with all sorts of side issues. First, objections were cited to Prime Minister Nehru's attitude on Korea; then there was talk of making the grain a loan, although India is in no shape to repay it; then India's embargo on certain strategic materials—monazite and beryl—became a stumbling block. This newspaper believes, as respects the latter point, that the American position on access to strategic materials ought to be made quite plain. But none of these factors is reason to deny or delay the grain. It is not in the American tradition, when a stricken person asks for food, to demand to know first how he voted in the last election.

As the Washington Federation of Churches has pointed out in a letter to Speaker RAYBURN, indifference to starvation is "an evil not to be tolerated by Christian conscience." Help now would be "a merciful weapon in our struggle against communism" and would "do much to heal the widening rift between this country and India." Yet while Congress dallies, Russia has made propaganda by offering to sell India 50,000 tons of wheat, and Communist China—itself faced with starvation in many areas—has capitalized on the American delay by offering a million tons of rice. They are doubtless phony offers, both of them; but they make good propaganda, and are pathetic illustrations of India's desperation.

There is reason to believe that the House Rules Committee, which has been sitting on the bill, will report it out when Speaker RAYBURN believes he has the votes to pass it. The test cannot be put off longer, and we cannot believe that if the issue is placed squarely before House Members, they will turn it down. This country would be harmed as much as India if Congress should turn its back on both a moral obligation to humanity and the opportunity to strike a blow in behalf of stability in India.

Let's Count a Few Noses

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER NORBLAD
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. NORBLAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include herewith an editorial by Mr. King Cady in the Newberg (Oreg.) Graphic:

LET'S COUNT A FEW NOSES

As the great debate still surges across the country it appears that in Washington, at least, some of the fine-feathered pronunciamentos are beginning to hatch out a few brass tacks.

A principal area of contention which recently has become specific is whether or not we should send additional divisions to Europe, and if so, how many.

Senator TAFT is leader of a congressional group which believes that some European nations are only half-heartedly preparing to defend themselves, and that the United States should have certain guaranties—i. e., divisions in being—before we dispatch additional troops.

Administration spokesmen, on the other hand, contend that all European nations are proceeding satisfactorily to organize defense forces, and that no limit should be placed on the number of divisions to be sent overseas.

The question that immediately arises is: Who is talking through what hat? Obviously, both sides cannot be right.

Although the Graphic is far from convinced that additional United States divisions are necessary, or even wise, in Europe, the attitude of the various United Nations members toward stopping Soviet imperialism seems painfully apparent in the present Korean war.

Recently the Graphic wrote Representative WALTER NORBLAD, of the First Oregon Congressional District, and asked him to obtain actual percentages of each of the United Nations in the Korean theater. Mr. NORBLAD secured the information from Secretary of Defense George Marshall, pertinent extracts of whose letter are quoted below:

"The United States Army, in furnishing the preponderance of men and munitions in the action in Korea, has contributed 43 percent of the ground force personnel; the Republic of Korea, about 43 percent; Great Britain, over 3½ percent; and Turkey, 1½ percent. (Eight other) nations * * * furnished under 1 percent (each) of the ground forces. * * *

"The United States Navy is providing 85 percent of the naval strength now operating in Korean waters. * * *

"The United States Air Force is furnishing * * * 95 percent (of the aircraft)."

It is apparent from Secretary Marshall's figures that, aside from the South Koreans, Uncle Sam is carrying the great bulk of the load.

Although the allied members of the United Nations have voted both Red Korea and Red China to be armed aggressors, it does not appear that they are in any great hurry to back up their judgments with fighting men. Such forces as they have sent to Korea are purely token forces useful for securing a voice at the conference table after the blood has been shed.

Although it must be assumed that the European nations would be far more willing to raise divisions for the defense of their homelands than for close-in fighting in a far-off Asiatic country, it does not seem amiss to ask, Exactly how many divisions actually have been raised?

Before Harry S. Truman is given a blank check to disperse America's fighting men over the face of the earth, we should require a few specific answers to that question.

Dangers of Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD A. GARMATZ
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. GARMATZ. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert in the RECORD a letter I have received from the Maryland Action Guild, a group of Catholic men pledged to fight communism, and a resolution adopted by them at their meeting on Monday night. I am bringing this to the attention of the Members, so they may realize that many of our citizens are aware of the terrible danger of communism and are actively working to fight it.

The letter follows:

MARYLAND ACTION GUILD,
Baltimore, Md., April 17, 1951.

Hon. EDWARD A. GARMATZ,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN GARMATZ: Enclosed you will find a copy of a resolution which was adopted at a meeting of our membership, with about 400 present, on April 16, 1951.

Read this resolution and give it your most earnest consideration. We are gravely concerned that there are indications that our Government is actually considering a negotiated peace which involves the handing over of Korea and Formosa to the Reds, and the recognition of Red China in the United Nations.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE D. O'NEILL,
Chairman.

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY MEMBERS OF THE MARYLAND ACTION GUILD, MEETING AT ST. IGNATIUS HALL, APRIL 16, 1951

Be it resolved, That every member of the Maryland delegation to the United States Congress be advised of our earnest desire that he do everything in his power to insure—

1. That the United States Government will not permit the present, or any other, Communist Government of China to have any voice, directly or indirectly, in the shaping of the peace treaty which will determine the fate of the Japanese people.

2. That the United States Government will not give its assent, tacitly or otherwise, to any agreement or arrangement whereby the present, or any other, Communist Government of China will acquire any control of, or jurisdiction over, Formosa.

3. That the United States Government will not grant any recognition to the present, or any other, Communist Government of China.

4. That the United States Government will resist any effort to install a Communist delegation in China's place on the Security Council of the United Nations, even, if necessary, invoking for that purpose the veto power of the United States.

Asia Military Policies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Gun Jumped on MacArthur," by Constantine Brown, published in the Washington Evening Star today.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GUN JUMPED ON MACARTHUR—HEAVY HAND OF DIPLOMATS IS RECOGNIZED BEHIND BRADLEY'S SPEECH ON ASIA MILITARY POLICY

(By Constantine Brown)

Before General MacArthur had an opportunity to speak to the American people in his address to Congress tomorrow the administration jumped the gun.

In a speech in Chicago the soldier's soldier, General Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, attempted to steal the former supreme commander's thunder by stating—without mentioning General MacArthur's name—that Asia military policies advocated by some would jeopardize world peace.

General Bradley is recognized by all as a first-class field commander. He is a well-disciplined soldier who obeys without murmur the orders of his superiors. During the bitter argument which brought about the dismissal of Admiral Louis Denfeld, Chief of Naval Operations in 1949, he toed the line indicated by his civilian superior, Defense Secretary Johnson. He denounced the plans for a strong naval air arm and for an increase in the Marine Corps and described the advocates of strengthening those branches as Fancy Dans.

General Bradley's speech was cleared by the White House and the State Department. Those familiar with the views and the style of the latter can see the heavy hand of our diplomats in General Bradley's exposé of our objectives in Korea. The five-star general summed them up as follows:

"1. Protect and maintain our form of government and our way of life against any challenge."

These are magnificent words. But from the practical point of view we did not have to go to Korea, nearly 8,000 miles away, to do so. We went to Korea, ideologically, to repel aggression. Practically, however we went there to prevent the Communists from gaining a vitally important, strategic objective which would have been a dagger pointed at the heart of Japan, where we had four occupation divisions.

President Truman ordered the sending of forces to Korea before the United Nations concurred. Of course, he knew that that organization would not oppose such a step once our Government decided on it, particularly since it was obvious that we would bear the brunt of the campaign.

The "police action," as President Truman described it at that time, had little to do with the "protection of our form of Government and life." If Korea had not been vitally important from the strategic point of view we may have acted as we did in the case of other Russian ravaged nations—deplore it but do nothing about it.

2. Gen. Bradley stated—and once more the heavy hand of the State Department becomes apparent—that in Korea "we seek peace by every means at our command, but there will be only one price we won't pay—appeasement."

We have sought peace in Korea for several months. The State Department was disposed to accept the humiliating terms provided by the United Nations truce team and by the Arab-Asian bloc. These approaches were not dignified by even an answer from the Peiping government. General MacArthur, who now is accused of jumping the gun on the State Department when he asked the Red leaders to hoist the flag of truce or accept dire consequences, was honored with a negative answer by his enemies.

Since that time the British have been active in attempts to settle the Korean problem. The terms are well-known now: The Chinese Communists are to be a party to writing a Japanese peace treaty: Formosa is to be handed over to the Peiping puppets. If that is not appeasement, what is it?

It is true that the State Department has turned down this British proposal as unacceptable. It is difficult to conceive how else Secretary of State Acheson could have acted, considering the high tension which exists throughout this country over our Asiatic policies.

3. The third bromide incorporated in General Bradley's speech by the State Department writers was that our objective in Korea was "to assure peace not only for ourselves but for all other nations. For this reason we support the United Nations."

The latter sentence is true, insofar as we are concerned. But there is little noticeable support for us in that organization. Britain's late Prime Minister, Neville Chamberlain, spoke in a similar vein after his triumphal return from Munich. People believed then that appeasement was conducive to peace, regardless of what happened to the little fellows at whose expense the appeasement was made.

General Bradley also stated that the use the Reds have made of their air bases in Manchuria to date has not warranted United Nations bombing of them. This is somewhat of a misconstruction of General MacArthur's recommendations.

The former supreme Allied commander urged the bombing not of Red air bases but of their military installations and lines of communication in Manchuria, whence they supply their fighting forces with reinforcements and equipment. And that is an entirely different thing from the use of their air bases, which are of only relative importance.

Truman's Dumbest Act, His View

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave previously granted me, I should like to have inserted in the RECORD, a letter by Mr. J. Webb Saffold, of Cleveland, Ohio, which appeared in the Cleveland News on Monday, April 16, 1951:

TRUMAN'S DUMBEST ACT, HIS VIEW

To the EDITOR OF THE NEWS:

SIR: The real reason that Truman fired MacArthur is that the American general refused to lose the war in Korea to the Communists.

His accusers say that he overstepped the bounds and so should be removed.

What bounds?

Who laid them down?

You should know by now—the Kremlin laid them down through our State Department, or is it theirs? The Reds set out to get MacArthur 2 years ago (according to Louis Budenz) because he was the last obstacle to their taking over all of Asia. Dean Acheson wins again and the Red tide rolls on.

This typically Truman act was the dumbest of all the dumb things that Truman has done while encumbering the high office of President for three reasons.

First, the people of America realize that MacArthur knows more about the Far East than all the other top military brass put together, and, while they are under Truman's thumb, MacArthur is not.

The people trust MacArthur and they do not trust Truman and Acheson.

Second, kicking MacArthur out is the hardest blow to the morale of our 250,000 boys fighting and dying in Korea, as well as the troops of all the other nations standing with them in the freezing mud under the pale blue and white banner of the UN.

Third, it is a terrible blow to the Japanese people, who trusted MacArthur as they have never trusted any other westerner. They now feel that the Communist hordes are closing in around them and that no one will stop the Red flood. That puts in jeopardy all the billions we have poured into Japan since World War II, and all of the blood of our 50,000 dead, wounded, and missing in Korea.

By this act, "Pendergast Harry" impeaches himself, because the Truman administration is corrupt and pro-Communist and has been since the very start, and it grows worse with every passing hour. Now the whole rotten record must be paraded before the American people in full detail so they can read between the lines and remember it forever.

It is the most perfidious record of any administration in the entire history of our great Nation. The New Deal-Fair Deal-"Snare Deal" has sold us out from Yalta to Tehran and from Tehran to Potsdam, and from Potsdam to the scuttling of China to the Reds by Acheson and Marshall, backed by Truman; on down to the war in Korea, which would have been avoided but for the betrayal in China. And now we have the firing of MacArthur to complete the tragedy.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

It is all one continuous trail of treason and corruption with more thousands being added to the Government payroll already staggering under a burden of gold bricks who draw your money and do nothing but draw it.

This racket is being perpetrated upon you to build up the payroll vote for the election of 1952 to try to continue in power an administration that is already licked, but which is spending our Nation into bankruptcy on the Lenin plan which underlies the Brannan plan and all the other plans peddled to you by innocuous names at your expense by the Socialistic sell-out on the Potomac.

You must know by this time that the State Department has functioned more as an arm of the Kremlin than a department in the United States Government.

We cannot win the war against communism with that kind of leadership.

We cannot prevent world war III by winning or losing military stalemates in Korea, or by putting up just enough opposition to lose the world to communism in the foreseeable future. The will-o'-the-wisp of a negotiated peace is the bait that you are supposed to take to continue this losing battle.

Our only hope is to change the leadership—and MacArthur should be able to help us clean house in Washington.

J. WEBB SAFFOLD.

Republicans and MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the appended editorial from the New York Herald Tribune of Wednesday, April 18, is well worth the consideration of every Member. It presents an enlightened and objective analysis of a situation which could develop such divisiveness and partisan strife as to seriously affect the national interest in a time of great emergency.

The editorial follows:

REPUBLICANS AND MACARTHUR

The return of General MacArthur to this country presents the Republican Party with an issue which it can legitimately exploit to its great advantage. At the same time it confronts the party with dangerous temptations. Upon the way the Republican leadership acts in these crucial days depends in no small measure the whole political line-up for 1952. The degree of discernment and statesmanship it shows will determine whether it is to be an unbeatable force or profoundly divided and demoralized.

The sudden dismissal of MacArthur brings into dramatic focus the lack of direction and the confusion of policy which have characterized the administration throughout the conduct of the Korean hostilities. Neither President Truman nor his aides made clear to the country the objectives of our fighting or the outlines of a settlement. In addresses since the general's recall the President has, it is true, thrown light upon the general situation. But he did this tardily, after the crisis between Washington and Tokyo had become insoluble except by the most drastic means; meanwhile a vacuum had been allowed to exist. MacArthur was thus inclined to supply the missing leadership. Truman's final act in removing MacArthur was unavoidable; but that the situation should have been permitted to deteriorate to this point was not unavoidable by any means. On this score the administration bears heavy blame, and the opposition has a chance to bring it home to the whole country.

The opposition, besides, has the opportunity, as well as the obligation, to see that General MacArthur is given a hearing in secret committee as well as before the Congress. It is more than likely that a full airing of our conduct of the Korean War and of our far-eastern policy will reveal much that is damaging to the administration. Matters will be brought to a head, and the Republicans will be lacking in political sagacity and resourcefulness if they do not press their advantage.

There are limits, however, beyond which the Republican Party can go only at risk of creating deep divisions within its ranks and of stirring up a strongly adverse reaction among the public. Those limits were exceeded by the irresponsible cries for the President's impeachment—now happily subsided. They will be exceeded if the party adopts General MacArthur as its spokesman on foreign affairs, follows after him blindly, and tries to elevate him into a political force. It is one thing for the party to maintain that our policy in Asia could have been pursued more effectively; it would be another, and infinitely dangerous, thing to identify itself with the idea that Europe is to be sacrificed in an attempt to win a decision against communism by general warfare in the east. There is, we believe, no real sentiment for this view in the country, and there is none in the Republican Party, except among a small minority of extremists. Against these extremists the Republicans must now be on guard. For they have the power to darken as hopeful a future as the party has ever faced.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, having introduced the first bill providing for the creation of the RFC, and having fought for its enactment, I endeavored to get the floor to congratulate the President on the appointment of Mr. Stuart Symington as the Director of this great Government agency and to set forth some important facts concerning its operation, in view of the unwarranted criticism and attacks made recently and the talk about abolishing the agency.

Consequently, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

I hope you Members who have the interest of the small-business man and the country at heart, and want the real facts about the operation of the RFC from its beginning, the loans made, the losses taken, the profits made, will read my remarks.

During the last few weeks a great deal of publicity and criticism has been leveled at the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The charge has been made that influence was used to obtain favorable action for certain applicants for loans. Later on it was brought out that many Members of Congress had also asked favorable consideration for applicants. I venture to say that there is not a Member of Congress, either in the House or Senate, who has not been importuned, at one time or another, to obtain aid and to urge speedier action on applications filed by constituents or firms in his district or State, and this is entirely natural as part of the duties of a representative of the people. I know the investigation now under way of the letters written by Members of the Congress to the members of the Board in behalf of their constituents will disclose nothing improper. Of course, there is no doubt but that many people have also, in desperation, turned to the White House for aid. There is nothing strange in that. What I have been interested in for years is that loans should be made, and that is why I proposed the creation of such a lending agency in the Government years ago.

I admit that some loans were made that received a great deal of critical publicity, such as the Lustron loan. It must be kept in mind, however, that at the time this loan was made there was a very great and serious demand by the people of the Nation for low-cost housing and it was felt this firm could provide this much-needed housing and at low cost, which unfortunately miscarried.

But let us take up the history of the RFC from the very beginning. When the great crash descended upon the Nation in 1929, during the Hoover Republican administration, and thousands of small-business men and manufacturers found themselves faced with bankruptcy and the complete closing of their plants, I prepared and introduced a bill, H. R. 5116, in the Seventy-second Congress, in 1931, providing for the creation of a National Relief Finance Corporation to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States. Unfortunately I was unable to convince a majority of the members of the Banking and Currency Committee, who, under the influence of Mr. Ogden Mills, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury under Republican President Hoover, took the position that my bill went too far and that it should wait until the following year, which was a Presidential election year. However, in the meantime, the Republicans submitted their own bill, which was approved by the committee and passed by the House. President Hoover vetoed the original bill, insisting that a provision be inserted that no loans be granted to municipalities or States unless such loans were for self-liquidating projects, which denied to the municipalities and States the opportunity to proceed with their plans to provide employment by building many necessary facilities. The bill was amended and finally passed, becoming effective January 22, 1932.

President Hoover then appointed Charles G. Dawes, Republican Vice President under Coolidge, of Chicago, as the first president of the Corporation. It is significant that one of the first loans made under the act was to the Central Bank & Trust Co., of Chicago, Mr. Dawes own bank, in the amount of $85,000,000. While this and other huge loans were made to banks and financial institutions and helped save many of them from complete collapse, it had also been agreed that aid would be given to the thousands of smaller banks throughout the country that were caught in the crash, but this the banker representatives on the Board failed to do. Mr. Dawes resigned as head of RFC when the loan to his bank was consummated. Shortly after his departure Jesse Jones became Chairman.

Mr. Jones, who was appointed by President Hoover as a Democratic member of the Board and naturally was made chairman following Mr. Dawes departure, together with his banker friends, unfortunately, completely controlled and dominated the RFC. He and his brothers and nephews exercised vast control over banks, hotels, apartment houses, and business institutions upon which loans were made by the Corporation. He was the Board.

I read with amazement that Mr. Jones is now advocating the abolition of the RFC. Is he fearful that the new chairman, Mr. Symington, will follow the same selfish methods that he, Jones, employed while directing the RFC by appointing his relatives as receivers and trustees of properties upon which loans are made?

In the early years of operation very little consideration was given to the needs of small business. However, huge loans were made to the great life insurance companies, nearly all of which were insolvent, and to the railroads, and big business which had been milked dry by the promoters and stock-market operators. The Government had to bail them out through RFC. Small business received no help whatever.

With the inauguration of President Franklin D. Roosevelt the picture began to change. The act was amended in 1935 to include aid to small business. I shall dwell a little more in detail on this later in my remarks. I should like to call your attention now to the following summary of loan activity of the RFC and its subsidiaries from the date of its incorporation to December 31, 1950, as compiled by the Corporation:

Reconstruction Finance Corporation and subsidiaries—Summary of loan activity from dates of incorporation through Dec. 31, 1950

[3] Exclusive of provisions of $59,374,949 and $5,737,061 for estimated losses in collection of direct and deferred participation loans, respectively, outstanding at Dec. 31, 1950.

You will note from this summary the tremendous volume of loans made to financial institutions and railroads. The railroad loans average almost $4,000,000 each, while those to financial institutions average well over $1,500,000. To the credit of the RFC you will note that on a total of slightly more than $14,500,000,000 disbursed during all of these years, only $134,000,000 has been charged off as loss, which represents a loss of about 1 percent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention to another compilation prepared by the RFC, which is a summary of business loan authorizations and amounts written off, divided into two classifications—loans of $500,000 and less, and loans of more than $500,000:

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

EXHIBIT A.—A summary of business-loan authorizations, and amounts written off, by size of loan authorized

CUMULATIVE THROUGH DEC. 31, 1950 [1]

[Dollar figures are in thousands]

TOTAL NUMBER AND AMOUNT APPROVED—CUMULATIVE THROUGH DEC. 31, 1950

TOTAL NUMBER AND AMOUNT OF LOANS WRITTEN OFF—CUMULATIVE THROUGH DEC. 31, 1950

Total	1,992	22,556	25	41,017	2,017	63,573

[1] Detail of loans written off for the period July 1, 1950, through Dec. 31, 1950, not yet available.

These figures are very significant. They show that some 60,000 loans of $500,000 and less were made to small business, aggregating $2,400,000,000, with an average of about $40,000 per loan. They also show that about 1,000 loans were made over $500,000 for a total of about $2,900,000,000, averaging about $2,900,000 per loan. The compilation furnished me also indicates very clearly that after Mr. Jones' departure as Chairman the volume of small business loans increased greatly.

The figures in the table above definitely indicate that it is not small business that has distorted the picture of RFC operations. Rather, they point out that aid to small business is sound; that it is necessary in thousands of cases; that the average small-business man is honest and trustworthy and highly deserving of the assistance of his Government in time of financial need. There is no way, of course, of measuring the great benefits that have accrued to individual communities and to the Nation as a result of this assistance given to small business. In virtually every case private banks and lending institutions refused to care for the needs of these honest businessmen, so vital to the community life of our Nation. In making these loans to small business, RFC fulfilled the true and original purpose which I proposed, and has contributed immeasurably to the preservation of free enterprise, a sound economy and real service to the rank and file of our people.

During all of my years of service in this House I have fought for the small-business man and his welfare. He is the backbone of our economy. He is in almost daily contact with the millions of our population, honestly endeavoring to render service at a modest return for his labors. If it be socialism, as my Republican colleagues continually charge, to lend a helping hand to small business when financial stress occurs and relief is denied by the normal channels of credit, the private banks and financial institutions, then let them make the most of it. It is, and always has been, my firm conviction that honest and efficient Government has a major responsibility in protecting the economy generally by stepping in with assistance to this small-business man when he is denied such aid by those who purport to be the only ones endowed with the right to handle such financial problems but fail to do so.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the RFC has made some questionable loans. What financial institution has not? But when the above figures and tabulations have been studied carefuly, it is very clear that the history of the RFC has been one of great service to our economy; it has served a most useful purpose in bolstering our business activity in time of need. Its record of losses is a very favorable one, judged by the great volume of business it has transacted.

This hue and cry about favoritism and influence in connection with the operation of this Government agency is nothing new. I have heard it raised time and again over the years. My Republican friends are cautiously silent whenever the question of huge loans to their favored friends in big business is concerned. There is no criticism from them of the use of this agency and its resources at this very moment by the big steel interests in securing certificates of necessity aggregating almost $2,000,000,000 to expand their plants, under terms of amortization through tax favoritism which virtually turns these huge sums over to them scot free. This will provide them with additional facilities at the taxpayers' expense for future use in reaping tremendous profits at the expense of the rank and file of our people. With the tremendous surpluses they and other corporations now possess, and the great profits they made in 1950, amounting to over $1,300,000,000 for 10 of the largest steel companies, they were fully able to meet this cost of plant expansion without calling upon the Government for this great handout. Their voices are raised to the high heavens, however, when loans are made in good faith for the purpose of providing decent housing for their workers or to small-business competitors. It is a matter of record that nearly all of the very large loans made by the Corporation have gone to Republicans or to Republican institutions.

Yes; I favor calling to account any Government agency that exercises poor judgment in the handling of taxpayers' money, but I resent very strongly the argument and the demand that this great agency—the Reconstruction Finance Corporation—should be abolished simply because the big banks and private financial institutions ask it, or that it be placed under the domination of the Republican minority in Congress simply because several errors of judgment may have been made by the Board.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, the RFC has a definite and vital role in our economy. It must be continued as a source of relief to small business. Greater leeway should be given it to care for the needs and requirements of small business—financial assistance which is constantly being denied it by the so-called normal channels of borrowing in time of stress.

My Republican colleagues are constantly taking credit for the formulation and creation of the RFC. And yet, as I stated previously, there is hardly a single instance of a loan being made while under Republican control to small business. As I stated before, as soon as the Corporation was created, it was used by the Republican President of RFC., Charles G. Dawes, to take care of his own institution to the tune of millions, and the record is very clear that that original loan has not, to this date, been fully liquidated. There is still a balance due of over $9,000,000.

What was the role played by this important agency during World War II? During this period the RFC built and leased more than 2,000 plants and other facilities to aid in the war effort. No word of complaint was raised by the opposition over its activities when the very life of this Nation was at stake. Among the plants constructed were those for the development and production of synthetic rubber, which today has made us almost completely nondependent upon the Asian sources of crude rubber. This great feat could never have been accomplished if we had depended upon private industry to finance the job. It provided funds for the Texas tin smelter, the only tin smelter in the Western Hemisphere, for which we recently authorized additional help during the present emergency. The RFC provided funds for the creation of 62 flying schools and 150 other facilities direly needed to win the war. It had a very vital part in the ultimate victory that was ours during the years.

In my original bill, it is true, I recommended the appointment of five outstanding Americans as directors of the lending agency proposed. They were Mr. William Gibbs McAdoo, Mr. Calvin Coolidge, Mr. Alfred Smith, Mr. Eugene Stevens, of the Federal Reserve system in Chicago, and the Secretary of the Treasury, but in view of conditions today I have favored the President's proposal for a single director. Under Mr. Symington, whom President Truman has just named to direct the Corporation, I feel confident the business of the RFC will be conducted efficiently and well, and that small business will be given every consideration, thus carrying out the original intent of this legislation.

Let me call your attention to this final set of figures to show how well this agency has performed its work. The RFC has paid into the Treasury of the United States in the form of interest on the money borrowed, about $396,000,000. In addition, the Corporation has earned a net profit of more than $600,000,000. It has paid to the Treasury, also, $327,000,000 as dividends on the corporation's stock, owned by the United States and held by it. The original stock was $500,000,000, and it has retired $400,000,000 at par, leaving a capital stock today of $100,000,000.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, it is my candid opinion there are very few Members who have not been asked to intercede for some small-business institution in his district or State, as I stated earlier. I know I have done so. I interceded on behalf of the city of Chicago Board of Education in the 1930's when the banks refused to come to the assistance of this great city, notwithstanding its school teachers had not been paid for 2 years. The Board, under Mr. Jones' direction, refused this loan. I found it necessary to secure the enactment of special legislation authorizing the Board to make the loan, and I am pleased to state this loan was not only repaid in full, but the RFC made a profit of $225,000 thereon.

I also aided three small-business firms in Chicago in procuring loans and in every instance the loans were fully repaid with interest. Though I, myself, have found fault with the delays on applications for small loans, and the red tape and time consumed before final action has resulted, I have every confidence in the outstanding administrative ability of Mr. Symington and his desire to expedite procedures in the organization to the satisfaction of small business.

Mr. Speaker, when real facts are laid before the American people and the Congress, they dispel the unwarranted political criticisms launched against this important Government agency in particular, and this administration in general.

The President and the General

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the syndicated column of Thomas Stokes which appeared in the Fairmont (W. Va.) Times of April 13, 1951.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON.—We've had letter-writing generals before.

There was Gen. Winfield Scott, who wrote embittered letters about President Polk. "Old Fuss and Feathers," with his plumed hat and gorgeous sashes, was unsuccessfully running for President while he was successfully running the Mexican War.

There was Gen. George B. McClellan, who wrote embittered personal letters about President Lincoln, but privately to his wife. He was running unsuccessfully for President while unsuccessfully running a war.

Gen. Douglas MacArthur matches the other two in the overweening ego that seems to go with some military temperaments. He is beginning to approach them, too, in magisterial epistolary traffic, which appears the inevitable and necessary outlet for such temperaments. He is a successful general, admittedly so, ambitious also for something or other, vindication or martyrdom, though obviously not for the Presidency. That was tried once—in 1948. Now the general is too old.

But we have a new factor in this modern replica of past history that has been generally overlooked.

Why has nobody gone back of General MacArthur and inquired into the propriety of the inspiration for his latest epistle?

Reference is to the letter from Representative JOSEPH W. MARTIN, of Massachusetts, to General MacArthur. JOE MARTIN is leader of the Republican Party in the House, and high in its councils generally. He is a former Speaker of the House. It would seem that, as a civilian officer of our Government, he would look to the civilian head of our Government, the President of the United States—whoever he might be or of whatever political party—who also is Commander in Chief of our Armed Forces and commander in chief also of General MacArthur.

This is a free country—but there are certain proprieties.

Why is JOE MARTIN writing letters to a general in the field under orders?

The answer appears obvious. His letter was the overt act, at long last, to signify something that has been going on around here a long time. That is that an element of the Republican Party is using General MacArthur to strike at the President of the United States. That mixes politics into management of our foreign policy at a critical time and at what would seem a dangerous risk to our national interests.

It feeds the general's ego—and so he acquiesces with that political naïveté which is often also the attribute of military men. The general also is being used by those in the Republican Party who are jealous of General Eisenhower as a possible political figure.

When you analyze the MacArthur disciples in the Republican Party you encounter a strange psychosis. It might be called jingo-isolationism. It withdraws now, as before the last war, from sound and logical policies designed to buttress ourselves around the world against encroachment of friends and allies, and yet goes off in a weird and dizzy dream of a crusade against the whole continent of Asia. There is a sort of Ghengis Khan atmosphere about it, with panoplied legions, pipes and timbrels, streaming off under the flaming banner of General MacArthur, a veritable American Mikado, and with a coleader in the exiled Chinese generalissimo, Chiang Kai-shek, who has been rejected by his own people.

Of course, there would be no panoplied legions riding brightly accoutered steeds and carrying spears and long swords, but American doughboys, trudging right into the third world war. Military men generally—except General MacArthur—see it as impossible and tragic.

And here at home, while this dream is being nurtured, those who conjure it up are opposing solid and substantial moves to make ourselves strong, including universal military training, and are alienating our allies of the western world who, after all, must be our chief reliance.

Against UMT they raise the argument that it would give too much power to the military. Yet they are building up a glamorous military figure to the size where today he boldly challenges the civilian head of our Government, the President of the United States.

It gets down to as simple an issue as that—a dangerous blow at our traditional civilian control.

At an appropriate time, President Polk summarily removed "Old Fuss and Feathers" Scott. President Lincoln was very patient with General McClellan, who looked good on paper but couldn't win battles, but eventually supplanted him.

President Truman has been most patient with General MacArthur.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter which I received today from Mr. Joe Kornfedder, formerly known as Joe Zach. He was a member of the Communist Politburo for a considerable number of years, was a very close friend of Joe Stalin, repeatedly attended the schools of sabotage and espionage in Moscow, and finally broke with the Communist Party in the middle or late thirties. The letter is one which I recommend to every Member of the Senate as "must" reading.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 13, 1951.

DEAR JOE: So the thing has finally happened. MacArthur is out. It is a wonder that our system, which has produced so many things for the good of man, can stand the corruption, greed, egotism, hypocrisy, and ineptitude to which we are now subjected. I sometimes wonder if even Stalin's sick totalitarianism may not get the best of us while we are the victims of such leadership. This latest action of Truman is right out of the Pendergast bag of tricks. But it may play the role of the lance that pricked the boil and its long accumulated pus; and who knows, it may in the long run be all to the good.

The spectacle of removing a general of MacArthur's stature as one would kick out a bum has really aroused the country. Truman certainly had the worst possible timing for this action. If he had done it while we were being driven back in Korea it would not have had the same effect. But to remove a general in this fashion who, after taking over an impossible military situation turned defeat into victory twice—that is something which an over-patient public could be aroused about.

MacArthur, who with inadequate forces first defeated Stalin's North Koreans and then the highly over-rated Chinese Communist armies, knew all along and has proved what we long suspected—that Stalin's empire is not what it is cracked up to be by our appeasers. I wonder sometimes whether the Acheson-Truman-Marshall axis did not throw the Korean situation deliberately into his lap in order to discredit him, and now that he has pulled a victory out of it, are removing him in order to stop him in his tracks—or do I give them credit for too much intelligence in that?

It is remarkable with what crudeness they did the job. Even a third-rate politician could have done it better. To treat MacArthur like a dog is, amongst other things, the thing that John Q. Citizen resents. They talk about insubordination! They who have sabotaged congressional decisions for years, bypassed Congress in a hundred ways, made a mockery out of law when the law did not suit their purposes, and honored the law only when it served their ends. Only the Costellos could have made an impudence of that sort.

I don't have to tell you how this cabal sickened loyal and true Americans out of office or shoved them to the sidelines for years, both in the civil and military branches of government. You know a lot more than I do how they enthroned incompetent mummies like Marshall and Machiavellian Rasputins like Acheson, not to speak of the man in the White House who learned his ways with the Pendergast mob and brought the lessons he learned there into the presidency. How much lower can one sink?

Had it not been for a MacArthur, there would now be a Kremlin stooge promoted, Tito fashion, in charge of Japan. And that is quite a story, the particulars of which you know. In that case, the Kremlin would have not only China but Japan as well, and with that there would be indeed peace in Asia—Stalin's peace.

I hope all these facts and many more will come out as a result of the latest adventure of the Acheson-Truman-Marshall axis. It is to the everlasting credit of General MacArthur that he resisted them all these years, instead of fading out of the picture as others were made to do and as they tried to make him do thus forcing them to show their hand at the worst possible moment.

As to Truman's speech, that is for the kindergarten. The assumption that Stalin's policy is determined by pantomime gestures of peace on the part of those he is making war against or is preparing to attack, is senile and ridiculous beyond words. Just the contrary is true; if Stalin is ready for world war, then his appetite for such a war will be whetted by Truman's action. Those who speak out of weakness only invite attack when they deal with gangsters such at Stalin. Is it not curious how Acheson and Truman can coo like doves for peace when they address themselves to Stalin, and strike like a lion against those who are Stalin's uncompromising enemies? All that the Acheson-Truman-Marshall axis has done in this case by removing a redoubtable and able enemy of Stalin's, sending this country into a spin, is to whet Stalin's appetite for aggression. Oh, yes. Truman has done another thing; he has mobilized a maximum of opposition against himself, and that may in the long run bring about the sort of unity this country has been in need of for a long time, and hence be the only good result of Truman's treacherous and inordinate action.

With my very best wishes,

JOE.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT S. KERR
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, in view of the soundness of the sentiment expressed in a letter I have received from

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Mr. Clarence Robison, of Shawnee, Okla., I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHAWNEE, OKLA., April 11, 1951.

Hon. ROBERT S. KERR,
United States Senate.
Hon. MIKE MONRONEY,
United States Senate.
Hon. TOM STEED,
House of Representatives of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: The bravest and best thing President Truman has done during his term of office has been to remove a field officer who refused to follow the directions of his superiors. This Government in truth "cannot long endure" if such conduct should be tolerated.

MacArthur should not be permitted to come before Congress to attack his superior officers. Unless, of course, impeachment is first ordered by the Congress.

If we are not to be the laughingstock of the nations and of history, in this stern period of our history, we must act like men, and not like spoiled brats, and insubordination should be stamped out. The highest place is the proper place to start.

I trust that MacArthur shall be taken as another man in this case, and his treatment should be as any other officer who refuses to obey orders. As I understand it, he is now at liberty to take the stump on his own, if he wants to, which is the proper place for him to air his views.

The President may be guilty of a lot of foolish things, but this act is not one of them. The very stability of our Nation is at stake here.

Respectfully submitted.

CLARENCE ROBISON,
Attorney at Law.

Massachusetts House Lauds Henry Gillen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a copy of a resolution passed by the Massachusetts House of Representatives on the passing of one of the greatest newspapermen in the United States. The late Henry Gillen not only was editor of a large metropolitan paper but he was active in the civic, fraternal, and community life of greater Boston.

He was known the world over for the enlightening and interesting poems that he wrote for his readers, and the general public:

HOUSE LAUDS HENRY GILLEN—RESOLUTION IN HONOR OF LATE EDITOR PASSED

The house of representatives unanimously passed a resolution today in tribute to Henry Gillen, Boston Post executive, who died Friday. It was introduced by Representative Bernard M. Lally, of Dorchester. It was enacted as follows:

"Whereas Henry Gillen, editor of the Boston Post, has passed away; and

"Whereas his death cut short a brilliant newspaper career which he began while a student at college and continued until such time as he became the chief editorial writer; and

"Whereas he will be missed as not only a true and loyal friend by his intimates but by the hundreds who read his lovely verse and enjoyed his keen good sense and literary competency: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Massachusetts House of Representatives hereby expresses its profound regret and deep sorrow on the passing of one of the Commonwealth's great citizens; and be it further

"Resolved, That the clerk of the house cause a copy of these resolutions to be forwarded to the family of the late Henry Gillen and the Boston Post."

Labor's Role in International Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, American labor is playing a great and significant role today in the struggle against communism and is making important contributions in helping to promote our foreign-policy aims. As a result of this development, the Labor Department's Office of International Labor Affairs, in cooperation with the American labor movement, is performing a laudatory task in strengthening the forces of democracy abroad.

This phase of the Labor Department's work is under the guidance of my very good friend, the Assistant Secretary of Labor, Philip M. Kaiser. I am particularly proud of Mr. Kaiser's record of accomplishments because he is a native of Brooklyn, where he was born 37 years ago. He is a Government career man, having risen through the ranks of Government service, where he began as an economist with the Federal Reserve System in 1939. In 1946 he moved over to the Department of Labor, where he became director of the Office of International Labor Affairs and last year was named Assistant Secretary. He is the American representative on the governing body of the International Labor Organization and twice headed the United States delegation to the ILO annual conferences.

A very timely and informative article by Mr. Kaiser on labor and foreign affairs appears in the April 1951 issue of the American Federationist, the official monthly publication of the American Federation of Labor. It is as follows:

LABOR AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

(By Philip Kaiser)

The American labor movement was among the first to appreciate the nature of the Communist menace. As early as its 1920 convention, the American Federation of Labor, concerned about the triumph of communism in Russia, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the American Federation of Labor is not justified in taking any action which could be construed as an assistance to or approval of the Soviet Government of Russia as long as that government is based upon authority which has not been vested in it by a popular representative national assemblage of the Russian people; or so long as it endeavors to create revolutionists in the well-established, civilized nations of the world; or so long as it advocates and applies the militarization of labor and prevents the organizing and functioning of trade unions and the maintenance of a free press and free public assemblage."

Aware of the threat of communism, the American Federation of Labor has done something about it, freely and voluntarily. American labor, by its own direct efforts and by its support of a constructive American foreign policy, undertook to defeat Communist aggression with the weapons of freedom and prosperity.

American unions have given moral and material support to their fellow workers struggling to stave off the Communist virus in other lands. They have sent abroad many of their ablest leaders to carry high the torch of free trade unionism and all that free labor implies for the democratic process.

Trade unionists have been lent to the Government to represent the American people in the foreign service as labor attachés and in the Marshall plan agency. On its own, American labor has stationed some of its officers in Europe and Asia to deliver the message of American labor directly to foreign workers. Historians of the future will, I am sure, pay full credit to American labor for its achievement in giving the democratic ideal meaning and life for the workers of other countries.

As President Truman said recently:

"The story of free American labor, told by American trade-unionists, is a better weapon against Communist propaganda among workers in other countries than any number of speeches by Government officials."

The American labor movement has done its magnificent job abroad on its own, free from the dictates of Government. This is part of the great American story. Responsible American citizens, acting through organizations of their own choosing, have seen fit voluntarily to give a major part of their resources and efforts to strengthening freedom in other countries.

It is important for every citizen, and especially for American labor, to understand how our own Government—responsive to the will of the people—is organized to conduct a democratic foreign policy in the present world crisis. Our foreign policy today, both in its formulation and in its conduct, takes account of the vital labor factor.

I have been in the Department of Labor since 1946, first as director of the Office of International Labor Affairs and now as Assistant Secretary of Labor. During this period the international activities of the Department of Labor have developed into an increasingly effective operation.

This is the result of a greater awareness that, in a representative government, labor must be an integral part of what we call foreign affairs. It is a result also of our awareness that democracy can survive only if the Communist challenge to free trade-unionism is defeated. A challenge to free trade-unionism is, at the same time, a challenge to the democratic process.

Two years ago the Hoover Commission made an intensive survey of the organization of our Government. In the course of its study of foreign affairs, the Commission made findings which are of great significance to every American citizen. Our foreign policy, the Commission noted, is positive and anti-isolationist. The United States has embarked upon affirmative programs—full and responsible participation in the United Nations, the Truman doctrine, the Marshall plan, military assistance, point 4—designed to strengthen in freedom-loving nations the economic and security foundations upon which democracy must build.

A second major conclusion of the Hoover Commission was that it is no longer possible to separate domestic policy from foreign policy. The two are inseparable. Our domestic agricultural policies, for example, have their effect upon the prices of agricultural products in other countries. Similarly, products made abroad by cheap labor are a threat to our own labor standards.

From these two basic concepts—our positive foreign policy and the indivisibility of our foreign and domestic policies—the Hoover Commission formulated its recommendations on how our Government should conduct its foreign affairs. The Department of State, the Commission said, is the President's arm for foreign policy, assisting him in formulating that policy and in carrying it out. But the Commission pointed out that the Department of State cannot do this job by itself. It must rely on other agencies of the Government to assist it both in developing and in carrying out our foreign policy.

Thus, where labor is concerned, the Department of State looks to the Department of Labor for advice and assistance. In the same way, the Department of State looks to the Department of Agriculture in the agricultural field, the Treasury Department in the financial field, the Department of Commerce in the commercial field, and so forth.

That is why the Department of Labor participates in foreign affairs. It is important, I think, for the American labor movement to know what the Labor Department, under the able leadership of Secretary Maurice J. Tobin, has been and is doing in the international field.

Since 1946 the Secretary of Labor has had a Trade Union Advisory Committee on International Affairs. George Meany, Matthew Woll, David Dubinsky, and George P. Delaney represent the American Federation of Labor. They are joined at the conference table by four representatives of the CIO and two from the railroad brotherhoods.

The advisory committee has met periodically with the Secretary and other key officials of the Department of Labor to discuss what the American labor movement thinks on the whole range of American foreign affairs.

Naturally, the primary emphasis is on the labor aspects of foreign policy, but by its very nature that covers pretty much the whole field. For who can limit the scope of labor's interests? Labor is as interested in our policy toward Korea or Soviet Russia as it is in tariffs, internationalization of the Ruhr, or international labor standards.

In the Foreign Service Act of 1946, Congress established the philosophy of a unified Foreign Service broadly representative of the interests of all the American people. The act created a Board of the Foreign Service, to "make recommendations to the Secretary [of State] concerning the functions of the Service, the policies and procedures to govern the selection, assignment, rating and promotion of Foreign Service officers, and the policies and procedures to govern the administration and personnel management of the Service.

Congress specified that the Board be composed of representatives of the Departments of State, Agriculture, Commerce, and Labor. In other words, Congress, through the Foreign Service Act of 1946, gave recognition to the principle that American labor has as large a stake in our total Foreign Service enterprise as does American business or agriculture.

In addition to advising the Secretary of State on the over-all operation of the Foreign Service, the Department of Labor is especially concerned with the labor attaché program. The first labor attaché was appointed in 1943. The number has increased to 31 full-time labor attachés and 18 half-time labor reporting officers, stationed in 46 key spots over the globe.

Their job is to report to Washington current labor developments in their areas. These are vital data in the formulation of foreign policies and programs. The labor attachés also inform foreign peoples about American labor affairs and the role of free trade-unions in our democratic society.

In cooperation with the Department of State, the Department of Labor, through the Office of International Labor Affairs, is responsible for recruiting labor attachés and for working out their assignments abroad. A number of our ablest labor attachés have come from the ranks of organized labor. These men are making a great contribution to the Foreign Service because they combine an intimate knowledge of American labor affairs with a facility for establishing a mutual understanding with foreign trade unionists.

I believe the day will soon come when we will have trade unionists serving as American ambassadors to foreign countries. Even now there are former trade unionists among the chiefs of mission of the Marshall plan agency.

Readers of the American Federationist are familiar with the work of the International Labor Organization. One of its great founders was Samuel Gompers. The ILO is unique among international organizations because it is composed of representatives of employers and workers as well as of governments.

George P. Delaney, international representative of the American Federation of Labor, represents the workers of the United States in this important specialized agency of the United Nations. Charles P. McCormick, president of McCormick and Co., Baltimore, has been elected by the employers of the United States to represent them at the ILO. I am the United States Government representative on the governing body of the ILO and have been privileged to head the United States delegations to the last two annual ILO conferences.

Under the over-all foreign policy guidance of the Department of State, the Department of Labor has primary responsibility for United States activities connected with the ILO. The objective of the ILO is to strengthen the foundations of peace by improving the social and economic conditions of workers throughout the world. The ILO is dedicated to the propositions that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere," that "labor is not a commodity" and that "freedom of association is essential to sustained progress."

Through the adoption of international standards relating to decent labor conditions and through operating programs, the ILO seeks to improve the economic and social conditions upon which communism and totalitarianism can breed. It has recently created a commission to investigate violations of freedom of association. It seeks to raise the standards of workers everywhere so that our products will not have to compete on world markets with products of other countries produced by sweatshop labor. To the extent that the ILO is successful in this work, our own labor standards here in America are protected.

The ILO is not the only international organization which deals with labor matters. The Economic and Social Council of the United Nations has formulated policies on such matters as freedom of association, forced labor, full employment, slavery, migration, equal pay for equal work, the Covenant of Human Rights, and technical assistance. These issues, among others, are of real concern to labor, and the Department of Labor has participated in drafting instructions for United States delegates to the United Nations.

Officials of the Department of Labor have also served as advisers to the United States delegates at meetings of various United Nations bodies. In addition, representatives of the American labor movement have themselves served as members of the United States delegations to UNESCO, the United Nations Educational, Social, and Cultural Organization.

The reciprocal trade agreements program is a cornerstone of our country's foreign economic policy. This program is designed to provide both national and international economic stability and progress through the promotion of international trade. The President is authorized to negotiate agreements with foreign nations with a view to reducing American tariff rates, within certain limits established by law, in return for reciprocal tariff reductions by other countries. The President, of course, takes no action which would threaten injury to American industry or to American labor standards and employment.

The Department of Labor, because of the effects which tariff actions may have on such matters as the employment and purchasing power of the individual worker, participates fully in all stages of the Government's work connected with the trade agreements program. One of our important activities is to make sure that all international unions know on which commodities the United States intends to negotiate, so that the unions affected may present their views in the public hearings which are held before the Government determines whether or not it will offer tariff concessions on specific items. Another activity is the study of the effects on foreign labor of possible United States tariff reductions, in order to maximize the benefits of free international trade to workers abroad while at the same time protecting our own.

In all of our international activities, through daily contact with officials of the State Department and other agencies, we strive to see to it that the labor aspects of American foreign policy are given appropriate consideration in both the development and the conduct of our total foreign policy.

The Department of Labor, in cooperation with the Department of State, has been conducting exchange programs designed to strengthen democratic forces in other countries on a level where it counts. Two of these are providing technical assistance to other governments and arranging for foreign labor leaders and officials to observe conditions in the United States.

Under the first we have given training in the United States to officials of foreign Ministries of Labor in such fields as labor law administration, industrial safety, labor statistics, women's employment, manpower training and employment service organization. We have also sent out consultants in these fields.

By helping other countries to strengthen their government labor services, we are helping to improve the lot of the individual worker. Recently, for example, two officials of the United States Department of Labor participated in the Bell mission, which President Truman sent at the request of President Quirino to survey conditions in the Philippines. The mission made several basic recommendations to raise the standards of the Philippine worker. We are now working to put these recommendations into effect.

The program of observation in the United States for foreign labor leaders is one with which the American Federation of Labor is familiar. We have looked to American labor to carry out a major share of the task and labor has responded magnificently. This program brings carefully selected foreign labor leaders to the United States to see for themselves what America is like, how our unions operate, how our people live and the general role of labor in the American community. The American Federation of Labor, on its own, has carried on similar programs.

In many respects these exchange programs are the meat of foreign relations. There is no more effective way to expose the lies and distortions which Communists and totalitarian propaganda have been spreading about America than to have foreign labor leaders see for themselves the truth about our Nation. Only in this way can they know what we are really doing. Only in this way can they come to understand our great democratic heritage.

One of these visitors, when he returned to his native land, made many speeches. Each time he started off by saying:

"What I am going to tell you about America is not what I was told to say by some Government official because I couldn't hear. I don't speak the language. What I am going to tell you I saw with my own eyes and I know it is true."

He then went on to describe labor's role in American democracy, contrasting the lies the Communists had been spreading with the facts he had himself seen in America.

This is an outline of what the Department of Labor is doing internationally. Our aim is to help strengthen democracy abroad and at home. This is our road to peace.

In the grave crisis that besets the world, totalitarian forces are seeking to extend their power. We have learned from bitter experience that the only language totalitarians understand is the language of strength. Our hope for checking the aggression of Communist imperialism lies in creating situations of strength—where people are united behind a representative government and determined to maintain their independence; where people can count on strong support from other free countries and from the United Nations; where people can hope to win a better life by their own efforts.

The Truman doctrine, the Marshall plan, the Berlin airlift, the mutual-defense-assistance pact, point 4 and technical cooperation, and our firm stand in Korea—all these are designed to create situations of strength.

The Department of Labor and the American labor movement have both made significant contributions to this basic aim of American foreign power.

The American Constitution in a Modern World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, the American Legion of Ohio annually sponsors an essay contest to make us more conscious of the American way of life and the freedom that we enjoy under our form of government.

I am proud that one of the winners is from the Thirteenth District, and I am including the following essay of James Greenawalt, of Vermilion, Ohio:

THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION IN A MODERN WORLD

(By James Greenawalt, Vermilion, Ohio)

The Constitution of the United States is the unique contribution of America to nation building. Its framers showed the world that independent States could, through peaceful agreement, form a Federal Union in which powers of general concern were vested in the Union, while authority in local matters was retained by the States.

The foresight and wisdom of the framers of the Constitution still amazes us. This instrument, created by these comparatively young men in the midst of a great crisis over 160 years ago, has served our Nation long and well. It truly fits the spirit of the people living under it.

A free people forming themselves into a nation will always have to set down the general principles and rules for a new government. Such a written constitution is not incapable of growth and adaption. Our own is not a dead contract which must be interpreted exactly as the parties who entered into it understood it. Rather, it is a living agreement which develops with time and adapts itself to economic and social changes brought about by our greatly increased population, industrialization, new means of transportation and communication.

The elastic clause of the Constitution, which gives Congress the power to legislate on all matters "necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the enumerated powers, makes it flexible to the spirit of the people governed by it and to those who administer it. Ever since the Constitution was framed, it has been undergoing clarification and interpretation.

The Constitution has grown through the years. There have been only 21 formal amendments, the first 12 being added shortly after its framing. An unwritten Constitution has developed through legislation, court decisions, party practices and customs, that is just as strong as the written one in many cases. For example, good legislation establishing Federal courts, administrative departments, boards, and commissions has supplemented the Constitution. The great body of our American law is not in the written Constitution but is to be found in the decision of our courts. The Supreme Court has assumed the power to invalidate acts of Congress which are in its opinion contrary to the Constitution. Party practices have been responsible for the establishment of the President's Cabinet, for the conversion of the electoral college into a party agency, and of the determining by caucuses of procedures and policies of the House of Representatives. Customs in keeping with the spirit of the Constitution have also played their part.

Thus we see that our Constitution has survived the changing times. It has built America into a strong, free nation. It has given us the highest standard of living for the average person found anywhere in the world. It has made us a peace-loving Nation willing to aid other countries in maintaining world peace. It has proved itself to be adequate for past and present needs and it will be able to adapt itself to the future problems and needs of this modern world.

The MacArthur Question—Personalities or Principles

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL ELLIOTT
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I am now, and have for many years been, an ardent admirer of the military genius of Gen. Douglas MacArthur. Through the ages he will undoubtedly rank with the great military commanders of all time.

I think it is altogether fitting that he receive of his country a hero's welcome. I am looking forward to hearing his address to Congress tomorrow. He is certainly qualified to speak on far-eastern affairs, and I am hopeful that his message will be helpful to us in formulating a foreign policy that will be in the best interests of the United States, and that will be helpful in somehow finding a formula that will restore peace to the world.

I personally feel that the issues with which we are confronted are much bigger than that of any personality. I do not believe that we should attempt to make policy decisions upon any basis other than that of fact and principle. Our foreign policy, our military policy, civilian control of the Government, military discipline all appear to be elements of the big question. I hope that it can be resolved on the basis of principle, not prejudice, not personality, not politics. Our 60,000 Korean casualties call on all of us to chart a correct course, to find a sound solution.

As a part of my remarks, I include an article by Alyce Billings Walker from the Friday, April 13, issue of the Birmingham News:

IT SEEMS TO ME OUR MAIN PROBLEM REMAINS DEMOCRACY

(By Alyce Billings Walker)

"My country, right or wrong."

So, I'm going to keep my mouth shut, and pray the good Lord to get us out of the mess that engulfs us.

That, it seems to me, is the best I can do as a citizen. I'll not be a part of the clamoring, hysterical mob behaving just as our enemies would have us do. I'll not take my stand for Truman or for MacArthur, but for the United States of America and democracy as it was conceived by people who placed country before self.

I've read and listened to every scrap of information I could in the last 48 hours. My first impulse, too, was to sit in judgment on one or the other of the two men who have now upset the whole world. I made a list of the merits and demerits of both as recorded in the newspapers, over the radio, and from memory. It added up to the simple fact that I'm neither a Truman or a MacArthur "fan," but for each I have degrees of respect and admiration.

But, out of all the listening, reading, evaluating I have done, there evolved one indisputable fact: The President of the United States and the former commander in chief of the United Nations forces in Korea are each guilty of playing politics when the peace of the world was at stake. For that I cannot forgive them.

Truman is no mental giant, as historians will record. MacArthur is no diplomat, as his well-known temperamental outbursts through the years testify.

But Harry Truman is President of the United States and, as such, was MacArthur's Commander in Chief. I grant you, the latter has been strangely treated, and undoubtedly for political reasons. But so long as he was wearing the uniform of the United States Army, he was obligated to behave as a soldier, not as a leading man with the whole world as his stage.

If he could not conscientiously follow instructions of his superiors, he could have resigned his command. Reputed to be a strict disciplinarian, it seems strange that he should have repeatedly been guilty of what amounted to insubordination.

Time may prove MacArthur entirely right in his judgment of how war in Asia should be conducted—one does remember Billy Mitchell. But I believe he would have guaranteed his personal prestige and better protected the interests of his country by resigning on the grounds of maintaining his principles, than by forcing his discharge.

At the moment, he is martyr in the eyes of vast numbers of admirers and with others who can see no right in anything Truman does.

Frankly, I for one am not too interested in individual political martyrs at the moment. I'm only concerned about the thousands of young, unsung martyrs who are being sacrificed on war's altar trying to defend their imperiled country.

Progress in Civil Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAY J. MADDEN
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, H. B. Snyder, editor of the Gary (Ind.) Post-Tribune, commends the Congress for its action in voting out the segregation amendment to the armed service or manpower bill which was before the House last week.

His editorial follows:

NO SEGREGATION IN UNIFORM

The House has taken the only honorable action possible by eliminating the segregation clause from the draft bill.

It was an indirect clause, but it was segregation, just the same. It provided that draftees would have the right to ask assignment to units of their own race.

No such provision was contained in the Senate bill. The House Military Affairs Committee inserted it in the measure by a 21-12 vote, on motion by Representative WINSTEAD, (Democrat, Mississippi). It provided that inducted men's preferences would "govern any future assignment * * * insofar as military necessity may permit." The privilege was to go only to draftees, not to volunteers or reservists.

The clause was a definite repudiation of President Truman's Executive order calling for equality of opportunity and treatment in the armed services. It was 2 years ago that the order was issued, calling on the Secretary of Defense "to take steps to have the remaining instances of discrimination * * * eliminated as rapidly as possible."

The Armed Forces have made progress toward that goal. Nearly a year ago a Presidential committee reported that, "All Army jobs are now open to Negroes. * * * All Army school courses are open to Negroes without restriction or quotas. * * * All jobs and ratings in the Navy general service now are open to all enlisted men without regard to race or color. * * * The Marine Corps has abolished its segregated Negro training units. * * * All Air Force jobs and schools are open to qualified personnel without racial restriction or quotas."

The Army now asserts it has complete integration in training centers, though the color line remains in some combat units. As of last March 18, it reported 11.7 percent of its enlisted personnel and 2.1 percent of its officers were Negroes.

Although the Navy says it has "no special or unusual provisions" as regards race, only 3 percent of its enlisted personnel are Negroes while it has only 19 Negro officers. The Air Force has 5.6 percent Negroes in its enlisted ranks and only 0.6 percent among officers. The Marine Corps asserts segregation is gone but has no figures on Negro personnel "because we don't make race distinctions on service records."

The Winstead amendment was an attempt to undo all this by an indirect attack. It represented the sort of thinking that can't be accepted if we expect democracy to stand up in the conflict with communism. Its defeat in the House, duplicating the defeat of a similar move in the Senate a year ago, is heartening.

Veterans' Employment Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 5, 1951

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting a letter written by Mr. Miles Kennedy, director of the legislative commission of the American Legion; Mr. Francis M. Sullivan, legislative director of Disabled American Veterans; Mr. Omar B. Ketchum, director of legislation, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States; and Mr. Clarence G. Adamy, national service director, American Veterans of World War II. The statement reads as follows:

Hon. OVERTON BROOKS,
Member of Congress:

We, the undersigned, representing the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, Disabled American Veterans, and the American Veterans of World War II wish to strongly protest the report of the Department of Labor-Federal Security Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives which recommends the reduction of the budget estimate for the Veterans' Employment Service from $1,583,000 to $743,500. The committee expressed its belief that one Federal veterans' representative and a clerk-stenographer for each State and Territory, together with a small headquarters staff, would be adequate. This action amounts to a cut of over 53 percent, and in money, an amount of $839,500. This constitutes a staggering and crippling blow to an already small but hard-working and sincere Government service agency.

The Veterans' Employment Service is mandated by the people of this Nation and the Congress under provision of title IV of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, as amended, to cooperate and aid the United States Employment Service and the State employment services to the end that veterans shall receive the maximum of job counseling and job opportunity in the field of gainful employment. To reduce this splendid, compact, well-organized force of 176 professional field representatives together with the eight professional staff members located in Washington to a shell of some 53 field representatives and a correspondingly smaller unit in headquarters would simply render the Veterans' Employment Service incapable of performing the responsibilities and duties mandated to them by law.

Let us point out that there still remains a sizable future task to be accomplished in terms of employment of veterans currently being trained under programs sponsored by the Government. As of February 28, 1951, the Veterans' Administration cites 1,576,484 veterans in educational and training programs under provisions of Public Law 346. On this same date, there were 93,604 disabled veterans receiving vocational rehabilitation. The majority of these trainees are potential manpower for defense industry or activities contributing to the defense program. The present conflict in Korea and the increased mobilization of our Armed Forces can only result in a substantial increase in the number of disabled veterans who will require job-finding assistance. By late 1951 and early 1952, the Veterans' Employment Service will probably be faced with a situation which will not differ basically from that of 1945 and 1946. Thousands of servicemen will be discharged from service with combat disabilities and additional thousands with injuries resulting from training and other accidents. It will be the responsibility of the Veterans' Employment Service to facilitate their return to civilian life by finding them suitable employment.

Notwithstanding statistics which indicate that there are 62,000,000 people employed today and the labor market is tightening, the fact remains that there are many communities where employment is spotty. Many areas still have relatively high unemployment. Opportunity to materially reduce unemployment in these areas appears to be small because of geographical location, housing shortage, and inability of large number of workers to migrate. The particular problem as we representatives of the veterans' organizations see it is that the Veterans' Employment Service can make a most significant contribution in using its special facilities to gain for the veteran advancement from mediocre jobs to positions which will make full use of the skills he has acquired and the experience he has undergone in training.

The task of rendering special services to veterans in the field of gainful employment remains great. Current operations of and deployment of personnel of the Veterans' Employment Service is servicing efficiently and valuably to the welfare of our fighting men and women upon their discharge from service to their country. We believe that it is absolutely essential that their efforts and continuing positive accomplishments be maintained.

The American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, the Disabled American Veterans, and the American Veterans of World War II at their respective 1950 conventions and encampments mandated full support to the maintenance of the Veterans' Employment Service and its operation of service to veterans in the field of gainful employment. We, therefore, the undersigned, respectfully request that action be taken which will result in the restoration of funds to the full amount as requested by the President in his budget for the fiscal year 1952, $1,583,000.

MILES D. KENNEDY,
Director, Legislative Commission, the American Legion.
OMAR B. KETCHUM,
Director of Legislation, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States.
FRANCIS M. SULLIVAN,
Legislative Director, Disabled American Veterans.
CLARENCE G. ADAMY,
National Service Director, American Veterans of World War II.

Appeasement or a Munich?—No

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, we are hearing some shrill talk about appeasement or a Munich in the Far East. I have been shocked by these irresponsible statements. We must debate the present crisis on the issues and not on emotion or partisan considerations.

UNIVERSITY OF WILMINGTON LIBRARIES

The critics of President Truman and the admiinstration are playing directly into the hands of the Communists with their rantings about appeasement. And, at the same time, they are aiding the propagandists of the Kremlin by their talk of war in the Orient.

What do the American people want? They want peace and that is what our President is working for. We are derelict in our duty if we spread hysterical and false statements at this time.

The President is working for peace and the free peoples of the world are behind him. Last June, when the Communists attacked the Republic of Korea, our President made the decision to ask the United Nations to furnish the military force to stop the aggression. This was not appeasement. This was firm, resolute action.

When the Chinese Communists came into the war in November and the outlook was dark, our President and the United Nations did not falter. They declared the Chinese Communists as aggressors. They poured in the men and machines to stop the aggressors. This was no Munich. This action was that of men with the will to fight for what they considered to be right.

The Communists have wanted to take Formosa. Our President has protected that island with the Seventh Fleet. Appeasers would have long since given up Formosa. But, by the action of President Truman not one Communist has set foot on the island.

There have been some in the United Nations who have wanted to give in to the Chinese Communists by allowing them into the UN and by giving them a voice in the Japanese Peace Treaty talks. In spite of the false propaganda by the critics of the President, our Nation has stood consistently against such a deal.

In his speech to the Nation on last Wednesday, the President declared firmly for peace. He said in forceful terms:

> We are ready, at any time to negotiate for a restoration of peace in the area. But we will not engage in appeasement. We are only interested in real peace.
>
> Real peace can be achieved through a settlement based on the following factors:
>
> 1. The fighting must stop.
>
> 2. Concrete steps must be taken to insure that the fighting will not break out again.
> 3. There must be an end to aggression.

This, I say, is a real program for peace. Anyone who charges otherwise is guilty only of trying to avoid the truth, and of confusing the people. They are guilty of what the President calls political hokum and they have truthfully put their own personal aggrandizement above the good of their country.

If the truth were known, they are more interested in getting us into a war than in trying to bring about a real peace. They should quit hiding behind their sham of misrepresentation and distortion of the facts.

The Mediterranean—Strategic Road to Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY J. LATHAM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. LATHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to set forth in the RECORD a very excellent article by William H. Hessler which appeared in the April 3, 1951, issue of the Reporter.

I feel sure the Members will find this helpful to bring into proper focus many of the matters on which we will legislate.

The article follows:

THE MEDITERRANEAN—STRATEGIC ROAD TO RUSSIA

(By William H. Hessler)

For any nation that commands the sea and air, the Mediterranean is the highroad to the Soviet heartland. To be sure, Korea and Western Europe are getting the headlines at the moment, and, for the tireless writers of science fiction, the new frontier of the Arctic is a theme of endless fascination. But our military planners are giving some hard thought to the Mediterranean.

In February, American and British naval and air officers met in Malta to plan a stronger, more integrated deployment of their strength in the Mediterranean and the Middle East. About the same time, the United States and France began negotiations to reactivate five wartime air bases in Morocco. The upshot is a program for the rapid build-up of air and sea bases from Gibraltar to the Persian Gulf. Runways are to be lengthened and underground gasoline dumps provided in Morocco, Tripoli, Egypt, Cyprus, Jordan, Iraq, and Iran. Weather-observation stations are to be installed and communications equipment set up—so that America's heavier aircraft can fly from these positions, which dot the Mediterranean for more than 2,000 miles from west to east.

This joint program has been made public. But there are certainly other strategic plans not on the public record. When Red Fleet printed a jittery charge that the United States and Britain are preparing offensive war against Russia's Black Sea ports, it revealed the Kremlin's respect for the striking power of carrier-based aircraft. Russia's defenses against fast, low-altitude, sea-based planes are weaker than those against big, relatively slow long-range bombers.

There is no mistaking the stress put on the eastern Mediterranean lately. Along with the Malta and Paris meetings, there has been a thorough canvass of the entire area by Air Force Secretary Thomas K. Finletter, who, although new in that post, is an old hand at air power. British sent Gen. Sir Brian Robertson, commander of its Middle East forces, to Israel on a mission frankly strategic in aim; and Israel has opened the door to staff talks with American military men. George W. Perkins, Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs, took a trip to Belgrade at the same time that his counterpart for the Middle East, George C. McGhee, led a procession of high officials, military and civilian, to Turkey, a country pressing Washington for outright alliance.

The biggest conference of military leaders, however, was held in Paris in the first week of March, when General Eisenhower and sundry subordinates met with Admiral Robert B. Carney, commanding our Mediterranean forces; Admiral Forrest P. Sherman, Chief of Naval Operations; and General Robertson. Their subject was the organization and use of sea power in the Mediterranean. In the aggregate, these top-level dealings bear witness to the urgency of military readiness there.

The constant search of American military planners is for potential means of bringing air and sea power to bear on the Soviet Union if necessary. They can plan to stand on the defensive in the Far East and on the islands flanking the eastern shore of Asia once the Korean War is ended. They can provide radar warning stations and interceptor squadrons for the defense of North America in the northwest, north, and northeast—the possible danger zones. They can anticipate the path of the main Soviet attack in Europe, because it would have to come on the northern plain that extends from Moscow to the English Channel.

But these are problems of defense, and defense of itself does not win wars. America's most telling weapons for offensive war are aircraft—land-based and sea-based. They range from single-place fighters to the six-engine B-36, and their armament from .50-caliber machine guns to the atomic bomb. The strategic planners find their most urgent and most baffling task in determining how to deploy their offensive power where it would hurt the Kremlin most, support our allies best, and also protect our prime sources of strategic materials and our sea lanes to them.

This search for the means of staging a retaliatory offensive and of supporting valued partners leads military men inexorably to the Mediterranean. That tideless sea can best be thought of as an arm of the Atlantic extending into the heart of the Eurasian-African land mass, the "world island" of the geopoliticians. It is a long, irregular corridor, rimmed completely by friendly or neutral nations (except for the short Albanian coast), reaching nearly to the front door of the Soviet Union. For Britain, after the opening of the Suez Canal back in 1869, it was the supreme sea-communication line, linking the homeland with India and Australasia. Today it has four big strategic uses.

First and foremost, it is an avenue on which air-sea power could be brought to bear against the Soviet Union and its European satellites. Second, it is a sea lane for the logistical support of southern France, Italy, Yugoslavia, Greece, and Turkey. Third, it is an efficient sea lane to the Middle East and the richest petroleum lands of the world. Finally, it would be a formidable water barrier against a European continent held by the Red army, if it should come to that.

The main body of Europe is a peninsula, flanked by the Baltic and the Mediterranean. In war, the Baltic would be a Russian lake, because the entrances are too constricted and shallow for our penetration, because it is too small for maneuver, and because it parallels the flat northern plains of Europe. But the Mediterranean, with ample sea room for ships to maneuver and with friendly nations all around, contains a series of north-south peninsulas (Greece, Italy, Spain). It is evident that the north of Europe, being a wide corridor open at both ends, is vulnerable to any strong land force, while the south of Europe is cut off from the north by mountains and trisected by projecting arms of the Mediterranean (Aegean, Adriatic, Ligurian Seas). By the logic of geography, in modern war southern Europe must "belong" to the dominant sea power, just as northern Europe must "belong" to the dominant land power.

Our chief political allies are in the west of Europe. The problem there is to create enough defensive strength to fight a holding war. Our natural geographic allies for offensive action are in the south, in a broken east-west row, Turkey, Greece, Yugoslavia, Italy, Spain.

America, as the preeminent sea power, has a relation of mutual dependence with these impoverished Mediterranean states in a strategic deployment ordered by geography. Turkey and Greece are a shield keeping Russia from the Aegean and eastern Mediterranean. Yugoslavia is a shield keeping Russia from the Adriatic and central Mediterranean. Spain adjoins the only reliable entrance to the Mediterranean. Simply by existing as non-Soviet states, these countries make the Middle Sea a viable sea lane for us. At the same time, while we and the British command its waters, the Mediterranean is a highway on which we can bring support to these partners who are not yet (excepting Italy) formal allies. We look to them as buffers for our sea corridor. They look to us for munitions, supply, reinforcement, and air support.

Starting with these geographic realities, we can piece together the main elements of the potential counteroffensive strategy now taking form. Fast carrier task forces would roam the Mediterranean sending fast, low-altitude fight-bombers northward against tactical targets. Land-based fighters and attack bombers would do the same, working from many bases scattered through the islands and peninsulas of the region. The primary task would be to achieve command of the air, the secondary to slow aggressor ground forces.

Medium-range bombers from well-protected bases farther back would fly north and northeast to smash at strategic targets in the satellite states, European Russia, and the vital area just behind the Urals. The planned improvement of British air bases in Iran, Iraq, Jordan, Cyprus, and Tripoli is a clear preparation for such a counteroffensive. Greek and Turkish airfields could serve as forward bases for fighter aircraft—on bomber-escort missions and offensive sweeps.

Just what our heavier aircraft would be able to do from bases in the British Isles or what our monster B–36's could do from their aerie in Texas only actual performance in all-out war can confirm. It would depend on how well the Russians have developed their high-altitude defenses. Long-range bombers would be relied on to deliver main offensive blows at strategic targets in the Soviet Union, but even if these aerial battleships did all that was expected of them, they could not keep the Red army out of Western Europe. Wrecking Soviet tank factories would then be no more important than wrecking Soviet tanks on the move eastward.

Meantime, if Soviet ground forces attacked, merchantmen of the United States and some allies would be plowing eastward through the Mediterranean under antisubmarine escort. This maritime service of supply would bring to our air bases throughout the area the ammunition, fuel, foodstuffs, defensive ground-force contingents, fighter-aircraft replacements, and other items essential to overseas aerial operations. It would bring the nations of southern Europe equipment to sharpen their harrying thrusts northward against the exposed southern flank of the Soviet war machine, a flank that would grow ever longer as the attack moved westward. On this sea route also we might deploy amphibious task forces of great mobility and fire power for special jobs in southern Europe, the Middle East, or (if Red fleet's fears were confirmed) the Black littoral of Russia.

Middle eastern petroleum poses an acute problem for strategic planners, because the oil-bearing regions of Iran, Iraq, and Arabia are not protected by natural barriers against oil-hungry Russia. If we cannot insure the holding of these areas against Soviet troops (a ground-force task of large dimensions), utilizing these oil fields.

Even in the worst conceivable circumstances—seizure and occupation of the great bulk of Europe by Communist forces—the Mediterranean would remain immensely important in Anglo-American strategy. With their overwhelming superiority in sea power, America and Britain could maintain logistical support for air bases in north Africa and on various islands—Crete, Cyprus, Malta, Sardinia. To hold the islands would be an air-sea task. To hold North Africa would require only sea command of the Mediterranean and ground-force defense of a 100-mile front on the Isthmus of Suez. In 1943 Allied victory was accomplished in north Africa mainly because Anglo-American sea power in the Mediterranean tended to isolate Rommel's armies. In reverse, the same sea command could assure the safety and effective operation of air bases in and south of the Mediterranean.

Whether we assume the best or the worst, whether we should manage to hold most of Europe, or lose it, we cannot hang back and trust to the British Isles—Mr. Hoover's unsinkable aircraft carrier and the cornerstone of his cautious strategy of passive defense. Britain lies at the end of the north European plain, separated from it by 18 miles of water. It backs up a purely defensive position. From British bases, we could launch retaliatory bomber strikes against Moscow and Leningrad, and fighter and attack planes for the support of defensive ground forces on the European plain. But if we wanted to win such a war, and not merely go through the motions of resisting, we would do better to work from the British air bases scattered from Gibraltar to the Persian Gulf. Britain's contribution is not merely a cluster of airfields in the home islands, but a series of shrewdly placed positions along the underbelly of Europe, won by centuries of canny diplomacy and stubborn fighting.

The plan for deploying the power of the West in the Mediterranean are new, but they rest on extensive preparation—on 3 years of support for Turkey and Greece, on the resuscitation of Italian naval power, and on Washington's recent rather wary conciliation of the Franco regime. The Mediterranean area has been cultivated by diplomats in advance of its exploitation by soldiers and sailors.

Italian naval power is not to be laughed away. Set against that of the United States, it is trifling—25,000 officers and men (the limit imposed by treaty) against half a million. Forbidden by treaty to maintain aircraft carriers or submarines, Italy cannot pose as a great naval power. But in the Mediterranean, it could contribute the small, fast craft that count for so much in antisubmarine warfare in calm, restricted waters.

Spain enters the calculations of any Mediterranean strategy because a hostile power in Andalusia could endanger our use of the Strait of Gibraltar. The whole edifice of an offensive and defensive strategy for the region would collapse if the guns or planes of a strong enemy dominated the 15-mile-wide passage. Under Generalissimo Franco or anybody else, therefore, Spain needs to be persuaded—and if necessary helped—to defend its own soil. But that is about all the Western Powers really need from Spain.

To make our offensive-defensive Mediterranean strategy effective, political planners must try to gain the active, full-scale participation of two powers not yet woven into the fabric of the North Atlantic alliance—Yugoslavia and Turkey. Their armies, properly employed, could neutralize nearly half the ground-force strength Russia would have initially for an attack in Europe.

The problems faced by political planners, however, are a story in themselves. It is enough to observe, in purely strategic terms, that one down-to-earth fact must guide our political dealings with the Mediterranean states—that Tito's Yugoslavia can help us prevent war with Russia, or else help us mightily to prevent the loss of Western Europe if war should come, while Franco's Spain could do little more than provide a last-gasp defensive beachhead on the Continent from which to undertake the stupendously bloody and heart-breaking task of reconquering all Europe once it was stupidly lost. This is spelled out clearly by Tito and his spokesmen, who have said Yugoslavia will fight if Greece is attacked, if Italy is invaded through Austria, if Russia strikes in Germany. That covers about everything but an end run through Norway. Yugoslavia is in our corner. And it has force and the incentive to use it.

Our emergent strategy for the Mediterranean needs to be far better understood across the breadth of America. There are two ingredients for a successful strategic plan. One is to keep Soviet armies out of industrial Western Europe. The other is to throw in a relentless succession of hard belly punches by sea and air from all around the perimeter of the Red world. And for this second task, which is the counteroffensive and therefore the decisive task, the Mediterranean beckons. It is a high road flanked by friends, and it leads to the doorstep of Stalin's Eurasian heartland.

New York Editor Approves Hall Measure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, continuing the long list of valued and ardent supporters of the Hall antiregistration bill, I incorporate herewith in the Appendix a fine editorial by Mr. John J. O'Connor, hunting and fishing authority and editor of the Bronx Times.

Mr. O'Connor's broad outlook both in his own field of sports and also upon our national affairs leads him to some constructive conclusions which are contained in his following column:

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Orchids and salutations to Congressman EDWIN A. HALL, Republican, Binghamton, N. Y., for introducing H. R. 3023, a bill which prohibits the registration of firearms.

This bill is so important to the rights of the citizens of this country that it is given here in its complete text:

"A bill to prohibit registration of firearms already issued legally and to protect citizens against unconstitutional seizure of private weapons

"Whereas during World War II, Nazi-minded officers attempted to pass laws abridging the constitutional right of a private citizen to bear arms; and

"Whereas these same officers started their anti-American program by calling for registration of all privately owned firearms; and

"Whereas our founding fathers wisely incorporated within the Constitution of the United States this inherent privilege to our citizens to protect their hearths—homes by possessing arms; and

"Whereas in the several States, the revival of tyranny is asserting itself in the form of proposals to register all legally issued private weapons with design to eventual seizure of firearms owned by individual citizens: Therefore,

"Be it enacted, etc., That no citizen shall be compelled to register of firearms of which he is in legal possession.

"SEC. 2. No Federal, State, or local officer shall have the power to seize firearms belonging to private citizens who legally possess them."

To the good citizens and sportsmen alike, please protect your constitutional rights, and write or wire your Congressman today, telling him to give his backing to bill H. R. 3023, as it is now referred to the House Committee on Ways and Means.

BIRDS GO OFF MILADY'S BONNET

After April 15, the plumage of wild birds may not be sold in New York State, according to a conservation law passed 10 years ago which gave feather merchants and millinery establishments a decade to dispose of plumage already on hand.

That means that milady's bonnet henceforth offered for sale in this State may sport only the feathers of certain birds captivity-reared in the United States, and classified by law as "domestic fowl." Exempt under the law is the plumage of "domestic fowl," such as feathers of the following birds raised in captivity in the United States: chickens, turkeys, guineas, geese, ducks, pigeons, ostriches, rheas, peafowl, and eight varieties of pheasants or their hybrids; ringnecks, goldens, silvers, Lady Amhersts, Reeves, Swinhoe, and brown and blue eared.

The law does not apply to licensed commercial fly-tying feathers which traditionally have been used in the making of fishing lures, but all feather and millinery merchants, under the law, must turn over all remaining supplies of illegal plumage to the State Conservation Department by May 19, 1951.

Blows Whistle on Additional Abuses of Hazard Pay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER NORBLAD
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. NORBLAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith a letter recently published in Armed Forces on the subject of the abuses of flight pay:

BLOWS WHISTLE ON ADDITIONAL ABUSES OF HAZARD PAY

To the EDITOR:

In reference to a letter concerning sub hazard pay, in the March 24 issue of Armed Force, I am an ex-airedale and can vouch for the fact that submen are not alone in their plight.

While in a patrol squadron in the Pacific men not actually needed in the crews were flown 4 hours a month for the sole purpose of giving them flight pay. That condition exists today.

On several naval air stations, I ran across a more openly unfair deal. There the ground crew men of various departments were given flight pay, chiefs getting most of the skins, first class next, and so on down the line. The seamen and third class got practically no chance at the flight pay. None of the men had any business whatsoever flying. The flight skins were assigned to various departments strictly as a favor.

Paper time was another ruse used during the war. A man who was getting this unneeded flight pay would let some air-happy seaman fly under his name. The seaman got the thrill, the man whose name he signed in the log got the pay.

Another device which was occasionally used was the falsification of the BuSandA form sent to disbursing, which authorized the flight pay. The form would contain one or two names which had never appeared on any flight sheet. These free-riders would then be credited flight pay when they had actually flown no time during the entire month.

Of course, it goes without saying that an officer's life is now worth 100 bucks per month when he risks it. An enlisted man's body, containing less vital chemicals, such as gold, is worth only $50 per month in hazard pay.

AN EX-AIREDALE.

Majority Views on Colorado River Controversy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I am submitting the following statement:

STATEMENT OF CERTAIN MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS CONCERNING S. 75 AND H. R. 1500, CENTRAL ARIZONA PROJECT

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House has given several weeks of study to this proposed legislation. We have heard experts on all aspects of the project. We have just returned from a trip to the Southwest, where all features of the project were viewed and personal interviews were undertaken. As a result of these studies, we have arrived at certain suggestions and conclusions concerning S. 75 and the companion bill, H. R. 1500.

The committee knows of the extreme drought situation that faces the area from western Kansas to the Pacific Ocean and from the Navajo country to the Mexican border. On the trip members of the committee witnessed many empty reservoirs and vast fields that could not be irrigated due to lack of water. We discovered a shortage of power because of shortage of water for hydroelectric facilities. We learned of lowering water tables. On the other hand, in the Colorado River the committee saw thousands of second-feet of water not being presently used.

We are fully cognizant of the great benefit that could accrue to central Arizona if this water, presently going to waste, could be put to use in this drought-stricken area.

We believe, however, that the proposed bills, as presently presented to the committee, would not provide the relief hoped for. We want to be helpful to Arizona and her people in the solving of the serious present water problem. We, feel, however, that the bills, in their present form, would not resolve the water problem facing Arizona. We think that the legal question of the right to the use of waters of the lower Colorado River Basin would not be resolved by the legislation; that the adjudication of the water rights should come before authorization of the project, and not following; the committee is fearful that the method provided in the legislation is not the proper procedure and would not result in obtaining adjudication of these rights by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The need for adjudication of the rights to the use of waters of the lower Colorado River Basin was admitted by every witness before the committee. Adjudication has been recommended by the President, the Secretary of the Interior, Bureau of the Budget, the Judiciary Committee, and this committee of the Congress. It is a fact recognized in section 13 of the bills under consideration. There is no argument on this point. The following quotations indicate the agreement of all concerned for the necessity of the adjudication of the water rights in the lower Colorado River Basin:

"Authorization of any of the projects inventoried in the report should not be considered to be in accord with the program of the President until a determination is made of the rights of the individual States to utilize the waters of the Colorado River system." (H. Doc. 419, 80th Cong., p. 1.)

"The first question raised was whether there is enough water in the Colorado River, available for use in Arizona, to satisfy the needs of this project on a permanent basis. The President has stated many times that he would like to see a definitive settlement of the rights of the various States to waters of the Colorado River system, in order that decisions on projects to be developed in the public interest may be made on a firm basis with respect to water rights. The President consistently has indicated his unwillingness to take any position favorable to authorization of the central Arizona project until settlement of the water-rights controversy has been brough about." (Bureau of the Budget, in letter to chairman of House Committee on Public Lands, dated April 19, 1950.)

"There is agreement among all agencies concerned as to the urgent need for resolution of the water-rights issues involved." (Report of Director of Bureau of the Budget, May 19, 1948 hearings, H. J. Res. 225, 80th Cong., House Judiciary Committee.)

"That further development of the water resources of the Colorado River Basin, particularly large-scale development, is seriously handicapped, if not barred, by lack of a determination of the rights of the individual States to utilize the waters of the Colorado River system." (Report of Commissioner of Reclamation, H. Doc. 419, 80th Cong., 1st sess., Secretary's interim report on Colorado River.)

"Assurance of a water supply is an important element of the plan yet to be resolved. The showing in the report of the availability of a substantial quantity of Colorado River water for diversion to central Arizona for irrigation and other purposes is based upon the assumption that the claims of the State of Arizona to this water are valid. It should be noted, however, as the regional director and the Commissioner of Reclamation have pointed out, that the State of California has challenged the validity of Arizona's claim. If the contentions of the State of Arizona are correct, there is an ample water supply for this project. If the contentions of California are correct, there will be no dependable water supply available from the Colorado River for this diversion." (Secretary of Interior's report in letter of transmittal of the project planning report, H. Doc. 136, 81st Cong.)

"There is not available for use in the other State sufficient water for all the projects, Federal and local, which are already in existence or authorized." (Report of the Secretary on S. J. Res. 145, 80th Cong.)

"The committee feels the dispute between these two States on the lower Colorado River Basin should be determined and settled by agreement between the two States or by court decision because the dispute between these two States jeopardizes and will delay the possibility of prompt development of any further projects for the diversion of water from the main stream of the Colorado River in the lower Colorado River Basin.

"Therefore the committee recommends that immediate settlement of this dispute by compact or arbitration be made, or that the Attorney General of the United States promptly institute an action in the United States Supreme Court against the States of the lower basin, and other necessary parties, requiring them to assert and have determined their claims and rights to the use of the waters of the Colorado River system available for use in the lower Colorado River Basin." (House Committee on Public Lands, in Report No. 910, July 14, 1947, on H. R. 1597 (reauthorizing the Gila project).)

The point we wish to make here is the complete agreement of administrative and legislative agencies, including the President, Secretary of the Interior, Bureau of the Budget, House Judiciary Committee, and this committee of the Congress, as to the need of adjudication of the waters of the lower Colorado River Basin.

If the committee should proceed with the authorization of the central Arizona project, as contemplated in the proposed legislation, in the light of the foregoing, this committee and the Congress might well find itself in the position of having authorized a project which would entail the spending of hundreds of millions of dollars that, because of a Court decision (which must be made), might well find itself without sufficient water and therefore uneconomical and unfeasible.

The testimony before the committee was to the effect that the funds could not be appropriated until the water rights were determined. (See sec. 13 of the bills.) We are not convinced this is the case. It will be noted the section deals with expenditures, not appropriations, and provides for the suspension of expenditures for the construction of certain features of the project while a suit is pending. (Described in section 12.) However, the resumption of the Secretary's power of expenditure is not conditioned on the result of the suit. In other words, he may resume construction and thereby the use of appropriations as soon as the suit is ended, regardless of the result.

To state the matter in another way: The prohibition in this section against expenditures would end (1) if the State brought no action within 6 months, or (2) if the Court should dispose of the action on technical ground without settling the controversy.

It further appears to us that the matter of prohibition against expenditures is one that would be determined by the Secretary of the Interior—not by the Congress—if this bill was enacted into law. In other words, the spending of appropriations would be determined by the Secretary and not by the Congress. We feel that such a determination is one that should rest with the Congress before expenditures are made.

Argument was made before the committee that enactment of this proposed legislation is necessary in order to set up a justiciable case for consideration of the Court. We are inclined to believe that is not the case and that, in fact, because of the limitations in this bill, the matter will cause the Court to refuse consideration. The committee finds that the Court did hear an almost identical case: Nebraska v. Wyoming (325 U. S. 589). The prayer, the issues, and the results, as described in that case, all closely parallel with the central Arizona project.

"The prayer was for a determination of the equitable share of each State in the water and of the priorities of all appropriations in both States and for an injunction restraining alleged wrongful diversions." (Nebraska v. Wyoming (325 U. S., at p. 592).)

Again, in hearings on the Gila project in the Eightieth Congress before this committee the committee stated:

"The committee feels the dispute between these two States on the lower Colorado River Basin should be determined and settled by agreement between the two States or by Court decision because the dispute between these two States jeopardizes and will delay the possibility of prompt development of any further projects for the diversion of water from the main stream of the Colorado River in the lower Colorado River Basin. (Rept. No. 910, July 14, 1947, on H. R. 1597.)

"That further development of the water resources of the Colorado River Basin, particularly large-scale development, is seriously handicapped, if not barred by lack of a determination of the rights of the individual States to utilize the waters of the Colorado River system." (From Secretary's Interim Report by Commissioner of Reclamation on the Colorado River—H. Doc. 419, 80th Cong., 1st sess.)

"The evidence supports the finding of the special master that the dependable natural flow of the river during the irrigation season has long been overappropriated. A genuine controversy exists. The States have not been able to settle their differences by compact. The areas involved are arid or semiarid. Water in dependable amounts is essential to the maintenance of the vast agricultural enterprises established on the various sections of the river. The dry cycle which has continued over a decade has precipitated a clash of interests which between sovereign powers could be traditionally settled only by diplomacy or war. The original jurisdiction of this Court is one of the alternative methods provided by the framers of our Constitution." (Arizona v. California (283 U. S. 423, 462–464).)

Obviously, these are parallel situations to one which now presents itself to this committee. The Court's summary of the controversy in the case of Nebraska v. Wyoming reads, in part, as follows:

"If this were an equity suit to enjoin threatened injury, the showing made by Nebraska might possibly be insufficient. But Wyoming v. Colorado, supra, indicates that where the claims to the water of a river exceed the supply a controversy exists appropriate for judicial determination. If there were a surplus of unappropriated water, different considerations would be applicable. Cf. Arizona v. California (298 U. S. 558, L. ed. 1331, 56 S. Ct. 848). But where there is not enough water in the river to satisfy the claims asserted against it, the situation is not basically different from that where two or more persons claim the right to the same parcel of land. The present claimants being States we think the clash of interests to be of that character and dignity which makes the controversy a justiciable one under our original jurisdiction. (From p. 610 of the Court's summary.)

It will be noted the Court held that there was a justiciable controversy and one under its original jurisdiction.

It should be remembered that for 29 years a fruitless effort to arrive at an interstate compact for the use of the waters of the lower Colorado Basin has been going on.

In the case of Colorado v. Kansas (320 U. S. 383), at page 616, the Court has this to say:

"But the efforts at settlement in this case have failed. A genuine controversy exists. The gravity and importance of the case are apparent. The difficulties of drafting and enforcing a decree are no justification for us to refuse to perform the important function entrusted to us by the Constitution."

These considerations justify the opinion stated by the Secretary of the Interior at hearings before this committee on H. R. 934 and 935, Eighty-first Congress, first session, page 1150.

"The bare statement of these questions, the knowledge that there is disagreement between Arizona and California about the answers to be given them, and the fact that, if the contentions of either State are accepted in full and if full development of the upper basin within the limits fixed by the Colorado River compact is assumed, there is not available for use in the other State sufficient water for all the projects, Federal and local, which are already in existence or authorized would seem to indicate that there exists a justiciable controversy between the States."

The committee notes that it took the Court only 3½ to 8 months to decide the three previous cases of Arizona against California. We therefore believe that this committee was wholly justified when it recommended that immediate settlement of this dispute by compact or arbitration be made, or that the Attorney General of the United States promptly institute an action in the United States Supreme Court against the States of the lower basin, and other necessary parties, requiring them to assert and have determined their claims and rights to the use of the waters of the Colorado River system available for use in the lower Colorado River Basin.

We think that this suit could be brought at an early date and that this committee have the benefit of the determination of the court of the water rights of the lower Colorado River Basin.

We would like to call attention to the limitations in the bills before us which might result in the refusal of the court to resolve the dispute. Sections 12 and 13 prescribe the manner and instructions with respect to the suit proposed in the legislation to be submitted to the Supreme Court. There is a limitation on the subject matter of the suit to the right to divert water through aqueducts or tunnels to be constructed pursuant to this act. It is noted that only the diversion proposed in S. 75 and H. R. 1500 would come within the prerogative of the court under limitation prescribed by this legislation. We doubt the Supreme Court could arrive at an equitable determination of the rights involved if it accepted the case under these limitations.

It appears to us that there are several acts and compacts, in addition to the proposed legislation, that would enter into the controversy. There is the Colorado River Compact, the Boulder Canyon Project Act, the California Self-Limitation Act, and the Boulder Canyon Project Adjustment Act. Also, there is the Mexican Water Treaty, the act of the Arizona Legislature of 1944, which recognized certain rights in California, and possibly others. It is difficult for us to see how the Supreme Court could determine the aggregate rights of the States to the use of waters in the lower Colorado River Basin under the limitations imposed by sections 12 and 13 of the bills. It might well result in the Court refusing to consider the suit.

We recognize the great need for additional water for maintenance of the present economy in Arizona and would like to be helpful in solving the present difficulties. We therefore suggest to the proponents of S. 75 and H. R. 1500 that steps immediately be taken for the adjudication of the rights to the use of the waters in the lower Colorado River Basin; that a firm settlement be reached with the Indians who will be damaged by the construction of the project (we feel that section 14 is not a satisfactory solution).

It seems to us most unfortunate that two great States of this Union, both so vitally affected by the use of Colorado River water, should not arbitrate these issues.

UNIVERSITY OF WYOMING LIBRARIES

Engineers and financial experts, whose position would be one of neutrality between the States involved, could be found to determine these issues on a sound, equitable and feasible basis. Such action by both States would be an indication of a desire to resolve the issue in the best interests of the Nation. Propaganda and charges and counter charges have but befogged the issues and undoubtedly jeopardized the position of both States.

We urge the parties in interest to give serious consideration to such arbitration so that we may take affirmative and constructive action.

CONCURRING STATEMENT BY ENGLE AND YORTY

The undersigned, not having participated in the original drafting of the foregoing statement, wish to concur with the following explanaton in two instances:

First, with reference to the third paragraph on the first page: There is water presently going to waste and the use of it would benefit Arizona. But, this is water belonging to the upper basin which is unused at the present time; and, water belonging to Arizona and California for presently constructed or authorized projects and to Nevada, Utah, and New Mexico which is not currently being used. Consequently, although this water is currently going to waste, it will be used, and no further projects (the central Arizona included) can be predicated on it.

Second, the third paragraph on page eleven: It is admitted that additional water would help the economy of Arizona as it would any area in the arid southwest. But Arizona has exercised no care in the utilization of her existing water, and is flagrantly over-using her water. The record is replete with evidence of this fact, including the records of the Department of Agriculture that agricultural production in Arizona since 1946 in spite of her short water supply has increased more in volume and dollars than any State in the Union.

Finally, we think the statement is clear that it is premature to determine the disputed question of economic feasibility of the proposed project until the water rights in the lower basin are first determined, and that that basic question is reversed for future consideration.

SAM YORTY.

Key to United States Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an article appearing in the Christian Science Monitor by Joseph C. Harsch:

STATE OF THE NATION
(By Joseph C. Harsch)
KEY TO UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY

WASHINGTON.—The most revealing single passage in President Truman's April 11 radio address on foreign policy was the one which read:

"If they had followed the right policies in the 1930's—if the free countries had acted together to crush the aggression of the dictators, and if they had acted in the beginning when the aggression was small—there would probably have been no World War II.

"The beginning when the aggression was small," in the period which led down the sorry road to World War II, was in 1930, when Japan first tested the waters of aggression in Manchuria.

The historians and the diplomats who have gone back over the record of the pre-World War II period have inclined more and more to put their finger on that year as the place where history could have been shaped differently if the free countries had joined together to halt the first test of aggression instead of pulling apart and letting it happen.

The man who put his finger most emphatically upon that year and upon the story of inaction in the West was Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of State at the time in the Cabinet of President Hoover.

And it is to be noted that no other book on the history of that period so often is studied and quoted from by the present planners of our foreign policy as Mr. Stimson's book On Active Service.

In that book Mr. Stimson tells how he begged and pleaded and reasoned with Mr. Hoover to be allowed to use the military power of the United States in a common effort to halt that first case of aggression. He tells with cold disapproval of Mr. Hoover's refusal to allow him to move the Pacific Fleet beyond Pearl Harbor, and how his efforts to organize a collective front with the British broke down because he could do no more than bluff and because the British felt that a bluff was bound to fail.

Mr. Stimson is the real philosopher of postwar American foreign policy. His book is the textbook which has been consulted at every step down this other and different road. Dean Acheson is the foreign-policy disciple of Henry L. Stimson and President Truman is the convinced student.

To a large degree, the great debate through which we have just passed on European policy has been just another round in the old argument between the philosophy of Mr. Hoover and the philosophy of Mr. Stimson. The difference is that this time Mr. Hoover is not President and is not in a position to hold the fleet at Pearl Harbor. The students of Mr. Stimson are in office and have been willing to use the Army of the United States in Greece, the Air Force in the Berlin airlift, and all branches of our Armed Forces in Korea.

So far, the story this time is the reverse of the story of the 1930's. Everything Mr. Stimson wanted to do then and was denied permission to do by Mr. Hoover is being done now in spite of the protests of Mr. Hoover's friends and followers. That they do protest is the most natural thing in the world, because, if the Stimson plan of action succeeds in saving us from a third great world war, Mr. Stimson's stand in 1930 will be vindicated and Mr. Hoover's refuted.

The issue is not really between Democrats and Republicans. By political accident, it happens that Messrs. Truman and Acheson are the present executive heirs of the Stimson tradition. But General Eisenhower, John Foster Dulles, and Senators Lodge, Duff, and Morse—all Republicans—are just as much heirs of the same tradition. And the shadow of Theodore Roosevelt is behind the doctrines of Mr. Stimson.

The duel is between those who believe there can be security in isolation and those who believe there can be security only in collective resistance to aggression. The antagonists of the moment would appear to be General MacArthur and President Truman. The real antagonists today, as at every stage of the continuing great debate, are the philosophies of Herbert Hoover and Henry L. Stimson.

Arbor Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL STEFAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 19, 1951

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, each year, the State of Nebraska, whose Third District I have the privilege to serve, honors J. Sterling Morton, the father of Arbor Day. My State observes its yearly celebration of Arbor Day on the birthday of its founder, April 22.

The significance of what J. Sterling Morton did nearly four score years ago has been almost lost behind the silken mist of the poetry, legend, and emotionalism which is still—and justly so—part of Arbor Day.

What Morton—one-time Governor of Nebraska and one-time Secretary of Agriculture—really did was to give forest conservation back to the people. Successful conservation can only come from individual communities individually aroused. The great Nebraskan provided the spark which spread like a prairie fire across the country from ocean to ocean.

In 1682, when children who had landed at Plymouth Rock were still alive, William Penn decreed that an acre should be maintained in forest land for every five cleared in lands granted by him.

The Penn decree was issued in a community—an area which had not attained the working status of a true province.

Shortly after the acceptance by the original 13 States of the Constitution, in 1791, the Philadelphia Society for the Promotion of Agriculture offered medals for the planting of locust trees—a type of timber then in great demand.

The New York Society heard a committee report in 1795 recommending that inferior farm land be devoted to tree raising.

In 1804 the Massachusetts Society gave premiums for growing trees. This movement did not die out suddenly in Massachusetts. The Massachusetts State Legislature in 1817 asked its State department of agriculture to encourage tree planting, particularly the growing of oaks for ship timbers. Later, in 1837, the same State legislature authorized a survey of forest conditions in the State to induce landowners to consider the importance of continuing, improving, and enlarging the forests of the State.

Mr. Speaker, I want to point out at this time that the movements to preserve our forests, to increase them, which occurred immediately after the War of Independence arose from the people and were not imposed on the people. Side by side with this movement of community conservation there was arising still another force—the force of expanding Federal Government.

From 1799, when Congress authorized President Adams to buy reserves of live oak on the South Carolina and Georgia coasts, until the end of the War Between the States there was an almost unbroken record of Federal legislation pertaining to forests. Practically none of this legislation originated with the people most affected by the progressive elimination of forests—the communities actually dependent upon them. During that period Congress took it upon itself to think for the people rather than to represent the people.

War Between the States changed that. The popular voice raised from a matter of displeasure to a roar of discontent. One writer puts it this way:

> The heavy requirements for wood during the war and the extensive destruction in some areas by military operations, the rapid pace of lumbering in the Lakes States and the widespread destruction by forest fires, the growing realization of the relation of forests to stream flow and water supplies—all caused people to think about future timber supplies and the importance of forest cover.

Popular interest was further quickened by the paper by Rev. Frederick Starr in 1865 in which he advocated the immediate undertaking of Government research on how to manage forests and how to establish plantations.

Stirred on, perhaps, by the Starr report, the Wisconsin State Legislature set up a forest commission headed by I. A. Lapham in 1867. The Lapham commssion stressed the need for tree planting. This was in the very year when Nebraska became a full-fledged State.

In 1869, Maine appointed a commission on foreign policy.

Little permanent results came from the Wisconsin or the Maine effort, but better methods of transportation and the printing press spread the news over the Nation.

It requires no crystal ball to picture the resourceful J. Sterling Morton assemblying the forest story from all parts of the United States, analyzing it, and then—determining what was wrong and what must be done to right the wrong.

Let us try to follow his line of thought.

The Constitution has not changed. Over 80 years of assault from without and internal strife has not materially altered it. The Constitution arose from the people. It was not imposed on them. The Bill of Rights arose from the people. It was not imposed upon them. The amendments originated from sources other than the actual people he, J. Sterling Morton, could count on the fingers of one hand. Things which rise from the people endure. If conservation was to endure the determination to conserve forests, to plant trees, must arise from the people and not be thrust upon them from above or from without the community circle.

It must have been in this manner that J. Sterling Morton decided upon the absolute need of Arbor Day.

The first Arbor Day, April 10, 1872, saw more than a million trees planted in Nebraska.

Thirteen years later, in 1885, Governor Morton could tell the American Forestry Congress that Nebraska had more than 700,000 acres of planted trees.

J. Sterling Morton's reasoning paid off.

In 1949, 508 farmers in Nebraska and South Dakota were asked to place a cash value on trees. How much was their annual savings in their fuel bill alone due to windbreaks? Their answer? An average of $15.85.

In an experiment at Holdredge, Nebr., it was found by scientific measurement that trees used as windbreaks reduced fuel costs by 22.9 percent.

Livestock breeders in Nebraska estimated that windbreaks saved them through preserving feed and calf crops some $300 per year. Dairymen in the vicinity placed their savings from the same cause at $600 per year.

Farm families depend on gardens for much of their food. Most of them know the value of trees as a windbreak in increasing the crop from garden and orchard, as well as the quality of fruit and vegetable. Three hundred and twenty-three Nebraska farmers averaged a crop increase valued at $67.15 per year due to trees.

Yes; J. Sterling Morton's reasoning has certainly paid off—in practical cash returns as well as in beauty which may not be measured.

For April 22, 1951—Nebraska's Arbor Day—I have one thought, and that thought is a prayer:

May God bless the enduring memory of J. Sterling Morton, that great man who returned the major share in planting trees back to the people from whom that right was taken, the people to whom that right has always—and justly—belonged.

After the Tumult and Shouting

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an article by Lowell Mellett which appeared in the Evening Star on April 17, 1951:

AFTER THE TUMULT AND SHOUTING—MACARTHUR MAY DISAPPOINT POLITICAL PARTISANS SEEKING TO USE HIM FOR THEIR OWN PURPOSES

(By Lowell Mellett)

This week, the tumult and the shouting. This week, the hero's return and the admiring Nation's welcome. Next week and for many weeks to come, the sober business of deciding or trying to decide where we go from here. That, a matter of gravest importance, may depend to considerable extent on the hero himself, on his willingness to subordinate to the country's best interest his natural desire for personal vindication.

As the week began his willingness in this respect appeared open to some doubt. The chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee had wired General MacArthur an invitation to appear before the committee to testify and be questioned concerning the military situation in the Far East. Hearings on the subject had already been scheduled with Secretary of Defense Marshall as the first witness. The general in reply had informed Chairman RUSSELL that resolutions were pending in Congress inviting him to address a joint meeting of the House and Senate and until action had been taken on those resolutions he would deem it inappropriate to make any other plans.

Chairman RUSSELL, of course, was fully aware of the resolutions offered by the Republican leaders of the two Houses and, regardless of the spirit in which they were offered, he was as willing as anybody to see this courtesy extended to the general. What he proposed was in no way calculated to interfere with the general's big moment. And as a veteran legislator, the chairman could consider himself quite competent to judge of what is appropriate and what inappropriate in the matter of calling witnesses. His commitee has called lots of generals in the past and will call lots of them in the future.

What Chairman RUSSELL may have thought he didn't say immediately. Disposed to be charitable, he could have thought that the general had confused the United States Senate with the Japense Diet, to which he has habitually handed down the law. Disposed to be charitable in another direction, he may have got an inkling of the patience the President has exercised in his dealings with the general. But his colleagues in the Senate haven't the slightest doubt that in due course the Russell committee will expose the general to a searching examination, no matter how "inappropriate" that may seem to the general.

To be of real service to the country the general will have to respond to the questioning in the spirit in which it is advanced, an earnest desire to clear up the confusion that has been thrown around our far-eastern policy by his political friends. As the situation grows more ominous in Korea, this has become imperative. If the general takes counsel while in Washington with his old companions in arms and submits himself to the kind of briefing on the European and world situation that he seems never to have absorbed while in Tokyo, his experience and judgment can be turned to good account and he can reclaim the reputation of a selfless citizen as well as a brilliant soldier.

If the general, however, takes counsel only of a political group that has its sights set on a target no higher than next year's election he can only serve to confound the current confusion and make the implementation of any intelligent national policy almost impossible.

The political partisans want to use him. The hatchet, or egg-throwing, brigade want to make him their own. It is to be hoped that he understands, or comes quickly to understand, this element and is prepared to disappoint it.

Eagle Hearts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to pay tribute to the work of a great humanitarian organization, the Fraternal Order of Eagles.

UNIVERSITY OF WILLAMETTE LIBRARIES

I have the deep honor to be a member of the aerie of this organization in my home town of Crookston, Minn.

As an example of the constant effort of the Eagles to relieve human misery, I call your attention to the following article from April edition of the Eagle, its national publication. It concerns the fine work done by the Crookston Aerie in helping the Indians in northern Minnesota:

EAGLE HEARTS—THE SHIVERING CHIPPEWAS, FACING A CRUEL MINNESOTA WINTER, FOUND A TRUE SAMARITAN IN CROOKSTON AERIE

(By Ross O. Schmidt)

Most of America has just passed through a long and rugged winter. In the majority of States there have been record-breaking snowstorms and temperatures that have sent the thermometer dipping to below normal figures. Minnesota has had its share of cold weather and up near the Canadian border there were days when the cold was registered at 25, 35, and even 41 degrees below zero.

Such cold weather poses many problems, even when you have warm clothes to wear and comfortably steam-heated houses or apartments. It is much worse when you have to face such winter weather without shoes and overcoats and nice warm mufflers and mittens. This is the problem that faced the Chippewa Indians on the Red Lake Indian Reservation in Minnesota. The school kiddies just couldn't get to school because they didn't have enough warm clothes to go around.

The plight of the Indians in Minnesota was not overlooked because there is a fine branch of the Eagles, aerie 873, at Crookston, Minn. Brother HAROLD C. HAGEN, United States Representative in Congress from the Ninth Minnesota District, took the problem of the Indians on the Red Lake Reservation to his aerie. Congressman HAGEN told of the plight and hardships facing the Indians—told how the children were forced to stay out of school because of the lack of warm clothing.

It didn't take long for the hearts of the Crookston members to warm to this appeal and a drive was launched to collect clothing for the Indians, especially the children. The first drive was conducted last year and proved highly successful. This winter, with its record-breaking cold, the need was even greater, and Brother HAGEN again appealed to the Crookston aerie. Eagles and their families and friends responded with the result that a great quantity of blankets, scarfs, belts, socks, mittens, stockings, blouses, sweaters, shirts, shoes and boots, overshoes, rubbers, overcoats, underwear, jackets, pajamas, diapers, stocking caps, dresses, skirts, and overalls were donated.

The success of the drive was emphasized by George E. Saunders, superintendent of schools of Beltrami County, who was responsible for the distribution. Mr. Saunders, in a letter to the Crookston aerie, said:

"On behalf of the people of the Red Lake Indian Reservation, I wish to thank you and the good people of Crookston for the fine assortment of clothes you sent us.

"A large amount of the clothes have been given out and I am sure they were appreciated.

"It was wonderful of the people who donated the clothes to have them so clean and nice."

The Crookston Daily Times, in an article telling of the success of the drive, said:

"Drives come and go, but the recipients of gifts of good will from people of good will do not forget. We think those who gave to this cause will be warmed by the thought that the Indians of the Red Lake Reservation are warm this winter thanks to them."

The hearts of the members of the Crookston aerie and the hearts of all Eagles everywhere are warmed by the thought that these Indian children have not been forgotten and that our great order has been able to extend its services to these people who need it so badly.

The real spirit of eagledom was the inspiration for this great humanitarian undertaking, thanks to Brother HAGEN and his fellow members in the Crookston aerie.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat Believes "The Drastic Action by the President Was Justified"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL C. JONES

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. JONES of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it is news when the St. Louis Globe-Democrat admits that the President of the United States is right. Although as stated on its masthead, "The Globe-Democrat is an independent newspaper printing the news impartially, supporting what it believes to be right, and opposing what it believes to be wrong, without regard to party politics," it seems that the Globe-Democrat has almost without exception found some reason why it should not support President Truman, or his policies, and it is a rare occasion when the Globe-Democrat finds anything to commend which originates with a Democratic administration. Despite the fact that the Republican Party has seen fit to make a political issue out of President Truman's courageous action in risking what he knew would be immediate condemnation by those who have been and still are admirers of General MacArthur, I believe, as does the Globe-Democrat, that attention should be directed to the real issue in this action.

Certainly General MacArthur cannot recommend that every officer follow his example in setting himself up as a self-appointed diplomat, over and above his duties as a commander who is obligated to receive and execute the orders of his superiors. It is not a question of whether General MacArthur is correct in his appraisal of the situation in the Far East. It is not a question of whether or not the foreign policy which he recommends is the one the United States should adopt. The question is, Was General MacArthur right or wrong in departing from his military responsibilities to challenge the policies which had been adopted by the United Nations, the President, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the State Department?

A reading of the editorial from the Globe-Democrat should convince those who believe there must be a unity of purpose that General MacArthur, in order to be consistent with his 48 years of military experience, should have resigned his command before he committed the gravest sin in his own soldier's handbook—failure to obey orders.

The editorial follows:

MACARTHUR'S DISMISSAL

Seldom has American public opinion been so sharply divided as on the MacArthur issue, climaxed yesterday by President Truman's order that the recalcitrant general be removed immediately from his Far East commands. With some, regrettably, the issue involves politics, and that angle will be pursued relentlessly, we can be assured, to the end that the general may come home to blast the administration in public statements and addresses which may well figure in the 1952 election. But for most the issue is this: Was General MacArthur right or wrong in departing from his responsibility as a military commander to express sentiments on foreign policy and strategy that ran counter to those of the UN, the President, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the State Department Was he right or wrong when he became a self-appointed diplomat, over and above his duties as the commander of the United Nations forces in Korea?

With full appreciation of the general's high qualifications as a soldier and his eminent success in the rehabilitation of Japan, this newspaper believes the drastic action by the President was justified.

MacArthur was guilty of insubordination, which cannot be tolerated within the military set-up. He deliberately assumed authority in a field which was not his to command—the making of foreign policy. He violated the explicit orders of his Commander in Chief, a procedure he would not have countenanced for a minute by his subordinates. He flouted his superior command not once, but many times, and after several warnings.

He would have been removed months ago had not the President, with a wary regard for the political dynamite in such action, been well aware of the explosive content in the emotions of the American citizens. Now he has taken the long step with reluctance. MacArthur was and is on all counts the hottest potato Mr. Truman has been called on to handle.

General MacArthur expects to return to the States within 3 weeks. He may address a joint session of Congress and air his views on the entire Far East situation. His remarks, to Congress or otherwise, will attract the serious attention of every American citizen, and may serve to clarify White House thinking, or at least put its Korean policy in sharper focus. As a retired Army officer, he can speak without restraint—and doubtless will.

The most unfortunate aspect of the controversy is that in many respects the program which MacArthur championed, in defiance of the President, was realistic and logical. He would have been no soldier at all had he not chafed at the restrictions imposed on him in fighting the Reds in Korea. He was not permitted to bomb the supply concentrations of the enemy.

His UN directives were vague, never clearly detailed. He knew that a stalemate at the thirty-eighth parallel settled nothing, yet when he called for reinforcements to exploit the gains made in recent months, he was denied them. He wished to employ the Chinese Nationalists on Formosa either in Korea or in an assault on the Chinese mainland, but Washington did not approve.

This newspaper believes he was in error in stating that the place for a show-down with Russia is in Asia, that Europe is secondary.

But above all, there can be no denial that the general was the spectacular victim of a White House-State Department foreign policy that has been consistently inconsistent and vacillating. Neither MacArthur nor the American people have ever been clearly advised as to the precise program the administration has fixed for Far East operations.

Mr. Truman has repeatedly sought refuge in the United Nations when a forthright decision was required—and the impotent UN, timid and unenthusiastic, sat on its hands while the situation worsened.

The UN never had much stomach for the Korean police action. And when MacArthur became a problem child who threatened to involve the UN in a world war by operations against the stooges of Moscow, the Red Chinese, Great Britain, and France, in particular, were apprehensive and called for caution. Well they knew that if the United States went to war against Russia in the Orient we would not have enough men or matériel to do a good job of helping defend West Europe against Communist aggression. Presumably the President was influenced by British and French representations, and for good reason.

Technically, when the UN was committed to action in Korea, the war should have been directed by its Security Council. But this was impossible while Russia had a seat on that Council. Hence, the United States was given the job in view of our leadership in securing UN approval of the aggressor resolution and the preponderance of our commitments in men and matériel to that area. MacArthur's appointment was in line with that agreement.

But notwithstanding the frustration that plagued MacArthur, his conviction that our Far East policy was bungled and unrealistic, he was a soldier, subject to the same fundamentals of discipline as any private in the ranks. When he gave a command, it was obeyed or else. When he received a command, it was his duty to obey or take the consequences.

We understand that General Eisenhower, while in supreme command in Europe in the last war, did not approve of many things he was asked to do. Certainly, for instance, he believed the Western Allies should have been permitted to occupy Berlin instead of allowing the Russians to take it over, with results we all know. But Eisenhower had his orders and he followed them. MacArthur had his orders and he flouted them.

We by no means agree that the White House-State Department policy for the Far East has been without fault. Neither the President nor Secretary Acheson at any time have indicated they knew where they were going or how they expected to get there, and we can imagine MacArthur's soul writhing because of his conviction that he knew best.

But something that was earmarked as policy had the approval of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the President, both in superior command to MacArthur, and what they ordered he should have done his best to carry out. The proper place for him to lodge his protests was with the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the President, and it is their ultimate responsibility if they ignored him and adopted a plan that proved to be wrong.

Flamboyant critical statements from the battlefield, letters home to sympathetic friends who made them public, proposals to negotiate with the enemy at a time when, so the President says, the UN was well along toward an understanding with Red China—all these are extracurriculum procedures which are not a military prerogative. If every general in a war disdains orders and operates on his own and as he thinks best, the end result could be disaster.

The chain reaction of the MacArthur dismissal will be heard for many months. The general, now released from all restrictions, may be expected to speak his piece to the American public. He will have ample help in and outside Congress.

Basically, the general would expand the war, make the Far East the chief area of combat, as against the UN policy of isolating Korea and concentrating on the defense of Europe. It is difficult to see how those who agree with MacArthur that the war must be carried to China can in the same breath declare that his program must be followed to save the further slaughter of American soldiers.

General MacArthur makes his exit after 48 years in the Army service of his country. His achievements in the Pacific were historic; he was a brilliant occupation commander in Japan. It is unfortunate that he is compelled to quit under tortured circumstances.

Japan Under MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial entitled "Japan Under MacArthur," taken from the Evening Star of April 17:

JAPAN UNDER MACARTHUR

It is not surprising that hundreds of thousands of Japanese got up early in the morning and jammed Tokyo's streets to say a heartfelt good-by to General MacArthur. In paying him this tribute—the most impressive of its kind ever accorded a foreigner in that highly ceremonious land—they undoubtedly reflected the feelings of the overwhelming majority of their countrymen. At the same time, in thus displaying their affectionate and almost reverential regard for him as a person, they gave the world a striking measure of his great success in running the occupation as supreme commander for the Allied Powers.

That success has been obvious for some time past. Unlike Germany, Japan, after its defeat, was not partitioned into four parts and occupied by as many powers. Instead, it remained a unity, with American policy dominant, and General MacArthur—through his SCAP organization—brilliantly capitalized on that fact. With a personality perfectly tailored to the task, with administrative ability of the highest order, and with his extraordinary knowledge of the problems and psychology of Asia as a whole, he quickly shifted from the role of conqueror to the role of reconstructor, setting in rapid motion a Japanese military, social, political, economic, and spiritual revolution of the most far-reaching kind.

One of General MacArthur's first big successes was the program under which SCAP swiftly disarmed, demobilized, and returned to peaceful pursuits more than 6,000,000 Japanese troops. Similarly, through rigid controls and other means, he cut down the country's industrial potential for war. Beyond that, in a move without precedent in modern history, he saw to it that Japan adopted a constitution in which it bound itself never again to maintain an army, navy, or air force. Indeed, if anything, he did almost too good a job in carrying out his demilitarization directives, for the constitutional ban on the military has always seemed unrealistic in the teeth of the Soviet threat—a fact which he himself has implicitly acknowledged in his recent recommendations for limited rearmament.

In other respects, however, the constitution hammered out under General MacArthur's supervision is hardly open to question. Emperor worship, the warrior caste, feudalism, thought control, the secret police, and every kindred instrument of totalitarian regimentation and oppression have been swept away. In their place have been substituted such things as universal free education, collective bargaining for labor, the voting franchise for women as well as men, basic liberties like those of our own Bill of Rights, and similar fundamental constitutional guaranties reposing full sovereignty in the Japanese people, making them their own masters, placing them well on the road toward genuine democracy.

In line with all this, moreover, General MacArthur is to be credited with having hit hard at the excesses of the giant trusts of the Zaibatsu (the "money clique"), through which about a score of families used to control the economy of the entire country. He is to be credited, too, with having effected agrarian reforms that have emancipated millions of tenant farmers from serfdom by enabling them to buy and work their own land. Finally, in the over-all economic sphere, he has so effectively administered our American aid that Japan today—after having been flat on its back little more than 5 years ago—shows an index of industrial activity higher than prewar, and it conceivably may manage, if given some good breaks, to become self-supporting by the end of next year.

General MacArthur, in short, has had a tremendous, and on the whole very beneficent, impact on a nation of more than 70,000,000 people. History offers few, if any, examples quite like it. Japan, of course, is by no means out of the woods. Its democracy is still young. Its economic recovery is still tentative. Its social and spiritual transformation may yet prove to be more apparent than real. Yet, if it holds fast to the road that the great American "proconsul" has carved out for it, it can prosper in freedom. That is the immense contribution he has made to the life of the Japanese. Small wonder that many millions of them deeply regret his sudden departure.

A Newspaperman Passes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, among those who constantly serve our great Nation and who are among the many going about their daily tasks unsung, and often little rewarded, are the small-town newspaper publishers.

One such publisher was Mr. P. W. Kemp, former publisher of the Marshall County Banner at Argyle, Minn. Mr. Kemp passed away March 25 at the age of 75 years, 35 of which he published his newspaper.

The attached editorial is a tribute to Mr. Kemp and was written for the Banner by his successor, E. L. Holmlund. These beautiful words of tribute to Mr. Kemp are, in a way, a tribute to all small-town editors and publishers.

The editorial follows:

WE SORROW AS DEATH CLAIMS OUR PREDECESSOR

There are many things that for a small-town publisher are not the easiest things to do. But one of the most difficult tasks for him to perform is to chronicle the life and passing of a beloved friend and neighbor. Such is our task today, as we pause briefly to pay tribute to Mr. P. W. Kemp, our predecessor as publisher of the Banner, and for the past 8 years our mentor and very good friend. Percy, as we had learned to address him, seemed almost like a grandfather to us, so close had our associations become during these seemingly short 8 years.

It is no mere idle expression when it is said, "the community mourns the death of Percy Kemp." His was a full and busy life, and we like to think of him now as having gone to a well-earned rest and his reward.

He possessed the finest of qualities given to man. He was honest, thrifty, frugal, and hard working. When, as a young man he first engaged in the trade he loved, he related to us that he worked almost a full year without a cent of pay just for the privilege of learning the trade of being a newspaperman. As his community-wide associations broadened, he grew in stature, in mind, and in usefulness. He was public spirited, gave generously of his time to community matters, and his advice was sought because he had the respect of his neighbors. Percy was a "gentleman of the old school" who loved his fellow citizens. He was fearless and outspoken but he was a fair fighter, and many of those whom he fought the hardest were his most sincere admirers. He fought in the open, and there was never any doubt as to where he stood on any question of public interest.

Greatness is not always in the high places. It thrives in the hearts of real men in every walk of life. We think Mr. Kemp was one of them, and for this solemn occasion we'd like to close with this bit of verse:

"He is gone but not forgotten—
All his tasks on earth are done—
Hard he worked toward each endeavor
'Til his great reward was one.
See, he sleeps in peaceful comfort
And his loved ones shed a tear.
Gather closer, gather closer,
He has nothing now to fear
For he rests; he rests in comfort,
He has only gone to sleep.
We who loved him linger near him
But we do not need to weep.
—"Franklin Lee Stevenson."

General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MORGAN M. MOULDER
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. MOULDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial published in the Columbia Daily Tribune, of Columbia, Mo., on the subject of President Truman's action in removing Gen. Douglas MacArthur and replacing him with General Ridgway as our military leader and commander in the Far East:

[From the Columbia (Mo.) Daily Tribune of April 12, 1951]

OUT GOES THE GENERAL

In one of the most spectacular ousters in history, President Truman has relieved Gen. Douglas MacArthur of all his commands in the Far East.

Having decided to discipline the egotistical general, we believe President Truman was smart in firing him completely, because MacArthur is a person who brooks no compromise. You take him whole hog or none. To have relieved him of his Korean command and left him in charge of the Japense occupation would have left the door open for future trouble.

There is no clear-cut answer to the question of whether MacArthur is right or wrong in wanting to bomb Chinese bases and enlist the support of Chiang's Nationalist troops. But there is a clear-cut answer to the question of whether a man in MacArthur's position should arrogate to himself the responsibility and the power of dictating policy in the global strategy against Communist aggression. The answer is "No."

Rightly or wrongly, we are operating on the principle that the best way to achieve peace is through a world organization. The United States, together with many other nations, has solemnly accepted this proposition, and MacArthur is a soldier working under orders from this leadership. For a top general in a strategic theater to repeatedly challenge that accepted leadership not only precludes the possibility of any coordinated effort, it actually lends aid and comfort to the enemy.

Coming at this time, MacArthur's ouster will precipitate a storm of criticism around President Truman's head. In the eyes of his many worshipers, MacArthur is now a martyr. Truman is the Pontius Pilate. It would have been better—and equally appropriate—to have fired MacArthur last December after his ill-fated promise to bring the boys home by Christmas and while the Chinese hordes were sweeping over United Nations forces which MacArthur had unwisely spread thin over a broad and defenseless front. Truman might well have brought the general home by Christmas.

General MacArthur is now free to speak his piece. Let him lay his views before the country. If the American people are convinced, then they have the power to follow him—even to the point of deciding that to be bound by the leadership of a world organization composed of a lot of weak and indecisive allies is not the best way for the United States to get along in the world.

But meanwhile, let's operate as a team and according to the accepted rules.

Another Iowan Cries Out Against Bewilderment and Confusion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. R. GROSS
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, the letter which I am causing to be inserted here was written to me by a friend, John Fletcher, who for many years served as a district judge and attorney general in the State of Iowa.

Mr. Fletcher raises questions which have never been answered adequately either in or out of Congress. Bewilderment and confusion are abroad in this land today because of the failure on the part of responsible officials to answer these and other questions.

It is because I believe his thought-provoking letter is deserving of the consideration of others that I have caused it to be inserted in the RECORD. It follows:

MAPLETON, IOWA.

Hon. H. R. GROSS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: You know sometimes I sit around and think and again I just sit. Of late, like a lot of people, I'm bewildered about what has come over our Government. Everybody asks that question.

Unless someone steps forward to the front of the rostrum soon and explains better than it ever has been explained before what this war is about and why, then these American people are going to lose the last scintilla of the faith they have left in our system of government. This does not only apply to the so-called leaders of the administration but to the so-called leaders of the opposition as well.

Neither side answers the questions uppermost in the minds of the average citizen, viz: Is this war necessary? Has there been a good-faith effort by capable men to settle differences by peaceful means? If there has been the people are not advised.

The nations now at war are the United States and China. Have capable representatives of those two countries sat down around a table to discuss their differences in a real attempt to reach an agreement. I'm not talking about the so-called United Nations. That will never unite on anything so long as commercial achievement at any price is placed above the peace and happiness of the individual.

Are we not at war because those in charge want war? If so, why? Can we see an underlying reason for talking war and waging war?

If we stop waging war and talking war, how long would it take for this false economic structure we have been building up for the past 20 years to totally collapse? My own guess is that the collapse would come long before the 1952 elections if we stopped talking war today. There has never been a time since the last shot was fired in World War II that governmentally we have not talked war. Why?

Which would be harder on the American people, economic collapse, which must come eventually, or this war phobia that is destroying the faith of our citizens in their Government as one dedicated to peace and not to conquest of peoples of other nations who want their own kind of government whether it suits us or not.

I am, as you know, that last man who would believe in a communistic form of government but as a true American, I am the last man who would say peoples in other lands have not the right to adopt and live under their own form of government.

We have not set out to police people who are alone aggressors, but all people who believe in communism wherever they may be, whether peaceful or otherwise. We have so declared ourselves whether they are within our confines or live separate as a nation by themselves.

We not only continuously, as a Government, talk war but we are proselyting the people of other nations to become war-minded. We talk war, we eat war, we sleep war. Our topic everywhere is war. Do we actually know what we are doing to ourselves or do we care? Are we interested in the peace of the world or saving a vagabond's dream of an economic utopia where nobody works but everybody eats?

Every military nation since time began has eventually massacred its own citizenry—morally, socially, and economically—and has reduced it to the lowest form of peasantry and finally serfdom. Read your unbiased history since the fall of the Roman Empire down to A. D. 1951. Name one who survived.

What ended the 30 years of Scandinavian war? Poverty. What became of proud old England, the Empire on whose flag the sun never set? Its sun as a world power has set forever. What became of France that boasted the finest trained soldiery in the world? Too weak economically ever to try to defend itself. What of Italy, of the Kaiser's Germany, and of Hitler's Germany? The desire to whip and dictate to all the world killed them all. Great as we may be and feel, is there an answer for all in the history of the past?

A Nation such as ours might well maintain an Army of considerable size on our own soil and a good Navy and Air Corps so long as there is war and rumors of wars but why should we seek war when we are not assailed? I'm not talking isolation, I'm talking about howling for war and daring others to fight and insisting they arm for war. I remember when the American press praised Hitler's great peacetime army and how he was building a great economic Germany. Thousands of fine Americans paid the price of dismantling it with their lives. The citizenry of Germany will spend the lives of generations yet unborn to build back the destruction militarism caused their country. They had better faced the economic condition with stoicism and fortitude that would have earned the gratitude and praise of a friendly world but militarism lost their all.

Can 6 percent of the people of the world, great and resourceful as we may be, feed, clothe, house, educate, arm, train to fight, whip, and destroy at will the other 94 percent of the people?

I'm wondering if the influence of commercial greed doesn't weigh more with our so-called leaders than patriotic duty on both sides.

Wishing you every success, I am,

Yours very sincerely,

JOHN FLETCHER.

Support for MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PATRICK J. HILLINGS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. HILLINGS. Mr. Speaker, the Congress today, April 19, 1951, has heard Gen. Douglas MacArthur address a joint meeting and discuss the conduct of the war in Korea. Along with other Members of the Congress, I was deeply impressed by the wisdom and sincerity of his words.

Among other things, General MacArthur advocated the use of the Chinese Nationalist military forces against the forces of the Communist enemy. I wish to inform the Members of the House that on April 12, 1951, the Senate of the State of California passed a resolution relative to the use of Chinese Nationalist troops in combat against the Chinese Communists.

The resolution follows:

Senate Resolution 114

Resolution relative to the use of Chinese Nationalist troops in combat against Chinese Communists

Whereas during the past few days California's National Guard, Fortieth Division, arrived in Japan; and

Whereas President Harry S. Truman has seen fit to relieve General of the Army Douglas MacArthur of all authority as commander of United Nations forces in Korea, commander of United States military forces, Far East theater, for alleged noncooperation; and

Whereas General MacArthur has advocated the use of Chinese Nationalist military troops in combat against Chinese Communist military forces; and

Whereas such dismissal indicates an opinion of the President of the United States to refuse to allow Chinese Nationalist troops to aid and assist United States military forces presently engaged in combat against Communist military units in Korea; and

Whereas the Senate of the State of California recognizes that the military action in Korea is but a battle in the war against communism; and

Whereas the Chinese Nationalist Army leaders have indicated their desire to aid and assist United States forces in engaging in combat for the purposes of defeating and destroying the Chinese Communist military forces; and

Whereas all governments of nations desirous of joining in a crusade to destroy communistic aggressors should be encouraged and utilized to the end that the majority of lives sacrificed in the present conflict against the Chinese Communist troops should not be drawn in vast measure from American military personnel, and in particular the anticipated use of the California Fortieth National Guard Division: Therefore

The Senate of the State of California respectfully memorializes the President of the United States to seriously reexamine the desirability of permitting the use of Chinese Nationalist military forces in the common cause of destroying Chinese Communist aggression in Asia, and the utilization of Chinese Nationalist troops prior to, or in conjunction with, utilization of California Fortieth National Guard Division in combat.

J. A. BEEK,
Secretary of the Senate.

Credit Due Joseph P. Kennedy for Part in the Great Debate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, the great debate has waxed and waned in Congress, and I think the people are due some explanation as to the concepts and origins of the movement toward conservation of our manpower and resources.

These conservationists have been misnamed isolationists, and the connotation of the word has given the general public the erroneous idea that an isolationist is an ostrich with his head buried in the sand.

The conservationist of our blood and treasure, of our manpower, and our resources—which I might add are not unlimited—is not an isolationist nor an ostrich.

He is in allegory an American eagle; watchful, sane, faithful, fierce. He guards his own domain.

As we look back over the great debate, we find a singular figure as responsible for it.

He is Joseph P. Kennedy, former Ambassador to Great Britain.

Mr. Kennedy has been of the opinion for a long time that we can weaken ourselves to the point of emaciation by our foreign adventures.

His philosophy appears to agree with that of George Washington, and I suppose his critics will find ways to blame him for that.

We all know that Mr. Kennedy is one of the closest advisers of former President Herbert Hoover and counseled him to emerge from retirement to his present position of elder statesman. Mr. Kennedy was the activating force in the Hoover plan. He is a human dynamo, as his career shows, and just the man to furnish the string to Mr. Hoover's bow.

It will be recalled that the great debate was opened by Mr. Kennedy's speech at the University of Virginia. It was followed by Mr. Hoover's speech, and the momentum of the issue carried it into the Senate. If there were a medal of honor for civilians, it should have been awarded to these two men.

One of the profound features of Mr. Kennedy's views is the conviction that to commit too much of our power abroad will play into Russia's hands for a quick and decisive victory.

Europe is her front yard and she can crush almost anything by land power.

We can defeat any aggressor who defies our combined land, sea, and air power.

By getting us to commit most of our land power in Europe, he has us in her lap. We can be beautifully booby-trapped.

More and more people are beginning to believe that, although we should fight aggression, we should not commit all of our strength in an area where we are at the greatest disadvantage.

If Mr. Kennedy had not made the effort, the great debate would not have been sparked. And, if the debate had not taken place, the issue of overseas commitments might never have reached a limit.

Truman's Appeasement of the Communists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, why continue Mr. Truman's war against overwhelming Communists and at the same time let them win a victory through appeasement? David Lawrence expresses Mr. Truman's inconsistency in the following words:

DENIALS OF APPEASEMENT BELIED—KOREAN REPUBLIC WILL BE THROWN TO WOLVES BY DIPLOMACY UNLESS UNITED STATES PUBLIC ACTS

President Truman keeps on denying in his speeches that there is any appeasement of the Communists intended, but the fact remains that in the State Department a plan to do what really amounts to an appeasement of Communist China is being hatched.

The first public intimation that appeasement was in the wind came, strangely enough, in a White House release of a message that was sent by the Joint Chiefs of Staff on March 20 to General MacArthur. The real purpose in releasing the message—if it wasn't done accidentally—was to show that General MacArthur jumped the gun, so to speak, when he broadcast directly his appeal to the Chinese Communist military commander to agree to an armistice.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

The stories have been widely disseminated by administration supporters that General MacArthur stole the thunder of the Government back home by making an appeal to his opposite military commander similar to that which the State Department intended to make through the UN and that he followed the wording closely. It has been asserted, moreover, that the policy in question was cleared with the United Nations and that General MacArthur spilled the beans.

There is not a scintilla of truth in either of these allegations. The message of March 20 is bound to become a historic document not only because it shows there was no United Nations policy or decision by the American Government but because it shows that the State Department was telling General MacArthur to deploy his troops in some sort of confusing military operation whereby he didn't advance but yet maintained contact with the enemy while the diplomats were to talk for a few weeks.

Here is the text of that message:

"To the Commander in Chief, Far East, from the Joint Chiefs of Staff in Washington.

"State [Department] planning Presidential announcement shortly that, with [the] clearing of the bulk of South Korea of aggressors, United Nations [are] now preparing to discuss conditions of settlement in Korea. Strong feeling persists that further diplomatic effort toward settlement should be made before any advance with major forces north of [the] thirty-eighth parallel. Time will be required to determine diplomatic reactions and permit new negotiations that may develop. Recognizing that [the thirty-eighth] parallel has no military significance, [the] State [Department] has asked the Joint Chiefs of Staff what authority you should have to permit sufficient freedom of action for [the] next few weeks to provide security for [the] UN forces and maintain contact with [the] enemy. Your recommendations [are] desired."

The foregoing shows how speculative and vague the State Department's plan was. It does not reveal the basis, if any, which the State Department had for virtually ordering American troops to stand still and be shot at while diplomats talked even though the enemy had not agreed to hold his fire. Every piece of evidence thus far from press dispatches and from Trygve Lie, Secretary-General of the United Nations, reveals that the Communist Government at Peiping has rebuffed every effort to talk peace and has lately refused even to make appointments at the Chinese Foreign Office with diplomatic representatives there from Britain, India, and Sweden to talk about the subject. Why was the State Department so anxious to stop our side from fighting while it did a job of palavering with other governments? The only answer is that an appeasement program is in the works. Here are its details:

A cease-fire line in a zigzag direction a few miles north and also a few miles south of the thirty-eighth parallel is to be the armistice line. This is supposed to be our victory line. When we gain that line, as General Ridgway in his political statement on March 12 said, America and the United Nations will have gained a victory.

The rest, it seems, is to be left to diplomacy. Thus is the Korean Republic to be thrown to the Communist wolves. Thus also is the UN to accept the thirty-eighth parallel line as all that it ever achieved since last June against the aggressor even though the UN branded Red China as an aggressor and is supposed to have resolved at one time to liberate all Korea. But the new plan presupposes that no liberation by military means can be achieved and that attainment of the barrier at the thirty-eighth parallel is the substitute.

The legal basis for the plan is that, our military objective having been attained, the political objective is a matter for UN determination. The idea of an independent, united Korea is to be left to diplomatic negotiations with Red China presumably over a long period of time. Thus 60,000 casualties will have been suffered by the American Government just to maintain the thirty-eighth parallel and to admit that the UN could not push the aggressor out of Korea but must let him stay where he started from last June—ready, perhaps, to jump across the parallel at any time. The Red Chinese have said all foreign troops must be withdrawn and this presumably means the Communist North Koreans of course will remain. That's the appeasement plan. It will of course be denied that this is appeasement. But this was what was planned before General MacArthur was fired. Maybe it will not materialize now because American public opinion may prevent it from being consummated.

Mr. Speaker, why should we continue to meddle in foreign affairs? Why should we not follow the advice of Washington and Thomas Jefferson, keep our men from fighting in futile wars, wherever and whenever some other nation seeks to use us to their own advantage?

Red China Is Too High a Price for a Truce in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include a timely editorial appearing in this week's issue of the Saturday Evening Post:

RED CHINA IS TOO HIGH A PRICE FOR A TRUCE IN KOREA

It's a solid bet that General MacArthur's statement of March 24 didn't burn up the State Department because it suggested the possibility of a military truce in Korea, or even because it hinted at attacks on the bases from which the Chinese Reds spark their attacks on United Nations forces. The general's offense was that he put his finger on the State Department's secret shame—namely, its apparently persistent determination to sell Formosa to the Communists and admit said Communists into the UN, as the price of a shaky peace in Korea.

MacArthur said: "There should be no insuperable difficulty in arriving at decisions on the Korean problem if the issues are resolved on their own merits without being burdened by extraneous matters not directly related to Korea, such as Formosa and China's seat in the United Nations."

This frank and obviously sound observation recalled the United Nations cease-fire proposal of January—for some reason or other concurred in by the United States—which suggested that a conference including Russia and Red China be called to settle Asiatic problems, including, among others, those of Formosa and of representation of China in the United Nations.

Fortunately, the open intervention of Red China in Korea made it difficult to go on with this monkey business, and most people assumed the proposal was a dead pigeon. The ire in the State Department suggests that it isn't; that the Acheson-Jessup zeal for a bad bargain with communism in Asia is as hearty as ever. Anyway, we ought to know soon.

As one ground for suspicion, James Reston, of the New York Times, who often reflects State Department thinking, wrote in his dispatch on the MacArthur statement: "As a matter of fact, the longer the war in Korea has continued, the less confidence there is in official quarters here that any solution can be found on any other basis than the above"—that is, a deal on Formosa and a Red seat in UN.

Most people, of course, agree that political decisions are not for military commanders to make and General MacArthur's proposal for a field armistice was made in full recognition of that fact. However, it is easy to understand that a commander in the field who has at least twice been deterred from pursuing the Red aggressor to his lair might be tempted to use this device to learn whether the war in Korea is something more conclusive than "Operation Killer" or is only a prelude to vast and unnecessary concessions in Asia.

Anyway, it would be a good idea to let the American people in on what's cooking. There is certainly no sentiment for a deal by which, in exchange for a hunk of Korea, which has little military importance, we would (1) hand over Formosa, which has vital strategic importance, and (2) consent to admission into the United Nations of the Chinese People's Republic. In other words, to end a war that we are at least not losing, we would hand over political and military advantages which would make it all but impossible to remain in the western Pacific at all.

But who says we can't end the Korean War on a decent basis, without surrendering our honor or future security? On March 24, MacArthur thought we could. What was wrong with letting him try?

United States Workers' Morale

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, we are always concerned with the morale of American workers. There are countless debates on the floor of this House concerning the problems of labor, but it seems we worry only about labor employed by private industry and forget all about the thousands of workers employed by the United States Government.

I think it is time we consider the morale of our own employees if we want to maintain adequate standards in the performance of Government duties. The question of the morale of United States workers has been expertly discussed by Joseph Young, writer for the Washington Sunday Star in an article in that paper on April 8. I recommend this article to the attention of the Members.

It follows:

UNITED STATES WORKERS' MORALE SUFFERS AS A RESULT OF WAR OF NERVES

(By Joseph Young)

Federal employee leaders charge that Government morale is suffering as a result of the war of nerves being waged against Federal workers.

They declare various moves in Congress as well as in the executive department to reduce employee benefits and privileges, plus adverse personnel restrictions already in effect, are causing unrest among employees.

The A. F. of L. Government Employees Council, which is composed of 22 unions with a Federal employee membership of 500,000 declares morale is at a low ebb.

Employee officials say this results from many conditions. Among them they name the moves in Congress to reduce annual and sick leave benefits and lower overtime payments. The stalling tactics by the administration and the House Civil Service Committee on the Federal pay-raise measure is another reason cited. And the proposal to work employees on around-the-clock shifts isn't helping employee morale, they say.

In addition, the present ban on permanent appointments, promotions and transfers in Government is hurting morale, they charge.

The attempts being made by the Defense Department to freeze its employees in their jobs and prevent them from transferring to other Government agencies are also cited as causing great employee dissatisfaction.

RELATIONSHIP TERRIBLE

A top employee leader put it this way: "The management-employee relationship in Government is terrible. Part of the blame rests with Congress and part with the executive branch.

"Where in private industry do you see attempts made to reduce employee benefits? The pattern is just the opposite. Employee benefits are constantly increased rather than decreased.

"This is sound management policy and business knows it. Yet here we have Congress and some parts of the executive branch of Government trying to reduce benefits.

"We're not saying that there aren't some things wrong in Government and that economies should not be made. But why take it out on the employee?

"Why take away vacation and sick leave benefits that employees have had for years? Any money that would be saved by such action would be more than lost by the resignation of top-flight people in Government who would quit in disgust. It's common knowledge that a lot of our top scientific, technical, and professional personnel have been recruited into Government and have remained, not for the money involved, but for the liberal vacation and sick-leave benefits."

OVERTIME PAY ATTACKED

"The same goes for attempts to reduce overtime payments and other benefits. As for overtime, Government employees already receive far less than the time-and-one-half overtime payments that is the law of the land for workers in private industry. And now some Members of Congress want to reduce these payments still further."

Employee leaders also sharply criticize lack of action on Federal pay legislation, declaring that it is terribly discouraging for Government workers to see private industry workers secure cost-of-living pay boosts while they receive none.

Of course some of the moves to cut benefits, such as the one to reduce overtime payments, in all probability won't succeed. But the move to cut annual and sick-leave benefits is a serious one and is backed by many Members of Congress.

Employee officials say that the average Government worker is trying to do a conscientious job to help his country in the national emergency program as well as to serve the public. But they declare that it cannot be expected that employees will do their best work while they are under constant badgering and threats.

Address by Hon. Lister Hill, of Alabama, at Dedication of Kings Daughters' Hospital, Staunton, Va., and Introductory Remarks by Hon. A. Willis Robertson, of Virginia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the speech made by Senator LISTER HILL, of Alabama, at the dedication of the King's Daughters' Hospital, Staunton, Va., April 15, 1951, and the remarks I made in introducing him.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS OF HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON, OF VIRGINIA, INTRODUCING HON. LISTER HILL, OF ALABAMA, AT THE DEDICATION OF THE NEW KING'S DAUGHTERS' HOSPITAL, STAUNTON, VA., APRIL 15, 1951

A kind and gracious providence has smiled upon us as we gather today to dedicate an institution of peace and to pay tribute to an undertaking in the realm of humanitarianism. May the sentiments for peace in the world that today rise up in our hearts ascend to that judgment throne where Staunton's Woodrow Wilson said, "Justice and mercy are reconciled and the Judge and brother are one." I coveted this opportunity to warmly congratulate the good people of Staunton, Augusta, and Highland on their remarkable achievement of financing a two and a half million dollar hospital which has equipment and facilities that are the equal of any in the Commonwealth.

One of my most prized possessions is a miniature of my mother made when she was 17 years old and a student at the Female Institute in Staunton, now called Stuart Hall. Last fall she died at the age of 92. On her ninetieth birthday she told me that she had lived through four wars and that was enough war for one lifetime. Her father and nine of his brothers served in the Confederate Army. Five of them were killed. In those days a serious battle wound meant death, a tragic reminder of the fact that throughout recorded history man has placed more emphasis upon killing than upon curing his fellow man.

Long before my mother came to Staunton this historic city had become known to the medical profession through the outstanding work of Dr. Alexander Humphreys, a graduate of the University of Edinburgh. In the days of Dr. Humphreys there was no medical school in Virginia or the South and no training school for nurses. Virginia doctors trained abroad would train Virginia boys who desired to practice medicine.

In a remarkable address this morning Dr. Richard Bell told of five boys who were trained by Dr. Humphreys, all of whom became famous. One of them was William Henry Harrison, of Charles City County, Va., who became President of the United States, and another was Ephriam McDowell, who was born in Fairfield, Va., then a part of Augusta County, and after studying at the University of Edinburgh, located in Kentucky for the practice of medicine. In 1809 he performed the famous abdominal operation on Mrs. Crawford and is properly called the father of abdominal surgery. Dr. Ephriam McDowell represents the great State of Kentucky in the Congressional Hall of Fame.

The dedication of this wonderful new hospital illustrates how deeply indebted we are to a city that even in Colonial days was a pioneer in medical science and to the public-spirited women of a previous generation who had a vision of practical Christianity.

Hundreds of years before Christ the temples of Saturn were used as medical schools. But hospitals as we now know them were not established until the fourth century A. D. and in Europe dated largely from the fifteenth century. Not until the eighteenth century were there any hospitals outside of the big cities, and that was true of Virginia even in the nineteenth century. It was not until the latter part of the nineteenth century that we had trained nurses for hospital service. Florence Nightingale began her memorable study of hospitals and hospital nursing in 1854 when England was stirred by reports of the suffering of wounded soldiers in the Crimean War. When Florence Nightingale returned from the Crimean War, after saving many of those wounded in the bloody battle of Balaclava, Queen Victoria instituted a reform in all military hospitals and in 1887 devoted a fund of $350,000 to a training institution for nurses along the lines advocated by Florence Nightingale.

About that time a Christian organization dedicated to welfare work and the care of the lame, the halt, and the blind known as the International Order of King's Daughters and Sons was formed. It was composed of those who acknowledged Christ as King and who were willing to carry on His work. A chapter of that organization was formed in Staunton, and in 1896 it founded the King's Daughters Hospital. That was the first general hospital in the valley, and in the entire State there were only seven more.

The hospital we are to dedicate today is the outgrowth of the efforts of consecrated men and women of Staunton who believe that we build in vain a temple of peace that is not dedicated to the victory of spiritual force and the principles of the Prince of Peace.

For these memorable ceremonies we are indeed fortunate to have as our guest speaker a distinguished statesman from Alabama, who, first as a Member of the House and later as a Member of the Senate, has recognized the need for hospitals and medical care and who sponsored the first bill ever passed by the Congress of the United States to make grants-in-aid to localities for hospital construction.

Our guest speaker, in keeping with his program to promote the welfare of the masses, was author of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act to create a Federal yardstick to determine the proper cost of hydroelectric energy and of the Rural Telephone Act. He also has been coauthor of the Farm Housing Act, Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, of the school-lunch program, voluntary health insurance bill, local public health units bill, child health services bill, Federal aid to education, Vocational Education Act of 1946, General Housing Act, the GI bill of rights, and numerous other measures of national import.

As a member of the Senate Labor Committee he endeared himself to his southern colleagues through the preparation of the minority report against FEPC, which Senator

UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN LIBRARIES

UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA LIBRARIES

RUSSELL of Georgia, termed "a jewel." But it is the Hill-Burton Act by which he is best known to all Virginians interested in a modern hospital program. His standing in the Senate is evidenced by the fact that from 1940 to 1946 he was the Democratic whip, voluntarily relinquishing that important assignment because of the press of his other senatorial duties.

No doubt from his great grandfather Rev. William W. Hill, and his grandfather, Rev. L. L. Hill, both pioneer Methodist ministers in Alabama, he inherited a zeal for promoting the welfare of the masses and from his father, Dr. Luther Leonidas Hill, of Montgomery, one of the South's foremost surgeons, his interest in medical education and medical care. From his grandfather on his mother's side, Mark Lyons, of Mobile, who fought under Albert Sidney Johnston, he inherited his love for Robert E. Lee and the fundamental principle of State's rights.

It gives me great pleasure to present to you my friend and Senate colleague, Hon. LISTER HILL, of Alabama.

SPEECH OF HON. LISTER HILL, OF ALABAMA, AT THE DEDICATION OF THE KING'S DAUGHTERS' HOSPITAL, STAUNTON, VA.

It is pleasant to be in Staunton today on this fine occasion. I want to thank you for letting me come and be with you for the dedication of your magnificent new King's Daughters' Hospital.

I always feel an inspiration when I come to Virginia. The loveliness of the Shenandoah Valley through which I have been traveling this morning is representative of the beauty of Virginia's countryside.

As I drove along I thought not only of Jefferson, Madison, Monroe and the other great and illustrious Virginia sons who made such mighty contributions to the building of our Nation—I thought how particularly fitting that this hospital, Virginia's first completely new hospital to be started under the Hospital Survey and Construction Act should be erected in this lovely city that gave us three great doctors, Alexander Humphries, teacher of that pioneer in abdominal surgery, Ephraim McDowell, and that immortal doctor of humanities, Woodrow Wilson.

I am happy to be here in the home State of my good friends and esteemed colleagues, your able and distinguished Senators, HARRY BYRD and WILLIS ROBERTSON. It is good that Senator ROBERTSON can be with us. Senator BYRD told me of his disappointment over his inability to be here.

You who have watched this hospital grow day by day and stone by stone have the immeasurable satisfaction of knowing that the hospital is your hospital—the product of your planning, your energies, and your devotion. It is the product of the splendid vision and untiring labors of Mrs. Herbert Smith and your other hospital trustees and hospital officials. I commend and congratulate each of you.

This hospital marks a new day of medical care for the people of Staunton, Augusta County, and the surrounding area. It will give them the finest medical and surgical care. No resources of time and money, of architectural planning or materials have been spared to make this hospital the most modern, the best-equipped hospital of its kind.

Here are operating rooms, laboratories, obstetrical and pediatric rooms; departments for physical therapy, and emergency and clinical treatment. Here is the finest X-ray equipment for treating cancer and other diseases. The broad grounds and spacious sundeck of this hospital offer the convalescent the healing, strengthening benefits of light and air and sunshine in pleasant surroundings.

In building your hospital you confirm the wisdom of our Hospital Act—the wisdom of helping the people to do for themselves. You show that when the Government helps to meet the need for hospitals by providing assistance grants, the people, with their sense of local responsibility and local leadership, are eager to meet the opportunity and build their own hospitals.

This hospital is built for the future. And even as its doors are opened, I urge you to draw again upon that fine cooperative spirit that brought it into being, to move on to the next vital step for securing its benefits to all the people—the step of integrating voluntary health insurance facilities with your hospital.

I like to use as an illustration of the practical accomplishment of this kind of integration the case of the Lanier Memorial Hospital in my own State of Alabama. Constructed under the same Hospital Act, this hospital opened its doors about 18 months ago. Around the hospital, as the medical center of another lovely valley community, has been built a voluntary system of prepaid health insurance that insures the people that at all times they can receive hospital and medical care without sudden financial burden.

This Alabama community in its accomplishment, has offered as a pattern for all the Nation, the objective of our voluntary health insurance bill in Congress. What they are doing bears out our faith in the voluntary methods of democracy. It supports our confidence in the ability of the people to act for themselves and to provide medical care for themselves by preserving and strengthening and building upon our free American medical system, without compulsion and without reliance upon a socialized system.

We are often reminded that too little thought and effort are being devoted to our health—our most vital personal and national resource. I imagine General Opie, who has given so unstintingly of his time to the building of this hospital, could tell us a great deal about the miracles of modern medicine in rescuing the lives of battle casualties and of the rate at which disease is weakening our manpower resources. He could tell us that the physical rejection rate today under selective service is higher than during World War II. Since Korea the equivalent of 17 infantry divisions have been rejected for physical defects. Think of it. Three hundred thousand young men between the ages of 19 and 25—the flower of our defense manpower—found physically unfit to serve. What better warning do we need before we move on all fronts to correct this appalling situation caused in such large measure by neglect of our Nation's health.

When I talk about health and what we must do for the health of our people, I like to speak of the six pillars of health—doctors, hospitals, preventive medicine, research, education, and the soil—each vital to every one of us and to the Nation's well being.

You have good doctors here in this great section of the Shenandoah Valley. This hospital will help to insure that you continue to have good doctors. But throughout the Nation there is a serious shortage of both hospital and medical personnel. We must train more doctors, dentists, nurses, and medical technicians. We must follow your example and build the hospitals we need to give all our people adequate hospital service.

The marvelous strides that we have made against typhoid fever, scarlet fever, diphtheria, malaria, smallpox, pellagra, and other such diseases is proof of what can be accomplished through our public health services in the field of preventive medicine. We must provide urgently needed help to the States, their counties, and cities in their never-ending struggle against disease—cancer, heart disease, tuberculosis, mental disease, infantile paralysis. We must help them in the advancement of such specialized programs as maternal and child care.

We must provide more intense and greater research to study the causes of disease and to bring forth new discoveries for prevention and cure. Surely a nation that can produce the atomic bomb can find the cause and cure for cancer.

I wonder if you were surprised when I named the soil as one of the pillars of health. You and I know what happens to an automobile if we put the wrong kind of oil in it, or if we get grit in the gasoline. The same thing applies to the machinery of the human body. The right food that we put into our bodies makes for health and strength. The wrong food makes for weakness and sickness. The minerals and nutrients which feed and make up our bodies come to us from the plants and products of the soil. More and more doctors and scientists attribute diseases to deficiencies of minerals in our soil.

Down in Deaf Smith County, Tex., they have no decay of the teeth because the minerals in the soil of that county prevent such decay. Missouri does not just happen to be a mule-raising section. It produces big, tough mules because of the phosphorous and other minerals in its soil.

And so the farmer in his farming practices and soil conservation is working and contributing to your health and my health and the health of all our people. That is why it is so important that we continue to help the farmer in his soil conservation. In helping him we are helping all.

Education is essential to health. Health and education go hand in hand. It is the educated person who knows best how to take care of himself and preserve his health. The more uneducated and illiterate people are, the more sickness and disease we find among them. We must make certain that America's children, tomorrow's citizens and defenders of our democracy, have the opportunity for the education that will equip them for the responsibilities of citizenship and the building of lasting peace.

These are six pillars of health. All must be strong if our people are to be strong and healthy and we are to have a strong America.

The great hope of all of us today is for peace. And our hope for building and keeping the peace lies in a strong America. America must be strong in her Armed Forces, her armed might. She must be strong in her economy and strong in the united determination of her people to save and build the peace.

We know that during the last war the final victory of our fighting forces was made possible by production. American workers and American management produced more war materials than the rest of the world combined. American farmers pushed food and fiber production to record heights.

As we produced to win the war, we must produce today to defend our freedom and win the peace. As you increase the harvest of your acres here in the Shenandoah Valley, as you increase the production in your mills and factories, you can know that you are waging the fight for peace and freedom in the spirit of your own great son, Woodrow Wilson, who gave us these words—the finest tribute ever paid to a people:

"There is one thing that the American people always rise to and extend their hand to, and that is the truth of justice and of liberty and of peace. We have accepted that truth and we are going to be led by it, and it is going to lead us, and through us the world, out into pastures of quietness and peace such as the world never dreamed of before."

This afternoon as we dedicate your beautiful hospital, we know that this is the Sabbath Day, the day of Him whom we call the Great Physician, of Him whom we call the Prince of Peace. In His name and in His spirit, let us dedicate this hospital, setting an example to all Virginia and to all the Nation that as we shall follow in His footsteps by healing the sick and binding up their wounds, so shall we follow in His footsteps in the building of the peace of the world.

Letter From a Soldier in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOWARD H. BAKER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include therein a letter from a member of our fighting force in Korea to his commanding officer in World War II who is a constituent and a valued friend of mine. The letter without the names of the parties and the location of the fighting force deleted is as follows:

At the present time our regiment is in ——— reserve. After our push up to Chunchon we were pulled out into reserve.

I believe our reserve time is just about up now. Not much activity along the front, just light action and naturally very heavy patrolling. I imagine by the time you receive this letter something will have happened one way or the other. I look for the Chinese to start an offensive before long.

———, this is an entirely different war than the one we fought in Germany. These people (Chinese) are fanatics. They have to be dug out, and I mean dug.

The weather is fairly nice now, I am sure thankful for that, because the past winter was rough. Thought I would freeze in spite of everything. It's nice now; not very cold at all.

I have been in Korea 4½ months. When I left Japan in November I was assigned to the ——— division, but when I got to Korea, they assigned me to the ——— and I have been here ever since. I am first sergeant of this company. It's not a bad job, as all the communications jobs are filled, and have been. Got a large company, and a good one. This sure is a fighting outfit. None of us are happy here, and don't enjoy it a bit; but as long as we have to be here we will do our best.

Something ought to be done for some of these boys over here. There are men here who have been over here over 8 months, and ———, they are shot. I've got some boys who are just kids, and they have been up front so long they aren't going to make it much longer. I can't understand what is wrong with the Army. If the Chinese don't kill these men, the Army will. I know there are more men than that in the Army. I don't suppose I will ever be in a position to do anything about this; but my one vote will sure go in the opposite direction, next time. I've seen them crack up. I've seen them brought into the aid station wounded for life, and I've seen the dead ones. I know we are fighting for what is right; but I can't see letting the same ones do it all the time. These poor kids will never be the same again, and if I ever get out of Army this time, I never want anything whatsoever to do with it. You should hear these boys cough at night. I know I am bitter, but not because of myself; but for what I have seen in Korea. It's a dirty stinking mess. The Army isn't what it was when you and I were in before.

It's just about dark and I will have to close. I shall try and write you occasionally. Take it easy and pray for us.

Mr. Speaker, my constituent who has a distingushed record in World War II, informs me that the man who wrote this letter, who is also a citizen of the Second Congressional District of Tennessee which I have the honor of representing, spent 5 years or 6 years in the Army serving throughout World War II, staying in the Reserves after leaving active duty, that he has a wife and one child and that after some 5 years of civilian life he was recalled to active duty, given 9 days' training, and shipped to the Pacific theater.

Mr. Speaker, these men who are going through the horrors of Korea must be relieved. The heritage and history of America is too great to permit this condition to continue.

Mrs. John F. O'Brien, Jr.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, it is a source of personal pride, privilege, and satisfaction to be able to number among my constituents Mrs. John F. O'Brien, Jr., an outstanding American—an outstanding citizen of the city of Newark, N. J. For many, many years Mrs. O'Brien has devoted herself unselfishly and untiringly in the interest of her fellow man. No matter what effort was entailed, so long as the welfare of others was concerned, Mrs. O'Brien, in the true Christian spirit, has always responded to the call.

Some years ago the citizenry of Newark in recognition of her great services had her proclaimed as a real humanitarian. Mrs. O'Brien might easily have rested on this well-deserved distinction, but, instead in a self-effacing manner, she carried on—and her good works multiplied. She continued to bring solace to the afflicted and comfort and assistance to the needy. The governing body of the city of Newark has held it fitting to issue a proclamation, designating April 15 Angel Day in honor of the Angel of Newark—Mrs. John F. O'Brien.

I join in the sentiment expressed in this fitting tribute and under leave to extend my remarks, I would like to include a proclamation issued by Mayor Ralph A. Villani, of Newark, N. J., under date of April 12 concerning the activities of Mrs. John F. O'Brien, Jr.:

Whereas Mrs. John F. O'Brien, Jr., identified with all things humane and noble all of her life; and

Whereas, Mrs. O'Brien, having served the city of Newark for 32 years in institutional endeavors with such institutions as the blind, Crippled Children's Hospital, St. Michaels Hospital, orphanages, the Little Sisters of the Poor, Ivy Haven, and numerous other charitable and social agencies; and

Whereas, Mrs. O'Brien, having been greatly responsible for the passage of legislative bills toward the betterment of the underprivileged as well as removing the stigma which might reflect unpleasantly upon individuals and families who have become victims of circumstances beyond their control; having been responsible for the changing of the name of Ivy Haven from Alms House and the permanent removal of the use of the word "pauper" in any way referred to the aged or the poor; and

Whereas, this being the fourth anniversary of the passage of that humane bill, in cognizance of this and her other noble endeavors having received recognition by having been named "Angel" at Ivy Haven and referred to as "Angel of Newark" by the press, and by people of all walks of life and by myself as well, having first-hand knowledge of her many pioneering efforts of which she has given of her own, in time, health and finances:

Now, therefore, I, Ralph A. Villani, mayor of the city of Newark, and for my colleagues, Commissioners Meyer C. Ellenstein, John B. Keenan, Stephen J. Moran, and Leo P. Carlin, do hereby proclaim April 15, 1951, as Angel Day in honor of one who rightfully deserves the nomen for her unstinting sacrifices that Newark may be a better place to live in and humanity may be better to live with.

RALPH A. VILLANI,
Mayor.

Should UN Members Traffic With Our Enemies and Should We Hand Over Formosa?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. USHER L. BURDICK
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, if the plan of General MacArthur to help the people of Japan, the Philippines, and Formosa to hold out against Communist aggression is accepted and the China coast is blockaded, the war can be ended in Korea. If this blockade is put on, then those trading strategic material to the Reds will be caught red-handed. The very first catch will be Great Britain. As long as England can keep on shipping war materials to China, the war will continue and those materials will be used by the Red Chinese in fighting the troops of the United Nations, which include a small force from Britain. This must be comforting to the British soldiers fighting in Korea to know that their own country is making it possible for the war to continue. When a government can sacrifice its own men to save its trade, it is noticed that we are associating with the most perfidious and selfish nation on the earth today. This same England is determined that Red China shall be admitted to the United Nations and that Formosa shall be turned over to the Communists. Nothing will prevent it, unless there is an aroused spirit in America. Our State Department often behaves more English than American, and finally may agree to this appeasement. If we reward the aggressors with the gift of Formosa our chain of defenses against the Communists in the Pacific will be broken.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

TRADE WITH REDS

In view of the shameless trafficking with the enemy by some of our United Nations allies, I have introduced a resolution (H. Con. Res. 95) providing that our UN delegates shall be instructed to move for expulsion of guilty countries from the organization. My bill also provides that any American found guilty of trafficking with those against whom we are engaged in actual combat shall be declared engaged in treasonable activities and tried for treason as the Constitution provides.

The statement made by the President that he will send troops anywhere he wants to any time he wants to without the consent of Congress, and other intemperate statements of the Truman-Acheson administration, the untimely dismissal of General MacArthur—all have aroused the American people to a pitch of alarm never before witnessed in the history of this Republic.

The aroused feeling of the people was not alone the dismissal of General MacArthur but an accumulation of all these unfortunate statements and acts.

REWARD AGGRESSION?

Should the State Department finally surrender Formosa to Red China and break our chain of defenses against the Communists, the fury of the American people will far surpass their reaction to the MacArthur incident, and nothing will stop it except the retirement or impeachment of all those in the administration who are responsible for the move. The State Department earlier scuttled all opposition to the Communists in China, and if Formosa is scuttled, we would lose the key to our defense system against the Communist hordes of Asia.

Treason in the Constitution is defined as levying war against the United States or giving aid and comfort to its enemies. If the administration joins Great Britain in giving up Formosa, it is treason, or I do not know what acts would constitute that crime.

Panama Canal Changes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, since 1947 the Panama Canal has been the subject of recurrent discussion in the Congress, and the time is approaching when definite action should be taken toward the proper resolution of this problem.

In the RECORD of April 11, 1951, in an extension of remarks by Congressman JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, was published an unusually able statement by former Member of Congress Willis W. Bradley, of Long Beach, Calif., before the House Committee on Public Works. This statement dealt at some length with the St. Lawrence seaway and the Panama sea-level project.

Another recent contribution by former Representative Bradley concerning the Panama Canal was published as an editorial in the April 4, 1951, edition of the well-known Pacific coast newspaper, the Long Beach (Calif.) Press-Telegram.

Under leave accorded, I am pleased to include it in my remarks:

DON'T OVERDO ON PANAMA CANAL CHANGES

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—The author, a former Congressman from the Eighteenth Congressional District, is a recognized authority on the Panama Canal. His home is at 284 Argonne Avenue, Long Beach.)

(By Capt. Willis W. Bradley, U. S. Navy, retired)

The people of the West pay a large part of the expenses of the Panama Canal so what happens there concerns the pocketbook of every resident of this southern California region.

When the Canal was constructed it seemed primarily a national defense feature. In that aspect, the usual way would have been to charge the original cost off to national security. However, since the big ditch was to serve both commercial vessels and warships, its cost was set up as an interest-bearing investment and commercial traffic has paid tolls based on operating expense, plus interest on the investment, from the day of opening. This has kept tolls unnecessarily high and has cost consumers in California many millions more than their fair share of all expenditures incurred by Uncle Sam in the Canal Zone.

Recently, efforts have been made by the Department of the Army, charged with operation of the Canal, to increase tolls because of higher present-day costs of almost everything one buys. The proposed increases have been blocked by loud dissent from the Congress, from shipping activities, and from Pacific Coast States, but Canal authorities are ready to delve into our pocketbooks for more money at the first opportunity.

When the Canal was constructed it was designed to operate on three levels. * * * There is a group of three locks on the Atlantic side (the Gatun locks) which give a total lift of about 85 feet from the level of the Atlantic to Gatun Lake. On the Pacific side we find two sets of locks: First, the Miraflores locks, consisting of two steps with a total lift of about 54 feet from the Pacific level to Miraflores Lake, and then the Pedro Miguel lock, with a single lift of about 31 feet from Miraflores Lake to the upper level of the Canal (that of Gatun Lake), which prevails at the Pacific end of Gaillard (Culebra) cut.

The Canal has been very satisfactory during its short life although operating experience has brought out several serious faults in design.

Now in correcting these faults we should be certain that we are not led into a morass of public spending having every appearance of boondoggling on a gigantic scale. Such spending is threatened in current proposals to lower the present Panama Canal to sea level at an estimated cost of $2,500,000,000. These proposals were made to the Congress by the Governor of the Panama Canal in a report submitted in 1947 and they are being pushed energetically. The main reason assigned for this vast conversion proposal is alleged greater national security in this atomic-bomb age.

There are several fallacies in the sea-level proposals. The suggested project is not a conversion, as represented to the public, but rather an almost entirely new canal. It is a conversion in the same sense as rebuilding your home by providing an entirely new house of different design, but keeping your old front door and street number. The initial estimate of $2,500,000,000 ($2,483,000,000 to be more exact) is considered conservatively to be less than half of the probable final cost. The new canal would infringe on the territory of the Republic of Panama and so require a new treaty embodying additional concessions from Panama which—if obtainable—would undoubtedly be very expensive in increased annual payments to Panama and might involve a heavy indemnity for property concerned. The best information available is that a sea-level canal would be about as vulnerable as the present lock canal to atomic-bomb attack and damage.

An alternative to the expensive sea-level project, proposed by Capt. Miles DuVal, United States Navy, retired, seems to satisfy every apparent need at moderate cost. This plan calls for changes to provide a lake at the Pacific end—accomplished by increasing the Miraflores locks from two stage to three-stage, by eliminating the Pedro Miguel lock, and the construction of a series of larger locks at both Atlantic and Pacific entrances.

Fantastic Claims Are Being Made by the Supporters of the St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the St. Louis Globe-Democrat on March 10, 1951, in an editorial exposes the fantastic claims of the advocates of the St. Lawrence seaway.

The editorial follows:

FANTASTIC CLAIMS

Fantastic claims are being made by the supporters of the proposed St. Lawrence seaway and power project, who see in the war emergency an opportunity to put over a scheme which has been consistently rejected by Congress for 20 years. Almost as far-fetched are some of the arguments advanced by opponents of the seaway, which leaves the average taxpayer, who must foot the bill, thoroughly bewildered.

It is a little hard for him to understand why in the midst of mobilization this country should consider undertaking to spend more than $1,000,000,000, plus urgently needed manpower and materials, to build a waterway, more than half of which lies entirely outside the boundaries of the United States. The best estimate of the manpower required was made by Lt. Gen. R. A. Wheeler, then Chief of Army Engineers, in testifying before Congress in 1947. He reported that

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA LIBRARIES

111,355 man-years of work would be required to construct a 27-foot channel in the International Rapids section alone. This would mean the services of 23,600 men for 4 years. It does not include the work needed on connecting channels of the Great Lakes, the deepening of harbors, or the work in the Canadian section of the waterway.

Proponents of the seaway urge its construction now on the plea that it would provide a water route for the movement of iron ore from Labrador; a movement which it is estimated would average approximately 10,000,000 tons annually. Assuming that the seaway could be built for $1,000,000,000 this would represent an investment of $100 a ton for Labrador ore at a time when known ore reserves in this country can supply the Nation's maximum needs for more than a decade. In addition there are in this country billions of tons of taconite containing iron. It would be far more practical to spend a small fraction of the cost of the seaway to build taconite processing plants.

The real objective of the St. Lawrence project is not navigation, but power development. New York and New England interests urge the project because they see in it the opportunity to secure the development of electric power at the expense of the taxpayers of the rest of the country. It is, in short, a grandiose TVA, to subsidize power users of New England.

This country does not need more TVA's. It certainly cannot afford to dissipate money, manpower and materials on a TVA scheme which could not be finished in any event until long after the present war emergency is past. Congress has recognized these considerations, and other valid arguments against the seaway in the past. They should prevail again, despite the pressure that is being brought to put over the seaway in the guise of a mobilization project.

Britain Refuses to Participate in Reciprocal Trade Agreements Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the supporters of the reciprocal trade agreements program were shocked to learn that Britain has refused to join with other nations in cutting tariffs. At Torquay, England, the United States and 38 countries agreed to tariff cuts, but not the British.

The story about this conference appeared in the Star on Sunday, April 22. Said article is included as part of my remarks:

UNITED STATES AND 38 NATIONS AGREE ON TARIFF CUTS, BUT BRITAIN DOES NOT

TORQUAY, ENGLAND, April 21.—New agreements lowering still further some of the tariff barriers to world trade were signed today by the United States and 38 other nations. The details are temporarily secret.

In addition to 147 separate tariff-reducing agreements between pairs of nations, cuts previously agreed on at two earlier conferences since World War II were continued until 1954.

The Torquay Conference of members of the postwar General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade ended after nearly 7 months. Conference headquarters said "a substantial list of concessions has been achieved which will be applied over a very extensive area of world trade."

TALKS BREAK DOWN

But the biggest failure was a breakdown of negotiations between the United States and most of the British Commonwealth nations.

The United States reached tariff-reducing agreements with 17 of the 24 nations with whom it negotiated, including Canada, a member of the British Commonwealth, and Belgium, Brazil, the Netherlands, Luxemburg, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, France, Indonesia, Italy, Norway, Sweden, Austria, Western Germany, Korea, Peru, and Turkey.

But it failed to reach an agreement with Britain, Australia, New Zealand, India, and South Africa—all Commonwealth members—and Cuba and Guatemala.

COULDN'T GET TOGETHER

"They wouldn't give us what we wanted and we couldn't give them what they wanted," said Carl Corse, State Department trade expert who headed the 99-man American delegation.

Mr. Corse was authorized to reduce by as much as 50 percent the import duties on about 3,000 items. In return, the United States wanted tariff reductions by the Commonwealth countries which would have effectively broken down the empire preference system in operation for 19 years.

Britain was tempted to give up the system which she erected in 1932 as a shield against the world depression. By this system, Britain and the Commonwealth countries charge lower tariffs on each other's goods than they do on the products of other countries.

TARIFF CUTS WOULD HELP

American tariff cuts would have helped Britain's drive to earn more dollars by sales of goods to the United States. But trade experts believe she finally decided to stick to empire preference because she would have difficulty in holding her empire markets against United States mass-production industries if pounds and dollars should become freely convertible some time in the future.

The members of the General Agreement on Tariffs do more than 80 percent of the world's international trade.

The exact tariff cuts that were agreed on will not be published until May 9, when each nation which gave or received reductions will make them public. All the new tariff changes will be published May 12 by Gatt headquarters at Geneva, Switzerland.

Under the Gatt system, the deals are made between the principal buyers and sellers of each separate product. Then the lowered tariffs are extended to all Gatt members.

Our Multiple Challenge

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. PERCY PRIEST
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I desire to include here the text of a sermon delivered by the Reverend Edward Hughes Pruden, pastor of First Baptist Church of Washington, on April 15, 1951.

The sermon follows:

OUR MULTIPLE CHALLENGE

Ephesians 6: 12: "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places."

It has been customary to assume that the group of Christians to whom was committed the most staggering task in all of history was that little group of disciples on the Galilean hillside to whom Jesus gave the great commission. We know that they did receive a staggering responsibility. They must have been shaken to their very foundations by all of the implications bound up in the great commission: What it required of them; and how alert, sacrificial, and full of eagerness they would have to be if that commission was ever to be carried out in all of its greatness and power.

But I am inclined to believe today that the Christians of this generation have confronting them an even more tremendous and frightening responsibility, for we are confronted on every hand by a variety of problem situations which give us grave concern, and which are more or less related to one another as far as their total impact upon the cause of Christ is concerned. Looked at together, they might be likened to a mighty octopus with its tentacles stretched toward us in all directions, challenging or threatening us constantly with the possibilities wrapped up in the influences they possess. I should like to mention a few of these particular problems with which we are confronted and indicate ways in which we must face them.

First of all among these problem situations I would mention an engulfing defeatism—a sense of being conquered even before the struggle begins. I am afraid that far too many Americans have been afflicted with this malady. We find fears around us which approach psychopathic proportions. Men and women are not only afraid but are not embarrassed to admit these fears, and they resort to terribly emotional extremes in expressing their anxieties.

This was illustrated last week when the news was released to the world that General MacArthur had been relieved of his command. Some of the excessively emotional responses to that news was due, of course, to great admiration for the general; some of it was due to an unreasoning political partisanship; but much of it was due to the vicious and deliberate campaign of hate and suspicion in which a few newspapers and radio commentators have been engaged. These scaremongers would have us believe that there is a subversive in every Government office; that our leaders are under the influence of some sinister organization of traitors; and that we are on the verge of being taken over by Russia. Those of us who are at all intelligent know that that is absolute foolishness, but the tragedy of it is that there are enough uninformed, simple-minded, emotionally unstable people in the world to accept that propaganda as though it were gospel truth. Many of those who called the newspapers last week and couldn't speak coherently because of the emotional upheaval within them were victims of this kind of propaganda. They were indeed pathetic victims because they were so sincere and honest about it all, having accepted as absolute fact the rumors the suggestions, and the suspicions which had been circulated by some of these commentators. I don't know which commentators you listen to but I hope you listen with a selective mind. You can no more accept everything you hear on the radio than you can accept everything that is printed in the newspapers. We must use our intelligence and discriminate between that which is vicious and which undermines confidence in ourselves and our Government, and that which our intelligence tells us is sane and reasonable. We have come to a sad day in the life of our country when a United States Senator can stand on the floor of the Senate with so little regard for the truth and the intelligence of the people and make this statement, "Our Government," he said, "is in the hands of a secret inner coterie which is directed by the agents of the Soviet Union." It is hard for me to believe that a Senator could be ignorant enough to believe that. We know that it isn't so, and I am inclined to believe that the Senator knows that it isn't so. We who are Christians must be an enlightening and stabilizing influence in society. We must help to calm those who have been unnecessarily aroused. We must help men to know the truth that they may be free—free from fear and falsehood, from the domination of false propaganda disseminated by unscrupulous men. It is our duty to confront men with the steadying influences of the Christian gospel.

Here again may I quote once more a verse of scripture which you have already noticed is frequently on my lips—the verse from the thirteenth chapter of I Corinthians, "Love is always eager to believe the best." If we find ourselves eager to believe the worst, either about America, its leadership, or our fellow citizens, let's reexamine the basis of our own discipleship, for love is never eager to believe falsehood. Love is disinclined to accept uncomplimentary statements regarding one's fellowmen. If I believed that communism was so attractive, compelling and absolute in its appeal that multitudes of people in our Government had fallen for it, it would shake my confidence in democracy, but I don't believe that communism is that kind of thing. I believe it appeals only to people who are so downtrodden that they will grasp at anything to give them some hope, or to people who are mentally unstable. I don't believe there is a normal human being in the world to whom communism has any appeal. That is why I don't lie awake at night thinking of what communism is going to do to America. Our people generally are too well off and too intelligent ever to fall for that kind of philosophy. Of course, here and there you find a few who because of some unusual circumstances have become victims of the communistic ideology, but they constitute a small and an almost negligible minority. We must do something to counteract the campaign of fear which many seem deliberately trying to create at a time when we need all the confidence and courage and united spirit which we can possibly muster.

In the second place, we are confronted by communistic fanaticism. Communism isn't just a philosophy; it is a crusade. It isn't just something which men accept passively, but it is something which they are trying to share intensively. We read in the newspapers about the Communist soldiers in North Korea, and the Chinese Communist soldiers, who come against our fighting men in wave upon wave, like the waters of the sea, giving themselves completely and eagerly in a great crusading spirit for the establishment of their own ideology. Now it isn't enough for us to denounce communism, and be on the alert against it, but we must somehow reproduce in our own relationship to Christianity something of that zeal, determination, and crusading spirit which the devotees of a pagan philosophy are everywhere demonstrating. To some of you I have mentioned before the Indian student at Bacone College in Oklahoma who came back from his summer vacation last September after spending his holidays with his family on the reservation. When he arrived on the campus the president of the college said to him, "John, what is wrong with you? You look as though you are completely exhausted and spent." And the student said, "Doctor, just before leaving the Indian reservation I took part in the sun dance of my tribe." And when the president required as to what that involved he said, "That required that we should dance in a wild, frenzied fashion for 3 days and 3 nights without stopping for food or drink. Every man in the tribe but one fell by the wayside out of sheer exhaustion." Then the president asked, "John, why on earth did you do it?" And John replied, "We did it in the hope that we might drive the war out of Korea." While we may smile at the innocence and the foolishness of trying to end a war by a sun dance, the question we ought to ask ourselves is this, "How much am I willing to endure that the war may be driven out of Korea? What would I do for 3 days and 3 nights if I knew that by doing it the war might be brought to a conclusion?" Would we stay on our knees in prayer 3 days and 3 nights, and if we did, would we not want perhaps a pillow under our knees? It isn't enough to denounce the dangerous doctrines of the enemy; we must match their zeal and enthusiasm, or we shall lose the world while they are winning it.

A third thing with which we are confronted in these days is current secularism—the tendency to put our major time and attention upon things, that which we can see and touch; surrounding ourselves with little conveniences and comforts while neglecting the deeper things of the spirit. Dr. Fosdick was everlastingly right in that line in his hymn which says that we are rich in things, but poor in soul. People all over the world know of America's wealth and our vast variety of bodily comforts. We are noted for those things, but we are not noted for our spiritual power. No one in the world looks to us as the great exemplars of moral characteristics to which they can turn. They think of us in terms of automobiles, radios, and conveniences of every conceivable sort—things which minister to our love of luxury rather than the things which express our spiritual aspirations. Fifty percent of the American people are in no religious organization whatever, and many are only nominal members, so that the impact of America's influence upon the world is by no means a spiritual impact; it is largely a material one. Somehow we must turn the tide of this tendency in our corporate life that we may demonstrate a different spirit to a spiritually hungry humanity.

In the fourth place, we are confronted with militant clericalism—the tendency of a great ecclesiastical hierarchy to seek more and more political advantages in order that it may strengthen its own position in the life of America and the world. You who hear me Sunday after Sunday know how much I believe in cooperating with all Christians, and I shall always believe in that. Not only would I work with Protestant Christians but with Catholic Christians or any other Christians who will help to establish the spiritual foundations of the Kingdom of God. That is one of the great longings of my spirit. But we must never become so obsessed with the idea of cooperation that we close our eyes to the dangers that threaten our historic principles of soul liberty and religious freedom, and those factors which war against our basic doctrine of the separation of chuch and state. We must hold out forever a hand of cooperation along spiritual lines, but forever lift our hands against any efforts to use political means to strengthen the position of any ecclesiastical body, our own or any other, anywhere in the world.

Still again, we are confronted by what might be called splinter particularisms—the tendency to take some phase of the Christian religion and exalt that to a place of prominence to the neglect of all other phases. We have, for instance, the Christian Science movement which emphasizes the healing power of God. We believe in that just as thoroughly as any Christian Scientist in all the world, but we think it is a mistake to take that one phase of our belief and give to it such prominence that all other phases are practically forgotten. We think of moral rearmament with its emphasis upon a changed life and the fact that men need not remain as they are. We believe in that thoroughly, and we preach it constantly, but we must not exalt that idea to the point of ignoring all else within our faith. We think of alcoholics anonymous, and rejoice in the way in which that movement has reached down and lifted men out of hopelessness to a place of respect and honor; but that too is only a partial expression of what the Christian faith can do for humanity. However, while we are mentioning these things we ought to acknowledge that perhaps we too are at fault, for maybe these who were formerly active within the churches are reaching out to other organizations because they have not found in the church that for which their hearts hunger; and perhaps we have been so busy emphasizing other phases of the Christian message that we have neglected these phases to which we should have given more of our time and attention.

We are confronted, too, today by what might be called general indifferentism. The man on the street isn't hostile to the church. In most instances, he is simply indifferent to the church, and we are terribly afraid he is indifferent because he has found so little in us to challenge him or to cause him to look at the church in admiration. The early Christians were a revolutionary people. They accepted a doctrine which was considered dangerous to the state and to society. Why do you suppose they were put to death in the arena in Rome, and why was Jesus crucified at Jerusalem Not for the amusement of the people; not for the satisfaction of their leaders; but because they were considered dangerous, subversive, heretical and all the rest of it. These early Christians were people willing to constitute a small and unpopular minority. Someone has said of us that we are little more than the revolutionary sons of revolutionary fathers. Whereas they were a revolutionizing influence in society, we try to conform to society, to be like the world in which we live. I heard two little boys playing yesterday and one of them did something rather daring, after which he said, "I like the dangerous life." That is the kind of life that appeals to any honest-to-goodness human being with a spark of adventure within his soul and spirit. But we don't present enough of the adventurous character of the Christian faith to cause men to be challenged by it, or to make them turn to the church in great admiration.

We are also confronted these days by aggressive sectarianism. In spite of all our progress in Christian cooperation there are still forces at work in our world seeking to divide us into little competing, warring groups. They do this first of all by trying to create suspicion regarding our great Protestant leaders. They do it by saying that we will be disloyal to our denomination if we are cooperative with other Christians. They do it by saying that if we are not careful we will build up a great superchurch which will rob us of our liberties and take away our congregational and personal freedom. We must be on the alert to answer these charges; to demonstrate that they are not true; and to give ourselves in utmost devotion to the cause of Christian unity in a divided world.

And last of all, we are confronted as Christians today by an incomplete evangelism. In all of our churches there are scores of people who are only partially saved; people who have taken the first step or two on the ladder leading to discipleship; but who have hesitated to go further, or climbed back down altogether. And because of this incomplete evangelism we have great multitudes of people who are only half-hearted in their devotion to Christ and His church. Every now and then the officers of our church hold a meeting to decide how on earth we can get several hundred members of our church who are now inactive to participate in some way in the life of the church; to come occasionally; to give at least once a year; to demonstrate some little semblance of interest and concern. What is going on in our church is going on in every church in America, and all of that is an illustration of an incomplete evangelism. These indifferent members are those who either thoughtlessly, or without any understanding of what they are doing came down to the front and accepted Christ, went back and took their seats, and have forgotten all about it ever since. They started out in a promising way but they never followed through to any kind of conclusion. Until we can do something about this situation the churches of Christ will never be the power in society they were intended to be.

So today as we look at these problem situations all around us, and at our multiple responsibility in a day like this, we are inclined to say, "Who is equal to these things?" If we had a lesser leader we might well give up in despair, but we have a great Leader—One who is strong above all our conceptions of strength: One who is destined to triumph in spite of all the forces that are in league against Him. And we have two words from Him which perhaps will give us the courage we require; "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world"; and "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's pleasure to give unto you the Kingdom."

Arbor Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CARL T. CURTIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. CURTIS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, 79 years ago, on April 10, 1872, Arbor Day was observed for the first time by one of these United States.

It is significant that the State wherein this constructive movement originated was my home State, Nebraska.

Why did Arbor Day begin in Nebraska?

There are many reasons.

Nebraska needed trees to develop and conserve its vast potential for agricultural production. The farmer needed trees about his house for shade in the summer. He needed trees about his house to protect it from the blizzards in the winter. It was only an easy, natural step to establish State-wide tree belts along section lines and along boundaries between farm properties. The tree belt, outgrowth of Arbor Day planting, was a familiar sight in Nebraska long before—yes; many decades before—this method of crop preservation was advocated on a national scale.

The historic origin of the people who pioneered Nebraska gave them a universal respect and appreciation for the beauty of trees. Swedes from the wooded hillsides of far-off Scandinavia became substantial Nebraska citizens early in the saga of our State. Germans from the storied regions of the Black Forest brought their skills and their traditions to early Nebraska. French Canadians from the north woods added their numbers and their ability to the infant State. Czechs from the woodlands of Bohemia brought their keen evaluation of tree beauty to the State I am proud to call home.

Nor were the American-born pioneers remiss in their desire to be tree-planters. Men and women from the great tree stands of Wisconsin and Michigan, alive to the knowledge of the value of trees, were among the first to settle in Nebraska. After the War Between the States, hundreds of southerners from the tree-rich lands of Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Carolina came West, lured by the rumors of the promised land of that time—Nebraska.

With the need and the people present in my home State, it was inevitable that a powerful urge should move Nebraskans to plant trees. Wherever and whenever pioneers got together—at church, at the cross-roads grocery, at the county courthouse—it became one of the certain topics of conversation. Nobody denied the need. Everybody was in favor of it. The favorite question of the era was: "Why don't somebody do something about it?"

It was very much like a situation with which all of us are now familiar. For years—and especially since the outbreak of the war in Korea—alert Americans have been asking themselves: "What is our foreign policy? Do we have any? Why don't somebody do something about it?" General MacArthur, in his recent letter to Representative MARTIN of Massachusetts did do something about it. He focused and crystallized the aroused interest of the American people.

Seventy-nine years ago, when Nebraskans called for somebody to do something about it, their pleas were also answered. J. Sterling Morton did what Nebraskans had thought about and talked about.

Morton—editor, farmer, philosopher—was, above all, a public servant. He was a Democrat, the Nation's third Secretary of Agriculture. Yet, what he did was done for the whole people of the State wherein he lived, regardless of party. He was a two-fisted political battler. Yet, he was never guilty of low-blow tactics. He believed that the people were the power. His creed was to serve, rather than to dictate; to guide, rather than to dominate. No man was more aware of the true responsibilities of leadership under a republican form of government than J. Sterling Morton.

Even in the awareness that he was doing right and that he had popular support behind him, J. Sterling Morton was beset with difficulties. He had to plan. He had to consider the set ideas of like-thinking men. He had to accept recommendations and he had to reject them. The culmination of his plan—to be accepted by the legislature of the 5-year-old State—had to be so worded as to offend neither North nor South, neither Nebraskan of French origin nor Nebraskan of German origin, neither Catholic nor Protestant.

History records that Mr. Morton adopted suggestions and made changes in his original plan; but, nevertheless, kept the germ of his idea intact. History also records that, in line with Nebraska's reliance on education, the father of Arbor Day, called upon the children of Nebraska to help in making his dream into an accomplished fact. Men and women are alive today who, as children, took part in the first observance. Men, women, and children—whole families—"pitched in" to make that first Arbor Day a success. Communities dropped all other work to share in it. It was the greatest "planting bee" up to that time. To get some idea of the enthusiasm with which Nebraskans put their shoulders to the wheel, it is a matter of record that between sunrise and sunset on April 10, 1872, in our sparsely settled infant State more than 1,000,000 trees and shrubs were planted. Nothing short of an all-out community of effort on a State-wide basis could have accomplished that outstanding feat.

Like all good ideas, Arbor Day was not confined within the borders of our State of Nebraska. It spread. It was intended to spread. Today, 79 years after that first Arbor Day, it is observed in every State in these United States and in the District of Columbia. We of Nebraska are not alarmed because Arbor Day is not honored on the same day by every State. In fact, we of Nebraska are pleased that no unanimity does exist among the States. We of Nebraska are, and always have been, individualists. We do not servilely accept regimentation. Neither do we succumb to pressure from the Federal government to give up rights which essentially belong to each of the several States. We are glad that Florida has Arbor Day on January 20 and that Rhode Island has it on May 4. We are glad that it is proclaimed by the Governor in Wyoming and proclaimed by the State legislature in other States. We of Nebraska do not care when other States have Arbor Day or how they officially proclaim it. It is enough for us that they observe it as free components of the United States—with the constitutional right of self-determination.

In Nebraska, we observe Arbor Day on April 22 because that day is the birthday of J. Sterling Morton, its originator. That is our right as a still sovereign State.

Nebraskans are proud that the great movement of Arbor Day originated in our State. We are equally proud that the movement has carried forward, without interruption, gaining momentum—until the present. We pray that it will continue its march of progress into the uncharted future. Whatever the future of Arbor Day, we know that it will contribute to the happiness of all free men since it arose from the mind of men who loved the soil and trees—the gift of the soil—of men whose dedication to nature forever bespeaks their eternal faith in God.

The Korea on the Campus

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. HERLONG, JR.
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. HERLONG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to include an article from the pen of Dr. J. Ollie Edmunds, president of John B. Stetson University, De Land, Fla., which is entitled "The Korea on the Campus":

THE KOREA ON THE CAMPUS
(By J. Ollie Edmunds)

To realistic Americans it is becoming appallingly clear that unless something is done about it, small independent colleges as we have known them in the past are on the way out. They are caught in a crushing economic nutcracker—between shrinking incomes and skyrocketing costs. The war is tumbling their enrollments. Everything from grass seed to textbooks is going up. Each one faces a Korea on its own campus.

For these valiant grass-roots colleges, where Christian character is considered as important as chemistry and the development of self-reliance as vital to the training of good citizens as the teaching of psychology, the alternatives are stark and urgent:

1. They can give up the ghost and go out of business;

2. They can accept political subsidies from the Government and "let the one who pays the fiddler call the tunes—if they are willing to cease being independent colleges, free to give their students religious training and free to turn thumbs down on socialistic theories; or

3. They can take their case direct to vigilant Americans who believe in perpetuating the private-enterprise system in education as well as in business and ask them to support the institutions that stand for the things for which they stand.

Most of these colleges will choose the third alternative. They will not give up without a struggle, for they are built of the same stuff of which our country has been built. The United States has astonished the world with its vitality. Through self-reliance and individual initiative, it has become one of the most important nations on earth. The small gift-supported colleges which have trained so many of the leaders in our free-enterprise system have played a lively part in bringing this about. They have no hesitancy, therefore, in asking good citizens, many of whom may never have given to a college before, to help them to stay strong so that they can continue to teach tomorrow's young men and young women the principles and ideals which have made our country great.

At no time has such teaching been more desperately needed. An alarming change is coming over many Americans. Like an insidious, sweet-smelling anesthetic, the tempting fragrance of Government-managed "security" is numbing their initiative and dulling their self-respect. Good citizens who once knew the meaning of righteous indignation, and who in the past would have instantly resented any attempt to "plan their economy," have been shrugging their shoulders at practices which should shock them. Even worse, many of their sons and daughters who have never lived in any other period except this narcotic era seem ready to accept as gospel truth the debilitating ideas which have been emanating from fuzzy-minded "planners" who, innocently or for ulterior motives, are sapping these young people of their self-reliance—the young men and young women to whom America must look for leadership in the future.

What is to be done about all this? What can we as individuals do about it? What ought the business concerns which are fighting to preserve their traditional concepts of free enterprise do about it?

Education—aggressive education—provides the only practical answer. We can either sit by and let our principles—and perhaps our country—go by default, or we can take positive action to strengthen the institutions which are teaching their students to understand and appreciate their heritage of freedom, democracy, and individual enterprise—ideals for which, all too soon, they may be asked to die. Such colleges are close to the people. All over the Nation they are a stabilizing influence. If only they can be given relief from their financial worries they can provide our country with the kind of Christian lawyers, ministers, statesmen, educators, business leaders, and clear-thinking citizens that can keep America America.

War-shattered enrollments and rising costs have plunged these colleges into a life or death struggle for survival. Financial help they must have—and quickly. If the men and women and the business concerns whose success has been built on our individual enterprise system do not stand back of such colleges, who will?

Is not what Americans have been fighting with guns to save overseas worth fighting with dollars to save at home?

Who Makes the Wars?

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the question of war or peace is one in which the people of this Nation are vitally interested. The desire for peace is the spirit and the soul of our people. Consequently, our people are desirous of determining who is responsible when we do go to war. An editorial appearing today in the Washington Times-Herald, under the title "Who Makes the Wars?" goes into this all-important question in a manner that challenges the thoughtful and considerate attention of all citizens without regard to political affiliation.

Under the unanimous consent granted, I include it as part of my remarks. It reads as follows:

WHO MAKES THE WARS?

Three Senators became engaged in a shoving match when Senator CAPEHART, Indiana Republican, registered his outrage at attempts of New Dealers during the course of a radio transcription to represent him as a warmonger, the Republican Party as the party of war, and General MacArthur as its agent in seeking war.

These fantastic aspersions were cast by Senator HUMPHREY, of Minnesota and Senator LEHMAN, of New York, who were obviously following the defensive propaganda line that has been laid down for apologists of Mr. Truman's own war-making policies. Senator DOUGLAS, of Illinois, and Senator KERR, of Oklahoma, among others, are engaging in the same slander, and the fact that General MacArthur was constrained to answer the desperate lie that he is a warmonger indicates how the gravest kind of distortion can be given currency through a skillful and persistent propaganda.

NATURAL BEDFELLOWS

The New Deal line on MacArthur also happens to be the Communist line. The Daily Worker refers to General MacArthur as war hungry, war incendiary, and as a menace to America and world peace. It is also the British line. As usual, the New Dealers are making common cause with their natural allies and accepted masters.

Mr. Truman's purpose is to beguile the people into forgetting a fact that should never be forgotten—that he and his party are the authors of wars. Every foreign war of this century has been a Democratic war. The Wilson war, the Roosevelt war, and now the Truman war in Korea are all of undisputed parentage. There has been no Republican war in the twentieth century. There is not now any MacArthur war. If the war in Asia should be enlarged, it will still be Truman's war. He put us there.

He put America into the war in Korea, although the Constitution says that only Congress may declare war. He never consulted Congress.

He went into his war with the pretext that he was complying with a call from the United Nations, and then had to induce the United Nations to give retroactive sanction to his unilateral action. Even if this country owed any responsibility to the United Nations—and no such responsibility existed at the time that Truman acted—the New Deal President did not satisfy the legal requirements established by Congress to fulfill the responsibility.

Public Law 764 had been on the statute books for 5 years when Truman ordered American forces into Korea. That law specified that no American forces could be placed at the disposal of UN until the President had concluded an agreement with UN for their use, and the agreement had then been submitted to Congress and ratified. Truman entered no agreement with UN. He submitted no such agreement to Congress for approval. He acted on his own and the war is his alone.

General MacArthur was not consulted in this decision. He received orders to conduct the war which Truman initiated.

MacArthur's part in the war was discharged brilliantly until the character of an emerging victory was completely transformed by the intervention of Communist China. Truman has sought to blame MacArthur for failing to know that China would come into the war. If MacArthur had been able to guess that development what difference would it have made? We were in Korea, and we were stuck there by order of Truman.

DELUDES PEOPLE

In decreeing the original entry into this war, it was Truman's responsibility to assess the risks, including the always apparent possibility that Communist China, or Russia, or both, might intervene. The decision to accept the hazard was his, and the responsibility for extension of the war through Chinese intervention was necessarily his, for it cannot be separated from the basic decision he made in entering the war.

The Truman propaganda is intended to delude the people into forgetting that he is the author of the war, that the subsequent extension of the war to Communist China flowed out of his unconstitutional act, and that if the war should expand still further, that will also be his responsibility, for the expansion could not affect America if he had not sent American troops into the conflict in the first place.

The present pose of Truman and the Democrats that they are the party of peace, although they made the war, and the blood of more than 60,000 Americans is already on their hands, can only provoke contempt. But they brazenly charge that the Republicans, or MacArthur, or anybody but themselves are the people to blame for the war, and are the people to blame if the war bursts its present bounds and becomes world war III. If it does, it is still Truman's war, still a New Deal war.

The best estimate of why the administration has adopted these tactics is that it is in a desperate predicament. Having committed the United States to the war, it can now see no way either to win or to disengage. It is stuck with the squalling, uncouth brat. It is looking anywhere and everywhere, hoping to unload the unwelcome handful on somebody else. It has tried that on MacArthur, but the thing won't stick. It has tried it on the Republicans, but again the transfer of guilt and odium cannot be accomplished.

In every controvery there is a starting point. First things come first. Why is the Nation concerned about Korea? Why is the Nation up in arms at the unfair railroading of MacArthur? Because, and only because, Truman created the whole situation when he went to war, of his own say-so, in Korea.

MacArthur Will Not Fade

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I am including two very timely editorials that appeared in the Washington Daily News on April 20, 1951. Both are pertinent to the MacArthur story:

[From the Washington Daily News of April 20, 1951]

THIS WILL NOT FADE

The dauntless spirit, the selfless patriotism, which made America the hope and inspiration of the world shone again when Gen. Douglas MacArthur stood before Congress.

Shone with all the more splendor against the shoddy background of present-day political Washington, with its influence peddlers and its favor seekers, its tolerance of mediocrity in moral standards and official conduct.

For the moment the Achesons and the Vaughans could be forgotten. Here was a man fit to stand with Lincoln when he said:

"I am responsible * * * to the American people, to the Christian world, to history, and on my final account to God."

Douglas MacArthur's speech was a message of hope and courage, of faith and firm conviction.

He offered a way to secure the peace and save American lives. And he laid it on the line that the Joint Chiefs of Staff in the past had agreed to the validity of that plan.

In reply to the appeasers who now dominate American foreign policy, he said that if the enemy can divide his strength on two fronts it is for us to counter his effort, because the Communist threat is global.

Like blackmail, he said, appeasement lays the basis for new and successively greater demands until, as in blackmail, violence becomes the only alternative.

"Why surrender military advantages to an enemy in the field?" he asked. "War's very object is victory, not prolonged indecision."

General MacArthur went on to explain that America cannot be secured against the advances of communism by defending Europe alone, for our strategic frontier embraces the Pacific as well as the Atlantic Ocean. We are well protected at present by the island chain, extending from the Aleutians to the Marianas and held by ourselves and our allies, he pointed out.

But the victorious leader of the island war in the Pacific warned that any major breach in that chain, such as the surrender of Formosa to the Reds, would render vulnerable to determined attack every other major segment of our defenses.

This, he asserted, is a military estimate to which he has yet to find a military leader who will take exception. Yet Formosa is the island which Britain wants to hand over to the Communists, and our State Department has supported Britain in that position.

General MacArthur mentioned none of his detractors by name, and he treated his differences with them with dignity and restraint.

"While I was not consulted prior to the President's decision to intervene in support of the Republic of Korea," he said, "that decision, from a military standpoint, proved a sound one." But, he continued, when Red China entered the war, that created an entirely new situation which called for new decisions in the diplomatic field to permit realistic adjustment of military strategy.

"Such decisions," he added, "have not been forthcoming."

Indeed, until this very hour none have been made. Yet, because he sought new instructions from the United Nations, General MacArthur has been accused of invading the fields of diplomacy and political policy.

"I called for reinforcements, but was informed that reinforcements were not available," he said.

Without them, "the position of the command from the military standpoint forbade victory."

When he pressed this issue, General MacArthur was relieved of his command and deprived of opportunity to end the conflict "with the least loss of time and a minimum sacrifice of life."

The armchair strategists won't find it easy to make that appear the policy of a saber-rattling warmonger.

The great soldier who was laying down his sword after 52 years in the service of his country faced the verdict of history unafraid, as he prepared quietly to fade away.

But the millions of Americans who heard and read General MacArthur's message will expect answers to the questions he raised.

They will be as one with him in anguish and anxiety for the gallant men left in Korea who remain in his thoughts and prayers. Each new tabulation of American casualties will add strength to his demand for prompt decisions which will end this conflict honorably and with a minimum sacrifice of life.

The old soldier who tried to do his duty as God gave him the light to see that duty will not stand alone in days ahead. He has inspired a resurgence of American faith, courage, and devotion. It will not, must not, fail to make his hopes and dreams for honorable peace become reality.

[From the Washington Daily News of April 20, 1951]

THE UN BRUSH-OFF

The United Nations apparently has no interest in General MacArthur.

This despite the fact that he was the first man to command a military force in the field under the UN banner. And the fact that for the past 10 months he has been fighting for the very survival of the UN.

United Nations headquarters are in New York. General MacArthur is receiving in New York today one of the greatest welcomes ever accorded a hero in our time. Yet there were no plans for him to visit the pretentious new UN building there on his triumphant tour of the city.

The UN officially has expressed no desire to see its former commander. It is just a coincidence that the acting Secretary General is a Soviet citizen, sitting in, under a rotation system which the UN dearly loves, for Trygve Lie, who has gone to visit Europe and the Middle East.

Normally, it might be supposed that an organization of nations which is trying to preserve the fiction of carrying on a war would like to hear from its commander who has just come back from that war. But there's nothing strange about it. For actually, the UN has had no heart for the Korean War since the Chinese Reds joined in.

Only a few months ago the UN listened at length to the shouts and snarls of one Wu Hsiu-chan. He was the representative of the Chinese Reds, whom the British want to seat in the UN.

But the UN has no time for Douglas MacArthur.

Three Choices in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Ferdinand Kuhn, from the Washington Post of April 22, 1951:

THREE CHOICES IN KOREA

(By Ferdinand Kuhn)

Now that the emotional jag of the MacArthur welcome is over, the Nation has a headache—and not the kind that will go away with a dose of headache powder.

The Korean war is about to enter its tenth month with no end in sight. The American people would not be themselves if they did not want to end it and get their men home.

"We are a people of convulsive and impatient nature," Dean Acheson wrote 3 years ago, before he learned as Secretary of State how convulsive American opinion could be. We want quick results, whether in sport, in business, or in war.

And because the Korean war does not promise quick results, its idealistic beginnings tend to be forgotten, its coldly practical purposes are ignored, and its future course produces divisions of opinion that seemed last week to be tearing the country apart.

A TRADITIONAL LAG

One would suppose, from the impatience to get this war ended, that a 10 months' war was something new in American experience. Yet 10 months after our entry into the last war, Guadalcanal was still our only land battleground. Ten months after the start of the Civil War, there had been only one major battle, and 10 months after Lexington and Concord the end of the beginning had not yet come.

When a country takes up arms, in a small war or a big one, it cannot look ahead to a stately succession of events, all developing on schedule to a foreordained end. It seldom knows at the start just how or when the victory will come.

War, said Winston Churchill a generation ago, is a voyage "across waters uncharted toward coasts unknown." So it is with this Korean enterprise which now leaves so many Americans impatient for a clean-cut ending.

Even General MacArthur now concedes that the decision to resist aggression in Korea was "sound." Had it not been taken quickly, with all its risks, the political and military position of the United States and its Allies would have collapsed and aggressors would have been put on notice all over the world that they could strike anywhere, at any time, without fear of being stopped.

To be impatient now, 10 months later, may be in tune with the American tradition and temperament, but it is only another way of denying the rightness of what was done last June. It gets nowhere and it obscures the purposes of the first international peace-enforcement action in all history.

THREE ALTERNATIVES

How, then, is this pioneer effort in Korea to end with success and honor. Three alternatives are up for debate and for national decision.

The first of them General MacArthur outlined from the rostrum of Congress on Thursday. Victory, he assured the watching and listening Nation, could come from blockading China, intensifying economic pressure, ferrying the armies of Chiang Kai-shek to the mainland and destroying Chinese bases in Manchuria. The general would also hold Formosa permanently, so that American guns could "dominate" the coast of Asia from Vladivostok to Singapore and keep the Pacific an American "lake."

The air-sea war against China, outside the Korean Peninsula, has already been ruled out by the administration and its Allies. It has been ruled out because of the conviction that it would bring, not victory, but a ruinous world war; not an end of anything, but the start of a bloodletting that could have no end.

It has been ruled out because of the fear that it would bring Soviet Russia into active intervention in the Korean war, and perhaps in other areas as well.

With MacArthur's prescription ruled out as a quack remedy, what else can be done to end the war in Korea. Senator HARRY CAIN, of Washington, has proposed an answer in the form of a Senate resolution. His proposal has not the ghost of a chance of adoption, but at least it constitutes the second alternative before the American people now.

It is, quite simply, to pull out of Korea altogether, to cut the losses, to retire to a defense line on island territory from Japan to the Philippines. Certainly the course of Senator CAIN would save American lives, in the short run; it would bring home the officers who are needed to train the new draft armies here and it would give the United States the illusion of being the master of events instead of seeming to be their prisoner.

But a deliberate withdrawal would put a curse of Cain upon us in the eyes of small and exposed nations everywhere. It would condemn our South Korean allies to the torture chamber or the execution squad when the Communists marched in.

It would signal to every nation that fears for its future: "This is what you can expect from having the United States as your friend." And it would surely start a world-wide scramble to get on the Communist bandwagon. So this alternative, too, has been rejected by the administration, and General Bradley is only the latest of many official spokesmen who have said we would not get out of Korea unless driven out by overwhelming force.

THE REMAINING COURSE

Only one course remains, the course against which General MacArthur flashed his oratorical sword in Congress on Thursday. It is to stay and fight in Korea, to avoid widening the war by any action of our own, and to be ready for a negotiated truce whenever the enemy is ready to agree to the UN terms.

It should be remembered that the UN did not tell the United States, as its agent, to go and conquer all of Korea. Its instructions, passed on to General MacArthur, were to repel aggression and to restore peace and security in the area. It also had voted long before, in 1947, for the establishment of a unified, democratic, and independent Korea, a goal that had been fixed much earlier in the Cairo declaration of the United States, Britain, and China, and had been accepted by the Russians themselves at Potsdam in 1945.

The UN also called on the Chinese and the North Koreans last January for a cease-fire, to be followed by a withdrawal, by stages, of all non-Korean troops. There would have to be assurance, presumably by the supervision of UN teams, that the truce would not become a screen behind which the aggressors could build up a new offensive. And only after a cease-fire, and after an agreement on the future of Korea, would there be negotiations for a wider far eastern settlement, including a discussion of Formosa and a Chinese Communist seat in the United Nations.

These are still the UN terms; they are still the American terms, in spite of General MacArthur's implied statement that anything of the sort would be appeasement. But there is no indication at the moment that the Chinese Communists are ready to accept anything of the sort.

On the contrary, most military reports from Korea suggest that the Chinese are building up a massive new offensive, this time with the help of Chinese and possibly Soviet airpower from bases in Manchuria and Siberia.

Lt. Gen. James A. Van Fleet, the new commander in Korea, is making all his dispositions accordingly—first, to keep the enemy off balance; second to keep his air force ready to shoot any enemy planes out of the sky; and third, to concentrate his firepower in defensible positions if the long-expected attack should come.

The Army leaders in Korea and in the Pentagon here are steadfastly confident that a new offensive can be smashed. They fully believe that the heavy losses already suffered by the Chinese will be doubled and trebled if a full-scale onslaught is tried.

If Chinese or Soviet bomber fleets should strike as part of a great offensive, the UN command would have no hesitation in bombing to destroy the bases north of the Yalu, as General MacArthur has recommended. The war in Korea would thus be widened by the enemy's own decision, and the threat of a new world war would, of course, be nearer.

If, on the other hand, the offensive should turn out to be another great land drive, of the sort that pushed the UN forces back in November, and if the offensive should result in nothing but terrible Chinese casualties, official Washington believes the Chinese Communists would be more willing to discuss a truce than they are now.

And if the offensive does not materialize, if there is a long lull instead, it is not at all impossible that a cease fire can be worked out on terms the UN can accept.

Such are the calculations of those who dismissed General MacArthur from his command, and who now dismiss his ideas as reckless and dangerous. The calculations rest on one basic assumption; that a new world war has not yet begun and can still be averted. They assume, too, that the limited war in Korea is worth all its cost in lives and treasure if it keeps the Chinese pinned down, makes the Russians hesitate, and shows clearly that aggression does not pay.

A course of this kind will not be pleasant for the American people, for their military leaders, or for the men who may have to fight through another fall and winter in Korea. If it is to succeed, two new ingredients will have to be added to the fortitude of the fighting men on the scene.

One is a far greater effort by other UN member nations to send troops for war and occupation duties. So far, as the American public knows only too well, a dozen other nations are represented in the Korean fighting by a total of only 25,000 men.

Nothing injects as much bitterness into the current MacArthur campaign as the belief, among the general's admirers, that other countries have let him down.

The conspicuous offenders include Australia, with only a battalion in Korea; Brazil, with almost 50,000,000 people and without a single soldier on the scene; and India and Pakistan, so intent on their miserable quarrel over Kashmir that they have not sent any of their excellently trained troops to serve the UN cause.

The administration here is moving heaven and earth to get these and other countries, notably the Latin Americans, to see their duty and to do it without further delay.

The second new ingredient of success, as the administration sees it, is patience from the American people. It will not be easy for the families of fighting men to go on supporting a war in which complete victory is not yet in sight.

Americans "are not interested in moral victories, but in victory," wrote D. W. Brogan, the British historian, an acute and friendly judge of our national character. In all our wars there has come a time of public restlessness because the final outcome was hidden from public view. It is more apparent in the Korean war than in any other because of the unprecedented nature and purpose of the struggle. But those who have the responsibility have the firm and unshaken belief that patience will pay rich dividends in the end.

State Department Gets Aid From Churchmen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Sunday Star of April 22, 1951:

STATE DEPARTMENT GETS AID FROM CHURCHMEN

The State Department yesterday announced formation of a religious advisory panel to counsel Assistant Secretary Edward W. Barrett on the religious content of this country's information and educational programs abroad.

The panel, which has held its first meeting with Mr. Barrett, consists of Msgr. Thomas J. McCarthy, of the National Catholic Welfare Conference; Isaac Frank, of the Jewish Community Council of Greater Washington; and the Reverend Edward Hughes Pruden, president of the American Baptist Convention. All three men live in Washington.

"We are convinced," Mr. Barrett said in a statement, "that our campaign of truth can be made tremendously more effective through increasing the proportion of religious materials in the radio programs, pamphlets, and motion pictures that we are sending to people of all religious faiths the world over.

"We will of course continue to adhere strictly to the principle of absolute impartiality in dealing with the various sects."

MacArthur's Welcome

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article by Washington correspondent Ingrid Jewell, of the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, on the subject of MacArthur's welcome in Washington, which article appeared in the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette on Friday, April 20, 1951:

FEDERAL WORKERS VIEW PARADE WITH POLITICAL TONGUE IN CHEEK—MILITARY SHOW, FIXED BAYONETS JAR SPECTATORS

(By Ingrid Jewell)

WASHINGTON, April 19.—Washington today gave Gen. Douglas MacArthur a thoughtful, courteous hearing.

It was a pleasant spring day, with a south wind to ruffle the ranks of flags and the blossoming of fruit trees, and spread the fragrance of new grass tramped under many feet.

It was a day for the outpouring of affection to a national hero.

But things didn't happen that way.

The man in the street in Washington more than likely is a Government worker; or he is closely associated with Government workers. He is politically astute. Probably that is why today he viewed with quiet, attentive interest, but without spontaneous enthusiasm, the military pageant that was spread before him. He knew that General MacArthur had challenged not only the President but also the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and he wanted to know why before he made up his mind to applaud.

DAMPENED BY BAYONETS

For one thing, it dampens gaiety a bit to have to look across a line of fixed bayonets to see a parade. Admiral Nimitz, and General Eisenhower, and Wainwright all had parades in their honor when they came back heroes from the war. But no one thought it necessary to fix bayonets. They came immediately after the war's end, when the country was in a celebrating mood, and they came entirely free from political controversy. Probably all those things contributed to the contagious happiness that marked their celebrations. Those parades were fun; MacArthur's was not.

Probably 75,000 people were gathered on the Washington Monument Grounds, a natural amphitheater, to see the General receive the key to the city. Probably as many more lined Pennsylvania Avenue—the Avenue of Presidents—to watch his progress from the Capitol. The street was carefully roped off. That had not been thought necessary for other heroes.

Probably it was not the general's decision. But a great deal of trouble was taken to make sure the public did not participate in this parade. They were kept in their places.

It is consistent that the general's only really uninhibited receptions came from the hard core of Republican extremists in Congress and from the Daughters of the American Revolution, whose convention he visited for a few minutes during his busy afternoon. The Daughters awaited him impatiently; cried excitedly: "He's here!" as he strode on their stage; applauded and shouted when he assured them solemnly, "In this hour of crisis, all patriots look to you"; and would not let him go until they had sung a verse of Faith of Our Fathers, Living Still. In old-time movie parlance, the general would be known as a heavy. The DAR loved him.

FAILURE AT INFORMALITY

He made his triumphal march in an old trench coat, and a cap unadorned by scrambled eggs. Yet he failed to achieve informality. His speech was perfunctory; his actions abrupt. Even his compliments were imperious. Probably he was tired.

There were loud-speakers everywhere. By far the high point of his performance was his speech to Congress. While he was speaking, the city was hushed to follow the radio. In restaurants the diners handled their silver and dishes quietly; on the Monument Grounds, parents hushed their noisy youngsters so as not to miss a word.

MANY ARE IN UNIFORM

Besides the ranks of soldiers, sailors, airmen and marines that flanked the line of march and manned the bands, there were countless young men in uniform among the spectators.

Up the gently sloping park from the reviewing stand at the Monument Grounds was the White House, now bound by scaffolding attendant on its remodeling, but beautiful even in disarray.

The young soldiers looked that way and one said, "Is Truman here today?"

"No, he's hiding," another replied, and they laughed. MacArthur evoked no laughter.

MRS. MACARTHUR APPEALING

Mrs. MacArthur, a generation younger than he, small and pert with her arms full of roses, was appealing, so was the boy, Arthur, sitting between his parents on the back seat of the huge black touring car with the top down. But the illusion of a family drive was dispelled by the motorcycle escort, charging ahead with red lights flashing.

MacArthur's Removal a "Human Sacrifice"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEO E. ALLEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Sterling-Rock Falls Gazette, of Illinois. This is truly a great editorial and should be read by every American:

MACARTHUR'S REMOVAL A "HUMAN SACRIFICE"

This editorial may well be presumptuous. But as things stand this, Friday, morning, April 20, 1951—there seems little doubt that Gen. Douglas MacArthur's removal was a "human sacrifice."

So far, no denial has been made of General MacArthur's statement that the "top brass" endorsed his Far East military objectives.

In an effort to ease the criticism of the administration, other high officials and the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff, the White House has authorized the following statement:

"STATEMENT NOT DENIED

"Thursday night's Pentagon statement did not specifically deny what the general said.

"The Pentagon statement said:

"'In response to inquiries from the press concerning General MacArthur's reference to the Joint Chiefs of Staff, a Pentagon spokesman said the White House had authorized him to state that the action taken by the President in relieving General MacArthur was based upon the unanimous recommendations of the President's principal civilian and military advisers, including the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The reasons for General MacArthur's relief have been stated previously by the President.'"

Gen. Douglas MacArthur was placed in supreme command of the United States and UN troops in Korea, to win the war, and as General MacArthur so convincingly stated in his address, "in war, there is no substitute for victory."

We appreciate that the interests of England, France, and other European countries are akin to our own. We realize the desirability of cooperation with our friendly nations.

We also appreciate the magnificent job that General MacArthur did in conquering Japan, and the even more marvelous job he did of making the people of that country our friends.

But it was President Truman who ordered the troops into Korea, in an effort to save the people of that country from the slavery of communism.

It was President Truman who placed General MacArthur in charge of our forces in that country.

It must have been the decision of President Truman, through the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff, that MacArthur could not have the help he needed to achieve the victory, presumably he was supposed to achieve.

It was President Truman who removed the General from his command in Korea and his other high positions he had held and executed with such great honor.

The White House statement says the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff endorsed the removal of General MacArthur, but the causes were said to be political, a field in which they are not presumed to function.

It, therefore, is presumed that the removal of General MacArthur and the approval of his removal by the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff, was forced, either by President Truman himself or by influences outside this country.

With all due respect to our desire to work with the other friendly nations in this, perhaps the world's greatest crisis, the friendship of every nation in the world, including Communist Russia itself, is not worth the "human sacrifice" of one single man of the stature of Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

And even more certain are we, that if to maintain the friendship of supposedly friendly nations, we have not only to furnish the sinews of war, but foot the bill as well; and in addition take our orders from outside the boundaries of these United States, then it is time that we save our materials, our cash, and our Armed Forces and spend our time and strength defending our own Nation.

We believe in the spirit that "we are our brother's keeper," but so far as we know there is no place in the Bible that forbids us from also being "our own keeper," seeking and accepting, of course, divine guidance.

We don't give a "tinker's dam" who the man happens to be; we don't care if he occupies the highest position of honor this country can confer upon him; we don't care if this includes the "highest brass" of which this Nation can boast—the time has come when every citizen of this country must have a rebirth of the "old-fashioned patriotism" that places country above self.

When it is possible in this country to remove from a high position, a man of the character, ability, and loyalty of General MacArthur, a "human sacrifice" if you please, even when his military tactics had the approval of his superior officers; when it is necessary to appease any nation—even Communist Russia—by the needless sacrifice of the lives of over 1,000 of our young men daily; to satisfy the lust for power, position, or to "cover up" indefensible mistakes of judgment "it seems to me," the time has come to call a halt.

And in our desire to refrain from being presumptuous to speak with respect, as well as decency—that is stating the case mildly.

Let's Keep "That Something"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. HERLONG, JR.
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. HERLONG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include an article entitled "Let's Keep 'That Something'," a thoughtful and inspiring discussion from the pen of Dr. J. Ollie Edmunds, president of John B. Stetson University, De Land, Fla.:

LET'S KEEP "THAT SOMETHING"
(By J. Ollie Edmunds)

Americans are different from any other people on earth. Here is why: The men who cut the pattern for them a century and three-quarters ago held a deep conviction that men—all men—are born with qualities that give them an unique status. The simple fact that man was born a human being, they felt, marks him as the most important thing God ever created—and entitles him to a certain dignity and to self-respect. They believed that in this sense men are born equal and are endowed with certain God-given, not man-given, rights—to live, to be free, to build their lives without unnecessary interference.

These profound thinkers designed our Government on the basis of this conviction—a new kind of government—one which would be operated by the people themselves. Jefferson said this was to be a great experiment which would determine for all time whether "men may be trusted to govern themselves without a master." He predicted future happiness for Americans "if we can prevent the Government from wasting the labors of the people under the pretense of taking care of them."

In the lively decades which have followed we Americans have become a great and virile people—self-reliant and free. Most historians have thought we could write Q. E. D. after Jefferson's theory that men are able to govern themselves—that we had demonstrated the truth of such precepts for all the world to see. Now they are not so sure. Something seems to be happening to America—and to Americans.

During the depression and World War II we gave up some of our freedom temporarily. Since then we have discovered that freedoms relinquished temporarily are hard to get back. Emergency regulations have led to planning and now the Government—which according to our rules is supposed to be the servant of the people—is pretty much taking over the running of our lives. This planning appears to be changing not only the character of our Government but the character of our people. Millions now seem willing to give up some of their independence if only the Government will take care of them.

The great cause for alarm is not that the planners are planning our lives but that we are allowing them to do it. And the most tragic aspect of it all is that so many of us, who should be more far-seeing, are helping them, by scurrying to Washington every time our own security is endangered, every time we ourselves want some planning from the Government.

This country was not built by men who relied on somebody else to take care of them. It was built by men who relied on themselves—who dared to shape their own lives—who had enough courage to blaze new trails—enough confidence in themselves to risk their chances on rewards.

This self-reliance is our American legacy. It is the secret of "that something" which so long has stamped Americans as Americans. Some call it individual initiative; others backbone. But whatever it is called, it is a precious ingredient in our national character—one which we must not lose.

The time has come for us to reaffirm the things we stand for—to reassert our inalienable rights to human dignity, self-respect, self-reliance—to be again the kind of people Americans are.

Such a crusade for renewed independence will require a succession of inspired leaders—not just men who are opposed to communism, or diluted communism, but men who are militantly for the American way of life. Where are we more likely to find such leaders than in the small independent colleges, which teach self-reliance and practice it?

Today these colleges are working against great odds of war-shattered enrollments and shrinking incomes; but they still are instilling "that something" in their students.

Such colleges are setting tomorrow's standards for tomorrow's citizens. Now, as never before, these non-tax-supported colleges need the help of responsible men and women—practical help. At a time like this, it is not enough that they have the support of those who give their approval and nothing more—who give their blessing when it is their dollars that are needed. They must have the help of people like you.

Prophecies of Disaster

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Iron County Register, Ironton, Mo., published by Mr. Eli P. Ake in the newspaper of April 19, 1951:

The people are tired of old scarecrows—they frighten no longer. They are tired of hearing that the President is trying to precipitate us into war while he works day and night for peace; tired of the harangue of critics with their insidious charges that Government is ruining business while industrial and commercial prosperity is evident on every hand; tired of being told how Government is going broke because the Democratic Party believes in social security for the masses; tired of having every administration action damned and consigned to failure before it has a chance to succeed; tired of being informed that everything the President proposes is wrong merely because of his advocacy thereof; tired of the pratings of Hoover and other discredited individuals who now seek to define the proper manner for conducting the Government of a country which was left flat and feeble after 12 years of their own management; tired of dismal prophecies of doom and disaster, of destitution and despair—tired of a major political party relying on dire predictions of future calamities under Democratic rule instead of offering a positive program of its own. And isn't it all enough to make everyone tired?

Another Smear

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the Democratic Party, the New Deal, the Fair Deal, or what have you, has developed smear campaigns into a fine art. The cruelty with which it has sought to assassinate the character of prominent and patriotic men is one of the blackest spots in modern political history. The people of this country have not forgotten the extent to which a program of slander and libel was carried out against Mr. Herbert Hoover. The American people have now become aware of this vicious practice of the administration, and, therefore, will be on the alert, and not, I hope, be deceived thereby.

Under leave to extend, heretofore granted, I am inserting an article published in the Washington Times-Herald under date of April 23, 1951:

NIXON BARES WHITE HOUSE MAC SMEAR
(By Robert Young)

Senator NIXON, Republican, of California, charged yesterday that under direct orders from the White House, the Defense and State Departments have been working night and day mapping "one of the most vicious smear campaigns in history" against General MacArthur.

NIXON said that the Pentagon and State Department assigned scores of their personnel to the smear project. They said the campaign is now ready to be sprung.

LISTS SMEAR PROJECTS

"The American people should know that one of the most vicious smear campaigns in history has been mapped out in Washington against General MacArthur," the Senator asserted in a statement. "The smear brigade and professional lint pickers have been working night and day since the MacArthur incident began 2 weeks ago."

Acting on White House orders, NIXON continued, military and State Department employees have been digging through "every single file" dealing with MacArthur's 52 years of service. He listed the following as smear projects which were ordered and which are still being worked upon:

1. Five top staff technicians in the Pentagon have been analyzing for more than a week every military operation conducted by MacArthur in Korea for the purpose of finding flaws in that record and discrediting him as a military leader.

STAFF ORGANIZATION PROBED

2. The Pentagon's military government section has been ordered to comb the five-star general's record as supreme occupation commander in Japan since the end of the war in 1945 for the purpose of trying to discredit his handling of the occupation.

3. Experts have been directed to explore every aspect of MacArthur's staff organization, both in World War II and the Korean war.

4. G-2 (Army intelligence) has been ordered to make a complete study of all intelligence communications received from MacArthur. NIXON commented that MacArthur's Pentagon critics contend such an analysis "will hit him at his most vulnerable spot."

5. The historical sections of the Army, Navy, and Air Force have been assigned the job of examining every World War II document involving MacArthur, involving his communiques and press statements.

6. The Marine Corps has the assignment of trying to find fault with MacArthur's role in the World War II island-hopping strategy which began with Guadalcanal.

SURPLUS HANDLING STUDIED

7. Scrutiny of MacArthur's handling of surplus property disposal at the end of the last war has been ordered.

NIXON's charges followed the disclosure by the Times-Herald and the Chicago Tribune last Friday that the Pentagon had begun in earnest to prepare a defense of President Truman's and the Joint Chiefs of Staff's Korean war and far eastern policies against the smashing attack hurled by MacArthur in his address to Congress the day before.

The Times-Herald and the Chicago Tribune learned that Army, Navy, and Air Force staffs were gathering secret documents from their files in an effort to demonstrate that the military chiefs disagreed with MacArthur on major phases of war strategy and policy.

OTHER DOCUMENTS SIFTED

An authoritative source said that for every point made by MacArthur, the Pentagon would try to dig up some statement or document from its files "that might be interpreted as putting MacArthur in a bad light."

The Pentagon announced Saturday in reply to mounting demands that Congress be given access to all documents pertaining to the MacArthur-administration split that only an analysis of the basic differences would be provided. It was reported yesterday, however, that despite this statement, Senate investigators will in the end be given the opportunity to examine anything they wish, although some of the examining and questioning would be in secret session because of national security considerations.

ALL EVIDENCE ASKED

Senator RUSSELL, Democrat, of Georgia, chairman of the combined Senate Armed Services-Foreign Relations Committee which will investigate the MacArthur controversy, said Saturday the investigators will demand all evidence pertinent to the dispute over far eastern policy and pertinent to MacArthur's dismissal by President Truman on April 11.

RUSSELL said his committee will demand all available documents on last fall's Wake Island conference between MacArthur and Mr. Truman. The administration has been taking the line that MacArthur advised the President on Wake Island that the Korean Communists would quickly be defeated and gave assurances the Chinese Reds would not intervene in the war. The Senate committee hearing is scheduled to open about April 30, with MacArthur as the first witness.

NIXON declared in his statement yesterday that it is significant in connection with the Pentagon-State Department effort to discredit MacArthur that "heretofore secret documents are being reclassified and let out to administration pipelines in the press and radio."

NIXON said that the first salvo in the smear campaign was fired last Friday with the publication of a New York Times story citing secret documents on the Wake Island meeting "obviously selected to spotlight every action of the general which might reflect on him unfavorably."

POINTS TO KOREA JOB

"The new test for classifying documents now seems to be not whether the publication of a document would affect the security of the Nation, but whether it would affect the political security of the administration," NIXON asserted. "Apparently the Pentagon leaks like a sieve when the administration has political linen to wash."

NIXON said that instead of spending time and manpower in an effort to discredit MacArthur's past, the energies of the Pentagon and State Department "might be better spent devising ways to develop an effective far eastern diplomatic and military policy and thereby bring to an end the appalling casualties in Korea."

MacArthur was fired because he offered his program for ending the war in Korea with "victory and not appeasement [and] the administration rejected that program," NIXON said.

Address by Hon. Harry Flood Byrd, of Virginia, Before the Daughters of the American Revolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN L. McCLELLAN

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, on April 17 the able senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] addressed the congress of the Daughters of the American Revolution in Constitution Hall in the city of Washington, D. C. This forceful address by our distinguished colleague, discussing the grave issues and problems of our times, should be read by all our citizens, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY HON. HARRY F. BYRD, OF VIRGINIA, BEFORE THE CONGRESS OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION, AT CONSTITUTION HALL, WASHINGTON, D. C., APRIL 17, 1951

I esteem your invitation to speak to you tonight as a very great honor. I wish every man, woman, and child in the country could have the opportunity I have to attend a meeting of the descendants of those who fought and died for American freedom, the greatest gift any generation ever made to its descendants.

Such a meeting, of course, is impossible. But, if I were to attempt to repay you for this privilege of rededicating myself to the ideals which have made America the greatest nation in all history, I believe I could do no better than to give you a word of encouragement and appreciation for your efforts to rekindle within us the vital spark of unselfish patriotic devotion and unity in the cause of American liberty, freedom, and democracy.

In the vocabulary of the DAR's, there is only one ism and that is 100 percent Americanism. What I especially like about you is that you not only know what is right but you have the courage and fortitude to fight for what is right, just as your ancestors fought and died to give freedom to us of this generation. These are not the empty words of a politician here to tickle your vanity. They are an expression from the heart of one who appreciates the great work you have undertaken to preserve your heritage, and mine, and that of all who avail themselves of the opportunities this Nation gives so freely.

As I go about the public business which has been entrusted to me I am shocked and alarmed by the delusion and disunity in which we face what is probably our greatest crisis since Valley Forge.

I will speak with the utmost frankness. This is an obligation of every public man which is even greater in the present period of national peril.

I tell you now, as I have said before, the test of my vote in the Senate and my actions elsewhere, now, as they have been in the past, and as they will be in the future, are determined by what I believe to be best for my country. I say with all the sincerity of which I am capable that such must be the test to be applied to everything by everybody in this country—in public office or not—for a long time to come if we are to restore the peace and freedom for which this Nation was founded and to which it is dedicated.

It seems to me if conditions now existing continue, our security is in more danger from disunity at home than from enemies abroad. We cannot prepare ourselves for a global war, which may be forced upon us, if we spend our time and energies fighting among ourselves. We can only have peace, which all of us so earnestly desire, if we remain strong, and strength can only come from national unity, but cohesive action can only come in this democracy of ours by free and full discussions of the great issues confronting us.

For this and other reasons I was one who urged that General MacArthur be invited to address the joint meeting of Congress at the Capitol, to give this great hero the same consideration and dignified reception as was given that other military hero, General Eisenhower, on his return. And then let us all pray that, out of a free discussion, may come the best solution of these grave perils that confront us. Only here in all the world could such a debate occur, under like conditions, but that is how democracy works and this is how democracy is preserved.

May I state in language which is perhaps over-simplified those cornerstones of freedom which must be preserved: American democracy in very simple language, is an association of all American citizens governed by Federal and State constitutions and by-laws enacted by the elected representatives of the people. It relies upon a three-branch government, each independent of the other.

The American people have risen to resist successfully open attacks made upon this system such as the effort of President Roosevelt to pack the Supreme Court because decisions made by the court then did not meet his approval. When President Truman wrote his Secretary of Commerce recently to ignore the order of a Federal court, it was Judge Bennett Clark of the United States court of appeals, who in the court room said these words that will go down in history:

"If you have an idea," said Judge Clark, "that a letter from the President has any weight in this court, you are mistaken. He has no more standing in this court than any other citizen. He has no right to influence litigation."

This is in the traditions of the Clark family and came from a true patriot.

Approved For Release 2005/11/21 : CIA-RDP57-00384R000100020001-5

It is the independence of the three-branch government that preserves our liberties and prevents dictatorship.

I do not fear direct assaults upon our principles so much as I fear the sapping of the vigor of our people and our Government by termites boring from within.

In the coming years—and perhaps for generations—we will have two great burdens to carry: On one hand we must make ourselves so militarily strong as to protect us from the aggression of communistic nations, and, on the other, we must preserve and fortify our free enterprise system, which, after all is said and done, is the real source of our strength and future security.

The strength of a vigorous free enterprise system is a greater deterrent to world conflict and a more dependable guardian of peace than a United Nations organization will ever be. It is the only force in the world today that Russia fears. It must be preserved.

Russia well knows of our capacity to mass produce implements of war—those things that kill people—as we furnished these war equipments to her in World War II without which she could not have driven the Germans from her soil. Our best insurance, let me repeat, against war is to strengthen and not weaken this production capacity.

One striking example of America's free enterprise system is that we are now producing twice as much steel as all the world combined and four times more than Soviet Russia under her slave system. As steel is the base of all war materials, Russia has just cause to fear our mass production capacity.

Let us not be deluded. The emergency in which we now find ourselves will exist, in all probability, for many, many years. Today Russia has the time table, and Russia has control of the initiative. She began the Korean war—costly to us in blood and treasure—but Russia has not lost a single soldier. We shall have to live for a long time in a period of crisis and be on a war alert even though world war III does not materialize, and pray God it will not. We must constantly bear in mind that the threat of war in a democracy over a long period can be as destructive to our economic system as war itself.

General Bradley has said that other side-line wars can be instigated by Russia. She can turn these side-line wars on and off like a spigot of water. She can bleed us white before the supreme test comes when we may be called upon to fight the combined might of communistic nations. If Russia determines on war she can fix the hour and the place and the day of the conflict, or she can, for years to come, conduct against us a war of economic attrition, sapping our resources and weakening our system of government. This may be her sinister purpose—I am inclined to think it is—and in the past 5 years she has made considerable progress in this direction.

I am not an appeaser. Our future security demands a definite as well as a realistic foreign policy. Russia has such a policy. She has played her cards diplomatically well—much better than has the United States.

We jeopardize our future if we continue to pursue a vague policy of impractical altruism. It must be realistic—and we serve neither ourselves nor the free people of the world when we undertake burdens beyond our ability to carry; make promises we cannot fulfill. We may be powerful but there is a limit beyond which we cannot go and survive. We cannot, I think, go over the world like Don Quixote tilting our lances at every windmill that may have a Communist behind it.

We cannot go over the world trying to make Democrats of people who do not want to be Democrats and who do not, in fact, comprehend what democracy means.

If first things are to come first, what we need above everything else is an impregnable national defense. This may determine whether or not we will live or die.

As a member of the Armed Services Committee, I pledge to you that I will continue to do all in my power to provide such a defense.

I am for compulsory military training and spoke for this program in the Senate. I am for an adequate, fully trained army within our borders. I am for an Air Force of 70 groups, or more. I am for a radar screen around this country.

These things I have been advocating and voting for for years. We do not have them now. We must do our level best to prod those responsible to get them quickly.

And I am for a great navy. I am intensely proud of the United States Navy and the United States Marines. I do not think the marines are policemen or propagandists.

Fiscal preparedness is the first step toward military preparedness and this you have asked me to discuss with you tonight.

On January 15, the President appeared before the Congress and made this specific pledge:

"It (the Government) must practice rigid economy in its nondefense activities. Many of the things we would normally do must be curtailed or postponed."

Yet, a week later he submitted to Congress a budget which, if adopted, will actually increase nondefense spending to the highest level in the history of the Nation whether in peace or in war.

Not only that but in the time of our greatest crisis the President renews his advocacy of the socialistic measures known as the Fair Deal.

The President continues to recommend socialized medicine, he recommends socialized farming, he recommends socialized housing. If you socialize your health, your food, and the roof over your head, you have taken a step from which there can be no retreat. We would soon be in the same deplorable condition as is England.

The President said he had a mandate to pass such legislation in his 1948 election but these measures were not even issues in that campaign.

What has prevented the passage of the socialistic measures? It has been a very effective coalition between the southern Democrats in Congress and the Republicans. I, as one constitutional Democrat, am very proud to have been an active member of that coalition.

The President asks citizens to make deep sacrifices in their daily living yet he declines to make political sacrifices by the curtailment or suspension of measures for the distribution of public funds for nonessential purposes.

In my experience of 18 years in the Senate, under the conditions existing, I regard this budget message as the very height of fiscal irresponsibility.

Unity and the sacrifices necessary to save our country must be a two-way street. They must come from the Government as well as from the citizens.

BYRD'S EYE VIEW OF OUR FISCAL AFFAIRS

We began World War I with a debt of $1,000,000,000, World War II with a debt of $60,000,000,000. Our Federal debt now exceeds $260,000,000,000, plus the debts of States and their subdivisions of $21,000,000,000, a total public indebtedness of $281,000,000,000 and the end is not yet.

In the next fiscal year beginning July 1, 1951, if the budget as submitted by the President is adopted and without new taxes, the result will be approximately as follows:

Expenditures	$72,000,000,000
Tax receipts	58,000,000,000
Deficit	14,000,000,000

With the Federal expenditure level running at $75,000,000,000, total public expenditures, including those by States and subdivisions, will reach approximately $100,000,000,000 annually. This would be about 40 percent of the $225,000,000,000 national income earned by all our people. In other words, in each 5-day week we shall be working 2 days for the Government and 3 days for ourselves.

Our Federal Government is permeated with waste and inefficiency and extravagance. We have 2,200,000 Federal civilian employees and are adding 2,200 new civilian employees every day. Last month the military establishment alone employed 60,000 new civilian employees and only drafted 80,000 in uniform.

The armed services are the greatest wasters of civilian manpower of all agencies of the Government.

The military should recognize the necessity of conserving manpower as it is our main strength in war.

In the Pentagon Building alone the military has 35,000 civilian employees under one roof and no real effort has yet been made to place this gigantic operation on a basis of efficiency.

Faced as we are with grave perils, what would you and I do as sensible men and women if we had the power?

We would eliminate every single nonessential expenditure, including those things in the category of being desirable but not absolutely essential. We would cut off 400,000 of the more than 2,000,000 Federal employees, save their salaries and release them for war work.

We would demand a balanced budget. Remember you never go broke when you pay as you go.

We would demand the saving of billions by the elimination of waste and extravagance and in nonessential functions of the Government. If we should save 10 percent in the President's budget, which means seven to eight billions, this would eliminate the necessity of 50 percent of the new taxes that have been requested.

You, the citizens, may not have this direct authority but you do have the power to hold the elective officials to a strict accountability to discharge their responsibilities on the level of high patriotism consistent with the perils of the great burdens that face us.

I am always willing to vote for taxes for national defense, but I do not like the idea of placing great additional burdens on an already overburdened people for wasteful political spending.

There are thousands of ways the President's budget can be trimmed without affecting essential activities.

I have prepared and will take pleasure in sending you a detailed list if you so request.

Remember that deficit spending means one of two things—either higher taxes which are already approaching confiscatory levels or more debt which is bound to be accompanied by inflation that no amount of regimentation can curb.

We have assumed the responsibility of propping up the economy of half the world. We have assumed the responsibility of helping to arm half the world. We have assumed the responsibility of arming ourselves. We have refused to deny ourselves of wasteful, nonessential domestic-civilian luxuries.

We cannot expect much help from the nations which are associated with us for they are more wards than allies.

Neither democratic freedom nor the free-enterprise system can survive either confiscatory taxes or overwhelming debt.

Our worst strain in the desperate days ahead may be economic attrition at home. We must put Santa Claus in a deep freeze for the duration of the emergency. We cannot carry the world on our shoulders abroad and the New Deal on our backs at home.

The President has dared the Congress to reduce his budget. He has spoken in a belligerent tone. His dare should be accepted. The Constitution gives only to Congress the power to appropriate public funds. The President can only recommend. To attempt to coerce or intimidate Congress in the execution of this constitutional power of appropriating money, is a step toward dictatorship, as the power of the purse in the hands of Congress is a major bulwark in our free Government.

The people, I feel confident, want nondefense spending cut to the bone. It remains to be seen whether an obstinate President who has dared the Congress to reduce his budget can defeat this overwhelming public sentiment.

Why is America great? It is not our population, as we have only 6 percent of the population of the world. It is not our area, which is only a tiny speck on the world's surface. It is not our natural resources, which are being rapidly depleted by the obligations we have undertaken. It is our individual freedom and the free-enterprise system is the vital spark that stimulates every American to gain such reward as his own industry and capacity make him worthy of.

This much is certain: The vital need of the moment is leadership characterized by unselfish and selfless patriotism which will present the stern issues and requirements to the American people for the wisdom of their decision, unencumbered by personal jealousies and political considerations. We have had such leadership in every crisis of the past. It is not too much to ask now. If it is not forthcoming then it is up to us, in lesser positions, through unselfish patriotic organizations to do the best we can with the tools at hand.

In such an emergency as this I know of no better organization than the DAR through which effective effort can be made for our survival and preservation as free people individually and collectively.

The first requirement is sound fiscal condition for the Government of the United States. If freedom in the United States is destroyed either by our own economic folly or by totalitarian might, it will not survive anywhere else in the world. When the light of democracy goes out in America, it is gone everywhere. Who is there to take the torch of liberty to follow us if we fail?

It was on Virginia soil at Yorktown that the independence declared in Jefferson's words was made permanent by Washington's sword. It was in Hanover Town on the Pamunkey River on September 21, 1775, that the Virginia Committee of Safety met. Among its resolutions included one that each district of Virginia should provide itself with colors. On one side was to be the name of the district and on the other was to be inscribed "Virginia for constitutional liberty."

I read this to you because it shows, I think, that we have a certain political constancy and consistency in Virginia, and are now, as a State, "for constitutional liberty" as surely as in 1775. I place emphasis on both words, "constitutional" and " liberty."

And so I say that Virginia yields to no other Commonwealth or State in appreciation of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

We are thankful for what your predecessors have done and for the noble work you are doing in this day, and we pray God that the ideals of the DAR will continue in the years to come as a bulwark of strength to hold the line for the preservation of our freedoms founded upon constitutional democracy.

Jackson Day Address by Hon. William Benton, of Connecticut

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRIEN McMAHON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a Jackson Day address by the Junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] delivered in New Haven, Conn., April 19, 1951.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is the second time in thirteen months I've talked to you at a Connecticut Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner. I hope you won't decide that every time I open my mouth you've got to charge me $100 to make me enjoy it and to persuade me that I'm a resident Democrat.

But I'll be back next year—and the year after that—even if I have to get a loan from the RFC to swing it.

It's good to be with you tonight. In these times of chaos and unspeakable danger, as Secretary Hull described them to me, it's good to be a Democrat. Yes, I'm very proud to be a Democrat.

Last year my 85-year-old Aunt Mary Benton gave me the theme for my speech. She claimed that the only other Benton ever to make the United States Senate was a distant kinsman, or kinfolk as the Southerners say—Thomas Hart Benton, of Missouri, who a century ago served five terms in the United States Senate. A great Senator he was. Last year I looked him up in the Encyclopaedia Britannica. I think you'll agree that its report shows he was a good Democrat, and perhaps of a kind not yet extinct. I quote:

"Although Senator Benton was so independent that he had a great dislike for party caucuses—and despised party platforms—during thirty years of public life, he never voted anything else but the straight Democratic ticket."

He was Andrew Jackson's majority leader in the Senate. The Britannica reports that he once shot Andrew Jackson in a tavern brawl. That perhaps was carrying independence a little far. Yes, Old Hickory carried Senator Benton's bullet in his tough hide all his days. Last year I asked you where you could find another speaker for your Jackson Day dinner who could claim he was kinfolk to a man who put a bullet into Andrew Jackson. (You can see that you have here a powerful argument for keeping a Benton in the United States Senate.)

Since my election nothing has pleased me more than when Ted Granik, the moderator of the American Forum of the Air, introduced me as "Mr. Democrat" when I debated foreign policy with Senator TAFT on a TV hookup. Last Sunday I was again called "Mr. Democrat" on Mrs. Roosevelt's TV program. Nothing could make me more proud, even though I started late in life to work for the title and can't possibly deserve it until I've worked at it for many, many years to come.

Ted Granik started it all when he introduced Senator TAFT as "Mr. Republican." I immediately disagreed. I said Senator TAFT might more properly be called "Mr. Fifty-Percent Republican." I said I had been listening to Governor Stassen, John Foster Dulles, and Governor Dewey. Senator TAFT replied that I would find out about that later. I then told him I would compromise by agreeing to call him "Mr. Sixty-six and Two-thirds Republican." He didn't seem to like that much better. He may be right, at that. In 1952 we shall find out whether he is right.

Of course, when Ted Granik called me "Mr. Democrat" he tied it up to an event which I sometimes think must have called for divine intervention—my own election. It was my victory—it was your victory—in the senatorial election here in Connecticut which gave the Democratic Party its majority of 49 in the United States Senate.

It was right here in New Haven last June, when I talked before a meeting of Tom Keyes' registrars, that I predicted that our Connecticut election was far more than a local affair. I predicted that the control of the United States Senate would hinge on whether we in Connecticut kept our two Democratic United States Senators in office.

I shall now tell you a secret. I stole that idea. And where did I get it? From my great colleague, BRIEN MCMAHON, without whose support and endorsement Governor Bowles would never have appointed me, nor would I ever have accepted. I shall now tell you another secret, an open one. Whenever I make a smart political prediction there's a good chance I'm plagiarizing from BRIEN MCMAHON, one of our great Senators in the great Democratic tradition of Connecticut.

That prediction to Tom Keyes' boys was fulfilled to the last bitter drop. You may recall the early morning hours of November 8. Certainly I shall never forget them. The United States marshals were at work in the last three towns to be heard from—Monroe, Haddam, Pomfret—when I went to bed at 7 a. m. It looked then like a victory by perhaps less than 500 votes—though it turned out to be 1102. Mrs. Benton, a natural politician if ever there was one—both of her grandmothers must have been Irish—Yankee-Irish—followed me to bed at 10 a. m.

Yes; we won, you and I, and when I reached Washington Senator LYNDON JOHNSON of Texas, who had won in 1948 by 83 votes out of a population of 3,500,000, Senator JOHNSON said, "Bill, compared to me, I call you 'Landslide BENTON.'"

I shall now say more. My victory was Chet Bowles' great victory, though it is I who get the plaudits of victory. It was your work and Chet's great run which brought out the big vote, which elected me and which contributed no-man-knows-how-much to BRIEN MCMAHON's big margin. Senator ANDERSON, Chairman of the Senatorial Campaign Committee, told me that two of the greatest runs in the United States were by candidates who were defeated: Chet Bowles and Frank Myers in Pennsylvania. This is what the professionals at the national level know.

So thanks to you and to BRIEN MCMAHON and Chet Bowles, here I was last November, the newest Democrat, the most junior of all the Senators, Senator No. 96, winning by the slimmest margin and at the latest hour—destined to help keep the management of American foreign policy in the hands of the one party which not only understands the chaos and unspeakable danger of our times, but has a program of hope with which to combat them.

May I now suggest that the control of the United States Senate seems likely to control not only United States foreign policy—but world policy—and the chance, and the risk of war or peace? Little did you know, when you were making new voters, that you were helping determine the course of United States foreign policy, and the risk of war and peace.

One of the telegrams I received on November 8 was from my old friend Beardsley

Ruml. You'll recall him as the author of the famous pay-as-you-go tax policy. He's a professional psychologist and one of America's shrewdest publicists. Pay-as-you-go Ruml wired me, "Congratulations on winning by such a small margin. Now everyone who helped you can claim the credit."

Was there ever a truer statement? Many in this room can claim credit for all of, or most of, or much more than, those 1,102 votes. And was there ever better proof of the value of that extra effort, that final effort? My victory grew also of course from the masterly campaign leadership provided by John Bailey, from the hard work and great fight put up by our fine State ticket; and from the votes pulled to our Democratic ticket by our outstanding congressional candidates. But even more than all this, I learned last fall that in victory the credit must go to you here, to you who raised the dollars and the dimes, manned the headquarters, organized the mailing crews, supervised the doorbell pushing, and got out the votes.

To help show you why all of us should be proud to be Democrats, let me tonight for a moment imagine with you that you are entering the United States Senate, and that you are undecided whether to join the Republican Party or the Democratic Party. Let us all imagine that we are Senate fence-sitters for a while before we decide which way to jump. And before we jump, let us be exposed for a few weeks to what goes on in the United States Senate.

First, we agree that we see the Democratic Party split and divided on a few domestic issues, notably on civil rights. We agree that this is a most unhappy division.

But on most other domestic issues—day after day—we see the Democrats as the men of hope and faith, the men of optimism and courage. We see the Republicans as the men who doubt and dissect and who do nothing.

On international issues the Republicans are even more deeply divided than are the Democrats on civil rights. Here in foreign policy we find the big issues on which our destiny now depends. We see the Republicans rent by a great chasm. It divides those Eastern Republicans who, with Senators Vandenberg and MORSE, in the Senate tend to work with the Administration to help fashion the so-called bipartisan policy—from those Republicans of the Midwest or far West who want to lash out right now this very day and take a chance on the big war—or who want to pull back now and retreat into President Hoover's so-called "Gibraltar," or Senator TAFT'S "citadel."

When I prepared this talk for you tonight Senator Vandenberg was living. Last night he died. The tears in my eyes today were tears for Senator Vandenberg. When I served as Assistant Secretary of State I regularly slipped in and out of his audiences for guidance and stimulation and renewed confidence. Without publicity or fanfare he worked with me on my difficult responsibilities in the holding together of the Voice of America, the establishment of UNESCO and the other grave questions with which I was wrestling. He was one of the greatest men of our generation. His loss is a great loss to the Democratic Party, to all the American people, and most particularly to the Republican Party. The absence of his leadership, in my judgment, accounts in considerable measure for the tragic misjudgment and blunders of Republican strategy this very day and for many months past. We Democrats today can join with all our fellow citizens in paying tribute to this great man who in time of his country's peril rose above the Republican Party and above party partisanship to become the chief architect and bulwark of the so-called bipartisan foreign policy—which he preferred to call unpartisan—upon which in my judgment the very life of our country depends.

It is under the leadership of a Democratic President that communism has been stopped in the Middle East, through the Greek-Turkish aid program; that communism in Europe has been checked with the Marshall plan, and now the military aid program; that, we can hope, communism is in process of being rolled back in Asia by the Point Four program, by the Voice of America, by the vigorous action of the United Nations, and by the use of force where force is unavoidable.

You are beginning to see why I tell you that any intelligent fence-sitter who entered the United States Senate today would be ashamed, after a reasonable period of observation, to ask to be listed as anything but a Democrat.

Now, I believe in the two-party system. We need a minority opposition party in this country. Some of the Republicans show some promise of developing into a fairly effective—if permanent—minority opposition. However, I suggest that it has been a couple of Democrats, Senators KEFAUVER and FULBRIGHT, who have done the big job of investigation and exposure, the kind of job historically expected from the opposition.

As a Democrat, in the Senate or out of it, you can justly feel yourselves responsible for our world-wide leadership in this great and terrifying struggle for liberty and freedom. Think it over: it is you and others like you who are responsible for the Democratic control of the Senate and the great gift of freedom for free men everywhere. Yes; that's what it means to be a Democrat.

We Democrats now have a strong and constructive program. We have always had a program. We've always been progressive. Our Democratic Party has risen through generations of growth because it has been an aggressive political force. It served the people in the time of Jefferson and Jackson. It served them under Wilson and Roosevelt. It is serving the people today under a great President to whom the historians will do justice if the newspapers won't: President Harry S. Truman.

You can be proud of the fact our Democratic Party has a solid program. It is a program founded on progress, on humility, and on a desire to give each man his due so that he may live in freedom and security. Further, our program is the program for peace.

We Democrats will have to wait until 1952 to find out what the Republicans think they decide they're going to profess to stand for. We can now say this: they consistently failed at the turn of the century, and the people turned to Woodrow Wilson. Wilson brought about domestic reforms that the Republicans have never dared repeal, though they opposed him and his reforms bitterly at the time. When the Republican leadership failed again in the twenties, the people again turned to the Democratic Party. The major reforms enacted since 1933 under President Roosevelt and President Truman are largely unchallenged today.

For our part, the role of the Democratic Party is to give leadership and to act. Further our role, on appropriate occasions, is to point with pride; and this evening I may say is such an occasion. The role of the Republicans is to criticize, and view with alarm. Let us make sure we keep the Republicans in that historic role.

Without the hopes and ideals of you who are the brawn and sinews of the Democratic Party, without your continued leadership with our voters here in Connecticut and everywhere, and without your willingness to put in long hours and hard work so that we may achieve a place in the sun for free men everywhere—without these things of you and from you, God only knows where this Nation would stand today. And where this Nation stands today, the whole free world will follow. Yes, we can stand tonight and cheer for the Democratic Party, for it guards freedom and security for the world that is not enslaved. Let us remember this as we work for 1952, and for another Democratic victory.

The Use of Television in Congressional Investigations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LESTER C. HUNT
OF WYOMING
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, on April 17, before the National Association of Broadcasters' meeting at the Stevens Hotel in Chicago, the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] delivered a very informative address on the great value of television and radio in the national interest.

I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM ADDRESS BY HON. ESTES KEFAUVER, OF TENNESSEE, BEFORE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF BROADCASTERS, STEVENS HOTEL, CHICAGO, APRIL 17, 1951

There is today a new and vital influence upon Government. As Harriet Van Horne said in the New York World-Telegram of April 6, "When this turbulent year departs into the spheres, the learned historians doubtless will pull on their beards and ponder: What hath 1951 done to set it among the high tides of the calendar? And the answer will come: 1951 was the year television rose up to bring the people back into the Government. The year that restored the dignity of plain goodness and reaffirmed the right of the people to protest."

Before we talk about radio and television, I want to salute the responsible press of America. There is no absolute substitute for the printed word. We hear a broadcast; we see a telecast; but, time soon dims our memory of the details. Details are recorded forever by the printed word. There is a definite and peculiar place for all these media. And America is better off because that is true.

Radio and television aroused the public concerning the work of our Senate Crime Investigating Committee. We could not have achieved its goals without them. For that, the committee members are grateful. But, had it not been for the American press—there probably would never have been an inquiry into organized crime.

It was newspaper and magazine articles which first directed my own attention to the need. Coupling these items with reports of crime commissions the country over, I prepared two legislative measures in late 1949. One measure would have outlawed the shipment in interstate commerce of gaming devices. The other would have regulated the transmission of racing information for illegal purposes. The first such bill has since become the law of the land. But neither of my proposals were ever presented in Congress. My legislative assistant and I studied the situations we sought to remedy in great detail. In the process we discovered we knew virtually nothing about the actual conditions we sought to remedy with new laws.

So, instead, we asked the Senate to allow us to investigate organized crime in interstate commerce. We felt that this was necessary to enable Congress to legislate intelligently.

But our proposal was delayed in passage. It was here that the American press interceded editorially. Demands were made for the passage of the resolution forthwith—and it was passed forthwith.

We sought to exercise extreme caution as we began. We hoped to disappoint those anticipating a circus atmosphere. We resolved never to engage in head-line hunting. We hoped for a calm and serious study of the problem—all without fanfare. Yet, we recognized the newsworthiness of our undertaking. We knew that, by its very nature, it would be somewhat sensational. And we knew also that the sleeping giant of public opinion must be awakened to bring about renewed vigor in law enforcement.

As we swung around our selected circuit radio began to help. Local stations canceled commercial programs to broadcast our hearings. Often, our deliberations were broadcast or rebroadcast from start to finish. This served two purposes. First, it emphasized the sordidness of certain local situations. Local citizens gained knowledge of the corruption by criminals of certain of their officials. They became angry, and determined to clean out their own affairs. Secondly, those who became once interested maintained that interest. They followed our hearings elsewhere when we left their own city. This was important to our mission.

It soon became evident that many underworld characters operated across State lines. It was evident, also, that they enjoyed interlocking understandings. Earlier testimony of officials of the Narcotics Bureau was confirmed. We had been told that these criminals engaged in multiple forms of illegal or immoral commerce. This soon was documented. The interstate pattern began to take shape, but the general recognition of the pattern was not widespread. It was apparent only to a few close followers of our efforts. Nationally, the consensus was that our principal contribution was in unearthing long-dormant cases. The focal point of our undertaking was not being grasped. It would not be, unless and until, the American public gained—through an appreciation of the various intertwining local operations—a national picture.

But a broad view was essential. The sleeping giant of public opinion would not be stirred. Unfortunately, the normal course of public opinion is one of apathy. Because of this apathy, I agreed to write a series of magazine articles. I have been severely taken to task for so doing. But, all of us know that only a small percentage of Americans ever digest the contents of an official document.

I felt the story should be told in more readable manner, if the public was to understand the import of our discoveries. My great desire was for the people to get the facts and to act on the basis of these facts. Law enforcement basically is a problem for local people. The primary responsibility is on Main Street—not on Pennsylvania Avenue. Of course, we in Washington, must share the burden also. We could have expected little correction if the public had not become aroused. I did not forsee television as a medium for doing the job. It did not occur to me that your industry would handle our later hearings as you did. Neither did I anticipate the impact your service would have on Mr. and Mrs. America, otherwise, I would have been less eager to write the story. But television bridged the critical gap. You trained your cameras on us in New York and Washington for 3 weeks. And America saw and heard for herself, then America responded.

For several days, you took us into the living rooms of 30,000,000 Americans. They were first interested, then startled, next indignant, and, finally, determined to do something about it.

Our objective was achieved, but the story does not end. It will never completely end. Continuing viligance is required. There are also immediate tasks ahead. Congress now has full information available to it. Congress must act to make our Federal laws more effective. Congress must see to it that national enforcement agencies actually enforce the laws. And Congress needs a code for the conduct of congressional investigations. The members of these committees must be fair with witnesses. Partisan politics has no place in such activities. There must be no demogoguery. Committee purposes should not be distorted with side issues. We must remember always our office is public service; it is not to permit or encourage a public spectacle. If Congress is at fault in these particulars, it is not the fault of television and radio or newspapers. These media merely report what occurs. Congress should correct its own procedures where they are found to be improper and undignified.

If more functions of Government are subjected to television, we shall achieve better government. Television presents the most nearly perfect facsimile of an actual event yet developed. It is good that the people see their public servants in spontaneous, unrehearsed action. This unseen means of discipline cannot help but improve our efficiency.

Our hearings demonstrated again that, not only does Congress need a code for the conduct of its committees—particularly as to television—but, the television industry also needs a code.

Your experience with this new medium is limited. Hearings of the House Committee on Un-American Activities 3 years ago when Alger Hiss and Whittaker Chambers appeared were televised. But, the situation has changed since that time. Back then your audience was limited. Today, it is unlimited. I think you would do well to appraise what has happened and anticipate what is likely to follow.

The particular governmental unit affected is involved in some of these decisions. In others, the decision is entirely yours. Certainly, your code must follow the code of governments.

Tonight, thanks to you, there is a new, live interest abroad in public affairs. We must all work together to nurture that interest on the part of the people. Ours is a Government by the people as well as for the people. When the people are best informed, then, is our freedom the most secure. To hold the interest of the people in public affairs, ground rules must be established.

Your industry must decide which future public hearings to cover. There will undoubtedly follow in the wake of our inquiry, many others at all levels of government. Sometimes, you may not be welcome. Even the doors of the United States Senate were closed to public scrutiny in its infancy. But, when the coverage is in the public interest, it must somehow be accomplished.

It is important that the public know the whole story. One of our witnesses in New York exemplifies this point. Frank Costello was interviewed by Walter Winchell in Florida, following his appearance before our committee. He appears to have been more talkative in that interview than he was in ours. Mr. Costello is quoted as saying the television cameras unnerved him, causing him to lapse into the slang of the tough East Side district of New York where he was raised. Those who were adjudging Costello—from the head down, at least—gained a true picture of the real man if his statement is to be accepted. Otherwise, the youth of this Nation might have retained the illusion that Costello was a suave and glamorous "businessman." Radio and television fortunately ripped the artificial cloak of respectability from this man. The public saw the man for what he really is.

If we did not have public hearings, we would have star chamber procedures. Witnesses have been testifying in congressional hearings since about 1850. Their testimony is printed and circulated; it is quoted in the press, on the radio, and in public documents; and, when the testimony is of sufficient interest it is recorded by newsreel and newspaper cameras and reproduced fully on the radio. Television is but another progressive step in bringing the Government and its people closer together.

There are many safeguards you will need. You must devise ways and means of improving your mechanical participation. There should be a minimum of light and heat, and collateral noises can and should be eliminated. Coverage should never be undertaken unless it can be complete. It is unfair to a witness to present only a part of a matter concerning him.

One of your more delicate problems is that of sponsorship. I would prefer that the programs be free of sponsorship and rendered as a public service. I recognize the expense item you have, and any sponsorship necessary should consist of institutional advertising. Governmental proceedings are not a fit subject to aid the sale of a commercial product. I urge upon you careful attention to this subject.

Your individual stations—107 television and 2,800 radio outlets—can do much to thwart gamblers. You can arrange matters to prevent the perverting of legitimate sporting news by the gambling element. And, of course, your medium can assist local citizens and authorities in stamping out crime at home.

There is no family in America beyond your reach. You are the perpetrators, or inheritors, of a great medium. Your inheritance consists of genius, enthusiasm, and courage which built a great industry. For that, all of you deserve the gratitude of a nation. So long as you operate in free enterprise, there can be no iron curtain thick enough to cause a separation of the people of America.

Death of Walter Damrosch

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, on December 22, 1950, there died in the city of New York a great musician and musical conductor, Walter Damrosch. Dr. Damrosch, during a long and extraordinarily useful life, brought to millions of people an appreciation of classical music. He was a man of great energy and enthusiasm, and made available to the American public many works by unforgettable composers both of the old and of the new world. He was a conductor of the New York Symphony for 41 years and of the Metropolitan Opera for 50.

His greatest contribution, I believe, however, was in organizing and for many years conducting the children's concerts at Carnegie Hall and over a radio network. Through his efforts and his enthusiasm several generations of children grew to understand and appreciate good music. Walter Damrosch brought happiness to many homes and to countless people.

I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD editorials regarding this great American, which appeared in the New York Times on Sunday, December 24, 1950, and in the New York Herald Tribune on Monday, December 25.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of December 24, 1950]

WALTER DAMROSCH

This is one person's reminiscence of children's concerts at Carnegie Hall 30 years ago: "You never felt as if you were in a big auditorium. You were sitting on grandpa's knee, and he loved music so much he had to tell you about it. He spoke very slowly and with a heavy German accent: 'Now, children, today we have a symphony by Papa Haydn * * *.'"

The conductor was Walter Damrosch, and he introduced millions of persons to classical music that way. For years he had a network radio program like the Carnegie Hall concerts; schools all over the country stopped classes for an hour once a week to hear the program. He was also a conductor of the New York Symphony for 41 years and the Metropolitan Opera for 50, and he had one opera of his own performed at the Metropolitan. Last Friday at 88, Walter Damrosch died at his home in New York.

[From the New York Herald Tribune of December 25, 1950]

WALTER DAMROSCH

More than one generation knew Walter Damrosch as a great and devoted musician. There are those among us who can remember him as the youthful conductor of the Oratorio Society, which this Christmas, as in Christmases past, is carrying on the tradition established by Walter Damrosch's eminent father, Leopold. The same generation, too, can recall the dramatic day when the young Damrosch took the baton from his dead father's hands to conduct at the Metropolitan Opera House. A still later generation knew him best as the guiding spirit of the New York Symphony, in a bygone era when two major ochestrats, not one, were needed to satisfy this city's musical needs. And, finally, there are countless Americans alive today who first encountered music in Dr. Damrosch's famous music-appreciation programs broadcast every Friday morning in thousands of public schools.

To all these endeavors, Dr. Damrosch brought a compelling and contagious enthusiasm for music as a great gladdener of the human spirit. He was responsible for bringing many new works to the American public by masters such as Brahms, Tchaikovsky, and Ravel, and he was one of the few composers who lived long enough to see one of his own works staged at the Metropolitan Opera House. But it was his energetic and unceasing efforts to inseminate music in a difficult soil, rather than his own creative accomplishments, great as they were, that insured his fame and high place in American musical history. If today we have a large and perceptive musical public in America, it is in no small degree the result of his untiring efforts. He both preached and practiced music, and upon his death at 88, the great multitude of music lovers who mourn him offers the best measure of the success of his life's endeavor.

The Issues of Our Far-Eastern Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEVERETT SALTONSTALL
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article under the caption "The deadly chain," written by Stewart Alsop and printed in the Washington Post of April 20, 1951. Mr. Alsop makes a clear statement of the issues of our far-eastern policy.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MATTER OF FACT
(By Stewart Alsop)
THE DEADLY CHAIN

Both President Truman and General MacArthur sometimes seem like actors in a play, who have learned their lines well, but who can have no real influence on the outcome of the drama. Certainly, ever since the Korean aggression, each event has had an inner logic of its own, leading inexorably to the next event, irrespective of the views or wishes of Presidents or generals. What has been true of the past may well be true of the future.

Consider how logical, even in retrospect inevitable, has been the progression of events leading up to our present situation:

1. The United States withdraws its troops from Korea, and the Government adopts the policy that South Korea is neither militarily defensible nor strategically essential. Given the nature of the American state, it was inevitable that this policy should become known in detail to the Kremlin. Given the nature of the Soviet state, which demands the expansion of Soviet power wherever the risk does not appear too great, the Korean aggression was then also inevitable.

2. Faced with the reality of aggression, rather than an imaginary contingency, the American Government instantly and inevitably recognized that successful aggression in Korea would lead straight to disaster. With almost unanimous national support, Truman committed American power to Korea.

3. Sooner or later, American power was sure to destroy the power of the North Koreans. Once this was done, the militarily meaningless line of thirty-eighth parallel was sure to be crossed.

4. Given both the fears and the ambitions which Communist doctrine engenders, it was then at least logical that the Chinese Communists should intervene. It was logical that surprise and numerical superiority should give the Chinese initially a great military advantage. And it was logical also that mobility, firepower, and air domination, all of which the Chinese lacked, should then swing the military advantage against the Communists.

5. It was then logical that the Soviets should try to make up these deficiencies, by supplying the missing components for a successful offensive—transport, heavy weapons, and offensive air power—to their Chinese satellites. This the Soviets have now apparently done, and an offensive is in prospect.

This is where we stand now. Fortunately for the sanity of the of the human race, the future is unknowable. But consider the steps which could logically derive from the present situation, whatever President Truman or General MacArthur may propose or desire:

6. The use of offensive air power for the first time behind our lines could have the most serious consequences, as General Stratemeyer has hinted. If the consequences threaten to be sufficiently serious, the Manchurian air bases will certainly be attacked, as both Truman and MacArthur well know.

7. Having once extended the war to Chinese territory, it will then be logical to hit Chinese supply lines and even cities; to blockade the China coast; to support the Nationalists, and to take all the other steps which MacArthur favors. Again, as Truman and MacArthur know, elaborate plans for doing all these things if it becomes necessary have already been made.

8. This will be the great turning point. But judging from the Chinese precedent, the Russians will then logically intervene, whether openly or in some thin disguise. This will lead to a third world war.

It is President Truman's position that somewhere between five and six, or at least between six and seven, this deadly chain of logic can be broken. But he does not say at all how this is to be done. It is General MacArthur's position that six and seven can be undertaken with decisive effect, and without bringing on eight. But he gives no convincing reasons for believing either that the effect will be decisive, or that the Russians will not intervene.

But what is clear from the foregoing is that events, rather than the views of MacArthur or Truman, will determine our future course. The fact is that the United States alone cannot break the chain, simply because the United States cannot and will not adopt a policy of appeasement or surrender. Yet the chain may yet be broken. Events are sure to force some sort of showdown, probably soon. When it comes, the showdown must be with the real masters of the situation, the men in the Kremlin, rather than their satraps in Peiping.

Those best qualified to judge still believe that the Soviet rulers do not want war, if only because atomic war would surely destroy their regime. Thus if it is made crystal clear that the dismissal of MacArthur is not the prelude to appeasement; that a reasonable Korean settlement which does not reward aggression is nevertheless possible; and that the ultimate alternative is a third world war, there is still a chance for peace. It may even be a good chance.

The Menace of World Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD
OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an eloquent address on the subject of the menace of world communism, delivered by the Very Reverend Edmund A. Walsh, S. J., vice president of Georgetown University, on April 17, before the annual Congress of the Daughters of the American Revolution, at Constitution Hall.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MENACE OF WORLD COMMUNISM

(By Rev. Edmund A. Walsh)

May I, at the outset, express to the Daughters of the American Revolution my sincere appreciation of the privilege again accorded me of participating to some slight degree in the important work so long and so vigorously conducted by your organization. Time and the inexorable weight of irrefutable evidence have both conspired to vindicate the warnings and the programs for an alert and concrete national defense which I have heard advocated from this platform for over 20 years. Your organization is not of the Johnny-Come-Lately variety. You are not among those who now feel the spur of the obvious and clamor for protection and preparedness against a menace that was always present and which never deceived the eye or the intellect of informed Americans familiar with the strategy and tactics of world communism. You have no need to take your patriotism out of moth balls nor seek new ground whereon to stand. You never fell into the trap that Moscow wove for the eager beavers of the pink decade. In this very hall you often raised your voice against the gigantic conspiracy of ridicule and supercilious pedagogy to which the youth of America was subjected in so many colleges and universities of the land during the last two decades. As America sees her younger generation rallying to her defense by millions and dying heroically in distant outposts of the world, our people should thank God on bended knees for a generation that was not lost to civic virtue but proved to be better judges of values than so many of their mentors. Though confused and shaken, perhaps, by the deluge of alleged liberalism, subtle sarcasm, and open scorn directed against the old loyalties by long-haired males and short-haired females posing as advanced thinkers, the youth of the land came through that fiery ordeal substantially unscathed.

Recall for a moment the favored positions then held by the sappers of Christianity and democracy. From high place and from low, from university chair and village green, from the pages of periodicals, from lecture platforms and youth movements, they bored like termites at the foundations of American life, attacking religion in the name of pseudo-science, casting doubt at the Constitution under pretext of political wisdom, seeking social revolution through spurious economic reform and generally creating the impression that America was a decadent plutocracy ripe for the avenging sword of the left wing.

Where now are the dilettants of organized social demolition—the scorners of patriotism and advocates of alien ideologies? Silent as the tomb in which their intellectual bankruptcy lies buried. They dove into cyclone cellars, to emerge stealthily thereafter and creep, in many cases, into Government posts and defense positions. Their chosen victims, youth in particular, defied the planned corruption and now form the very bulwark of America. To them and to those who sealed their loyalty with the bright honor of their young blood, be gratitude and reverent memory.

The cessation of hostilities in 1945 in both Europe and Asia ended one phase of human history, only to usher in another not less decisive for the survival of western civilization.

One of the constant objectives of Communist tactics is the creation of confusion, divided counsel, and procrastination in the ranks of ther opponents. This Machiavellian device was conspicuous and successful in the conquest of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, and other satellite lands whose freedoms have been suffocated under the weight of power devoid of conscience or respect for human personality. Lenin, at a very early date, and with complete frankness set the compass for this wholly materialistic philosophy which controls Communist thought and determines Soviet foreign policy:

"We repudiate all morality that is taken outside of human, class concepts. We say that this is deception, a fraud, which clogs the brains of the workers and peasants in the interests of the landlords and capitalists.

"We say that our morality is entirely subordinated to the interests of the class struggle of the proletariat. Our morality is deduced from the class struggle of the proletariat.

"That is why we say that for us there is no such thing as morality taken outside of human society; such a morality is a fraud. For us, morality is subordinated to the interests of the class struggle of the proletariat." (Lenin, speech before the Young Communist League, October 2, 1920.)

This pronouncement explains the apparent lack of consistency and predictability in Soviet negotiators. Their international policy, despite Winston Churchill's celebrated apothegm, is not "a riddle wrapped up in a mystery inside an enigma." It is the most consistent foreign policy in the world today, because tactical inconsistency is made to serve the Communist grand strategy of world domination.

The Russian revolution never relaxes, though it has sometimes stumbled. It changes tactics and personnel but never renounces its program of planned chaos. It shifts gears and reduces speed but never loses direction or sight of its objectives. It gains or loses momentum but never changes its inner nature or renounces responsibility to itself. It substitutes new forms and places of attack but never relents in its conspiracy for world domination. It swaps the blockade of Berlin for most of China. It concedes you a dime but pockets a dollar. It pretends to love peace and justice but sponsors an aggressive war in Korea.

It must never be forgotten that the Marxian creed, as interpreted by Lenin and Stalin, holds that war between the United States and Soviet Russia is inevitable. Lenin himself laid down that basic doctrine:

"We live * * * not only in a state but in a system of states, and the existence of the Soviet Republic side by side with the imperialist states for a long time is unthinkable. In the end either one or the other will conquer. And until that end comes, a series of the most terrible collisions between the Soviet Republic and bourgeois states is inevitable."

By imperialist states, Lenin meant the non-Communist states of the world. Corumenting on this fundamental tenet of Soviet belief, Mr. Stalin once added the laconic remark: "Clear, one would think."

He further declared:

"Thus in the course of further development of international revolution two centers will form on a world scale: a Socialist center, binding to itself the countries that gravitate to socialism, and a capitalist center, binding to itself the countries that gravitate to capitalism. The struggle between these two centers for the possession of the world economy will decide the fate of capitalism and communism in the whole world."

Whatever final consequences emerge from the war in Korea, one conclusion seems inescapable. If successful there, the Russian revolution will have gone far toward destroying the United Nations. That would usher in an unpredictable period of interstatal anarchy for an exhausted humanity newly disillusioned. It would mean a return to the ice age of international relations and the triumph of totalitarianism. It would mean another long step on the road to that vision of the world in flames which Zinoviev, then head of the Third International, pictured to the visiting Asiatics, at the Congress of the Peoples of the East, held at Baku, in September 1920:

"The real revolution will blaze up when the 800,000,000 people who live in Asia unite with us * * * when we see the hundreds of millions of people in revolt. Now we must kindle a holy war. * * *"

If checked in Korea, the revolution will assuredly strike again, directly or indirectly, on some other sector of its extended battlefront and at a moment of its own choosing. It can never consent to become a nonpracticing world revolution. At best, its managers may accept a prorogated truce—until a safe opportunity to strike presents itself.

Its tactics, however, are calculated to keep the heart and the central military force of the revolution uncommitted to direct conflict. The risks and the wearing-down process are left to others. By stimulating class warfare on the periphery of the bourgeois world now here, now there, now in Burma, now in Malaya, now in Iran, now in Indochina, or Greece, or Turkey, or Italy, it will force the United States to be forever committed to the piecemeal defense of democracy on an expanding global front without conceivably ever meeting the real enemy face to face except in the form of bootlegged Russian tanks, Soviet-made planes, and disguised Soviet personnel. This exhausting process of attrition can continue without the stronghold of the conspiracy ever experiencing direct assault, while the cost in men, money, and supplies will become a permanent and crushing charge on our national economy. How long can we stand that cost? And what shall we do with that enormous war potential when it reaches full growth? Moscow, on the other hand, can husband its unspent forces against the hoped-for day of complete exhaustion on the part of the United States, which will be expected to bear the lion's share of global defense. Should the lion falter or sustain a crippling wound, the Politburo will recognize the moment and send its hordes across the moat already provided by its expendable satellites for the final encounter with the west. Japan will be a prime target. The Philippines, bound to the United States by many ties, will be in mortal danger, and it is not outside the possibilities that Soviet Russia will one day claim Alaska as rightful Russian land and attempt to repossess it, declaring the sale of that Territory by the czarist government in 1867 to have been a null-and-void betrayal of Russian interest by the Romanov dynasty. The only restraining argument at this moment is the atomic bomb—an advantage that is rapidly diminishing as Moscow increases its stockpile.

The rule-or-ruin psychology was manifested in late October 1950, on the occasion of the debates in the United Nations on the reappointment of Mr. Trygve Lie as Secretary General. Despite the obstinate attempts of the Soviet bloc to repudiate Mr. Lie because of his performance of duty during the crisis over Korea, the Assembly voted to reappoint. Whereupon Mr. Vishinsky announced that the Soviet delegation would have nothing to do with the Secretary General and would ignore the decision of the majority. On November 1 an attempt was made by two gunmen to assassinate the President of the United States in Blair House. Two men were killed and several wounded. Telegrams of sympathy and congratulations on his escape reached Mr. Truman from virtually all major foreign powers except from the Kremlin.

Mr. Henry L. Stimson, long an advocate of conciliation with Moscow, finally though reluctantly came to the only tenable conclusion open either to intelligence or charity. "There can be no lasting settlement," he wrote in 1947, "until the men in the Kremlin either change their minds or lose their jobs." At the present moment there is no sign of either miracle. And should one be announced, the players in this prolonged game of global geopolitics must keep a sharp eye on the prestidigitator as he shuffles the elusive pea back and forth among the walnut shells. He is an old hand at it. And there always lurks in the offing another explosive possibility. Good faith and reciprocated confidence are the cement which makes the diverse human elements cohere within the structure of international relations. Because of the habitual lying and twisted propaganda of Soviet negotiators, it can easily come to pass that no man will believe them even in some great emergency when they may be forced into the necessity of wanting to tell the truth.

The record is clear and the future designs of Soviet Russia are not unclear. Her gamble in Korea was logical perfidy. Edmund Burke in 1772 warned Europe that the partition of Poland by Prussia, Austria, and Russia would not be the end of the feasting. It was, he pointed out, only a breakfast for the great armed powers; but where would they dine? He knew that neither history nor appetite for power ever stops short.

The true question before the American people and before their representatives in Congress is not so much the cost in dollars, though heavy, but the alternative possibilities. If the grim record of the past 5 years of Soviet-American relations has achieved anything, it has clarified the cold war down to a basic consideration. The debate is not whether we can afford to do the necessary things for the defense of Christian civilization, but can we afford not to do them.

It is cold comfort but a necessary audit at this point to remember that when Lenin began translating the complexities of Marxian metaphysics into the hard realities of life in Russia on his return from Switzerland in April 1917, he had possibly 75,000 to 80,000 followers. Some records put the figure as low as 40,000. When he became dictator on November 7, his Bolsheviks had increased to 175,000 in a population then estimated at 150,000,000. Today, 34 years later, the power of the Kremlin reaches down and influences directly or indirectly something like one-third of the human race, possibly 800,000,000 persons. On the continent of Europe one of every two inhabitants lives under controls and policies dictated by the Political Bureau of the Russian Communist Party. With the momentum acquired by the revolution in China, the same proportion now threatens for Asia. Who shall predict the consequences? What will happen to civilization if another generation becomes enslaved to the earthy humanism which has been dominant in Soviet Russia since 1917 and is now the official goal in the satellite lands? That moral and intellectual degradation of spirit to the level of the flesh and of matter has made fear the dominant atmosphere in which government operates. There is no free science; there is no free church; no freedom of the press, of speech, of labor, of education, of art; nor of literature, nor of industrial enterprise, nor even of movement from one city to another. What will happen to the souls of its victims if the resultant forced obedience and servitude freezes into a fixed culture? What will happen if submission and servility become a habit born of fatigue and frustrated hopes? What will become of truth if its expression is confined to the rigid pattern of dialectical materialism in the service of militant atheism? If falsehood becomes state policy? When even language and the vocabulary of human relationships become distorted and dragooned into the party line? Who shall say that such a sickness will never spread? Even the two-thirds of the human race not directly subjected to the Communist empire are vitally affected by it, since the foreign and domestic policy of every government is profoundly influenced and often conditioned by what the Kremlin does.

One conclusion seems inevitable. Direct conflict with America is definitely assumed and clearly predicted, as must appear to any careful reader of official pronouncements made by Lenin and Stalin. The manner and timing of that eventual clash probably constitute the main preoccupation of the technicians charged with scheduling the progressive stages of world revolution. What counts for the world, then, is the political psychology and declared objectives of Soviet Russia's small governing class at a given moment, not the mute and captive aspirations of her 200,000,000 inhabitants. They are not the real enemy. The only argument respected by their masters is evidence of power possessed, in being, and ready for instant release.

Because of the global strategy of world communism, one must school himself to see its objectives steadily and see them whole. It is the same revolution operating on many battlefronts and in many forms, whether military in Korea or political in Eastern Germany, or through terrorism in Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania, or by use of spies and traitors in the United States and Canada. Like a chameleon, the Politburo changes color in changing circumstances but never deviates from its plotted course. Wholly devoid of respect for international law, except when it can be invoked in Moscow's favor, the managers of this consolidated world revolution, by their tactics, have maneuvered the Government of the United States into the present tragic impasse between General MacArthur and President Truman. Though patently associated with Communist China in attacking American forces in Korea, Soviet Russia relies on a fiction to cover its participation, even as it relied on a fiction to isolate Berlin in 1948 and starve the inhabitants into submission to the satraps from Moscow. That pretense was met and defeated by the colossal daring and ingenuity of the airlift. Defeated there, the Politburo transferred their attention to China, then to Korea and resurrected the ancient device of warfare by proxy. Charged by the United Nations with the over-all duty of crushing the military forces opposing him, General MacArthur deemed it the part of realism to pursue the aggressor to his lair north of the thirty-eighth parallel and destroy his military capacity to inflict another 60,000 casualties on American troops. His point of view recognizes the practical impossibility of dealing with the fringe of a conflagration without extinguishing the self-renewing sources of the blaze.

The President, on the other hand, is confronted with an equally impressive weight of argument and public obligation attaching to his high office. As Commander in Chief of all the Armed Forces of the United States, he has the unquestioned right to transfer, relieve, or recall any commander in the field, particularly if he is convinced that the officer's conduct is not consistent with directives lawfully issued. General MacArthur's prompt obedience to the specific recall is in the best tradition of his profession. This is all in the book of regulations and the case would seem to be closed—if it ended there.

But, at bottom, we are not faced with a domestic, a legal, or a jurisdictional problem; the basic issue remains unsolved no matter what happens to General MacArthur. There still remains the historic confrontation between the two mighty opponents who, as Lenin and Stalin both unequivocally declared, must sooner or later meet in some titanic Armageddon. War between them is inevitable according to Mr. Stalin. That being so, the best place to meet the enemy is in Asia, concludes General MacArthur, whose knowledge of the Soviet mind is not inferior to any man I have yet met.

The President, on the other hand, together with his advisers, believes that Western Europe is a more favorable and crucial battlefront. Moreover, to adopt the logistics of warfare presumably favored by General MacArthur, might precipitate world war III before we are prepared for it, in the opinion of official Washington. Hence, regretfully but in good conscience, the President took the drastic step that needs no description here.

I should like to emphasize at this point that I have no political nor partisan motivation in anything I may say touching this dramatic episode. I am only a disenfranchised inhabitant of the District of Columbia and owe allegiance to neither political party, since neither has deemed us important enough to be admitted to the franchise. Hence, like every legal resident of the District, I am obliged by the nature of things to cultivate that impartiality which the Non-Partisan League endeavors to achieve by art. What I do assert is that both the General and the President can remain major influences in meeting the greatest crisis and the greatest peril that has ever menaced this country. One of them is a brilliant and distinguished soldier whose military achievements lie outside the area of the current controversy. The other is the President of that Nation to whom the entire world now looks with hope and expectation of leadership. Now that the military requirement of personal censure have been fulfilled by the prompt return of General MacArthur, a new chapter is about to be written on the blank pages of a very uncertain future. Controversy and disunity at home cannot but please the Politburo and dismay all Christendom. What a thrilling and heartening spectacle it would be to the entire non-Communist world in its present agony of anxiety, if, for example, President Truman were waiting at the airport when General MacArthur descends from his long flight. Such a gesture of national unity, or any other similar proof of greatness of mind would by no means indicate that the European point of view, so widely expressed in the overseas press, had been ignored or minimized. What a shock it would be to the Kremlin to see these two great symbols of power enter Washington shoulder to shoulder in a common resolve to meet the common enemy of mankind in unity of heart, and mind, and might. It would be notice to the Kremlin that the Government of the United States intends to use every component of its physical, intellectual, and moral assets in meeting its international obligations.

Deferment of College Students

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Trouble Ahead on Student Deferment," published in the Peoria Star on April 8, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TROUBLE AHEAD ON STUDENT DEFERMENT

There is some logic to support the President's order providing draft deferment to college students on the basis of scholastic ability, but it seems to us more than offset by what may be anticipated in trouble. Doesn't it amount to setting up a Nation-wide competition among college students, with deferment from military service as the winners' prizes?

General Hershey pointed out that the President's order was in harmony with the will of Congress, which provided for draft deferments "in such numbers as may be necessary to the maintenance of the national health, safety or interest." It requires a broad interpretation of "the national interest" to warrant the deferment of students on the basis of their intellectual capacity. There is some merit in arguing that these are the scientists, doctors, and engineers of the future, but it will be a bitter thought to many a student who is not intelligent enough to win deferment, that a democracy is setting up a class of elite intellectuals from which he is barred.

One can imagine such complaints as "We're dumb, so we do the shooting and get shot at. The smart guys get the soft jobs."

There is a good deal of justification for that anticipated complaint. We see in it an all too prevalent attitude, expressed by the editor of an eastern newspaper. He recognized the need for training bright young men for scientific and technical work. But he added that "provision must likewise be made to insure that the vital thread of our cultural and political heritage will not be snapped by a generation of men who through no fault of their own may have to spend much of their learning years studying the arts of war."

To us that is an odious thought. It means that intellectually gifted young men are too valuable to the state to be used in the defense of the state. Valuable in what way? In that they constitute an elite class in whom our cultural heritage must be preserved.

In addition to the fact that the principle stated above is foreign to the principle of equality in a free country, we can think of two practical objections to the operation of the President's deferment plan.

First, deferment is to be based on students' class standing and on psychological tests designed to measure learning capacity. Is the psychological capacity for learning a guaranty that the man is qualified to be a member of the elite who will preserve our cultural heritage? Some of our greatest rogues and criminals have had the keenest minds. If Alger Hiss were a college student, no doubt he would pass the test with flying colors. And it should be remembered that it has been among the American intelligentsia that communism has enjoyed the greatest hospitality.

Second, in spite of the development of psychological testing, we doubt that the techniques are accurate enough to be used as a criterion for determining who, in the future, will contribute most to scientific advancement or the preservation of our cultural heritage. As we remember it, Thomas Edison was rated a very poor student in his few years in school. And Abraham Lincoln's life was a series of dismal failures before he became President of the United States. We doubt if psychological tests can discover the future Edisons and Lincolns.

The principle of intellectual distinction in selective service, like the recent proposal to provide Federal scholarships for persons who might become most valuable to their country in specialized service, is a totalitarian principle. Its basic hypothesis is that the individual belongs to the state. The principle is abhorrent to those who believe in the democratic ideals and traditions of the United States.

Ambassador O'Dwyer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ
OF NEW MEXICO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, through the kindness of my good friend, Carroll Cone, an executive of Pan American Airways, I have received a copy of a translation of an editorial concerning Ambassador O'Dwyer, and I ask unanimous consent that the translation be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the translation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Translation of editorial from Excelsior, Mexico City, April 3, 1951]

VERY GOOD, MR. TRUMAN

It does not escape anyone that the return to Mexico of Mr. O'Dwyer, the United States Ambassador, has been received by the Mexican public with a strong feeling of friendliness. The daily newspapers have been publishing the incidents of the testimony which the Ambassador rendered to an investigating commission of the Senate of his country, and it is looked upon favorably that President Truman has supported him in his high mission in Mexico and that President Aleman has shown his good will with regard to O'Dwyer by sending him the Presidential plane to New York for his return trip to Mexico.

In reality—and we are guided by information published in the New York press—the investigation which the commission of the Senate is carrying on with regard to the activities of the gangsters is nothing new. At least every year some scandal is raised for political purposes, which scandal as a rule melts like a snowball exposed to the sun's rays.

One New York publication calls the investigations referred to an "old story." The political aim pursued with regard to this matter is clearly outlined. It is the continual fight of the two large historic parties of the United States and of the groups within them. On the other hand, using common sense, it sounds ridiculous that the mayor of the largest city of the world, as is New York, should have accepted a donation of $10,000 from a syndical fire chief of that city. Naturally, Mr. O'Dwyer denied this charge before the Senate commission.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

What we wish to emphasize is that the testimony in question and its political repercussions constitute an internal problem of the United States. What the Mexican opinion has looked upon with pleasure is the return of the Ambassador, who has known how to win our good will because of his simplicity, of his respect for Mexican customs, and because of the personal interest he has shown for all cultural activities, and therefore for the prestige of our country. Ambassador O'Dwyer personifies good understanding, friendship between the two countries on a firm basis of mutual respect, and the good-neighbor policy.

Wake Up, America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES H. DUFF
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. DUFF. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Wake Up, America," delivered by me at the dinner of the Brand Names Foundation in the ballroom of the Hotel Commodore, New York City, on April 11, 1951.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAKE UP, AMERICA

(By Senator JAMES H. DUFF, of Pennsylvania)

Right now this country faces the most critical period in its history. For my part it is almost impossible to overestimate the danger. And that danger is magnified by the recent let-down both in interest and concern by the public as well as by responsible public officials

Everything that goes on world-wide indicates that we in America should be acutely aware that we are opposed by a brutal, world-ambitious and powerful enemy—an enemy whose aim is the destruction of the United States. Russia realizes better than we seem to that the United States is the last powerful road block against the domination of the whole modern world by the evil men in the Kremlin. And yet we in America are not united either in purpose or in determination in the face of this threat to our very existence.

The almost endless discussion and wide divergence of opinion on all matters having to do with our preparation for defense is sure proof that as a Nation we are neither fully appreciative of our danger nor of the urgency needed to quickly prepare us to meet that danger. As a people we are undecided where we are headed, how we expect to get there, or what we will do when we do get there.

There lingers among many of us the hope that somehow as a people we can separate ourselves from the problems of the rest of the world, and thereby escape the furious turmoil that surges and flows back and forth everywhere around the globe. There was a time when we could do this. While there are those who still maintain that they can disclaim the tag of isolationism, in substance nevertheless their thinking represents an unawareness of the danger we face together with a lack of appreciation of the complete change in the physical character of our situation today when compared with former years.

In the days when isolationism was a proper and beneficial American policy, the physical facts of our situation justified isolationism, because the barriers of two oceans placed us beyond the probability of successful attack by those who might be our enemies. But that time is past. For while we remain separated by those two oceans from Europe on the east and Asia on the west, neither those oceans nor the friendly nations who are our neighbors north and south are no longer a barrier to aggressive nations. Today we live in an age when both time and place barriers have been destroyed.

What has happened in this age of air communication and transportation has made all nations our neighbors. As a people we can no longer be tempted by the memory of those former days of isolation with the hope that we can still be isolated, because then we were in fact isolated from the rest of the world by physical barriers. But the physical facts of today's world prevent isolation just as in those days they made isolation both possible and desirable.

Last month a British bomber flew nonstop from Western Europe to eastern North America in 4 hours and 37 minutes. That flight was almost as meaningful to America as the discovery of this land by Columbus. It connected Europe and America in only 37 minutes longer than it takes the best express train to make the run between the National Capital at Washington and New York City. Think of it—4 hours by train from the National Capital at Washington to New York City and only 4 hours and 37 minutes by plane from Europe to America. However little we may relish the idea, it meant that whatever happens in Europe also affects us here in the United States almost as much as if it happened in one of our adjoining States. Certainly it means that Western Europe must be denied to the Russians unless the whole concentrated area of industrial enterprise of the eastern United States is open to atomic bombing immediately world war III comes up.

Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg, Chief of Staff of the United States Air Force, the other day made this statement:

"Should war come we can expect to destroy no more than 30 percent of the planes making the attack in strength on the United States before their bombing missions are completed. And our preparations today are not yet beefed up even to achieve that figure. Even if we had many more interceptor planes and antiaircraft guns and radar screens that blanketed all approaches to our boundaries, a predictable 70 percent of the enemy planes would penetrate our defenses despite the extraordinary valor and skill of our pilots. * * * The bleak and blunt evidence of the last war proved conclusively that no bombing attack ever was turned back by the most strenuous defensive action. The offense always has a crushing advantage in aerial warfare and there is no prospect that the balance will change in the foreseeable future."

In the light of this testimony by the Chief of our Air Force, and with the knowledge that only 4½ hours separate Europe from America by air, it ought to be clear that we dare not yield Western Europe to Russia if we expect to protect our great industrial centers from continuous bombing from bases in Western Europe should it be overrun by Russia.

With our air-closeness to Europe there can be no safe and sure fortress here in America.

One of the necessary lines of defense for the United States is now certainly Western Europe.

Nor is it of ourselves alone that we must think, because we in America are the leaders of the free people of today's world. We did not come by that leadership out of a desire to carry on war, or to create a colonial empire, or with imperialistic ambitions as the Russians assert. We came into that leadership by default of the power of those who had exercised it before us and because we represent more forcefully than any other great nation the idealism of freedom in today's world.

When we assumed world leadership, even against the wishes of many of our people, it came to us naturally by reason of our power and what we stand for. And we have it today whether we want it or not and with the leadership we also have the responsibility that always accompanies it.

Every realistic person knows that communism is on the march everywhere. Communism is united everywhere. But the free people are not united nor energized by common purpose. If communism is to be stopped, if freedom is to be saved, we in America must exercise the full responsibility that we occupy as leaders of all those opposed to returning the world to a period of darkness to which all the doctrine of communism tends.

Everyone knows that America desires peace. Russia's assertions to the contrary are mere smoke screens to conceal her own imperialistic, power-mad designs. There is every reason why we should want peace here in America. The average American enjoys the greatest material well-being ever enjoyed by people anywhere. And at the same time we have had unexampled civil and religious liberty. We have nothing to gain by war. On the contrary, we have everything to lose by another world conflict.

It is Russia that has decided that war will be the order of today's world. No other meaning can be ascribed to the vast military preparation of Russia that grows week by week, month by month, and year by year. And since Russia has indicated by the whole course of its action since World War II that it is its purpose to dominate the world, we in America dare not refuse to be prepared.

The enormous military preparation of Russia is aimed at ultimate war with the United States. Therefore, we must be prepared for any eventuality, because Russia may attack any hour of the night or day and without notice. That is the method of all totalitarian and aggressive nations. There is no reason to suspect anything less of the Communists because already since World War II Russia has gobbled up all its neighbors, set itself up in the very heart of Europe, and now moves far east across Asia to the Korean Peninsula and the Pacific Ocean.

What must happen to arouse America to the seriousness of the crisis that confronts us? Will it be necessary to repeat Pearl Harbors across America? Will we wait until a great number of industrial centers are struck the same night at the same time by coordinated atomic bomb attacks by the Russian air force in an endeavor to wipe out the industrial supremacy of this Nation? Or will we prepare? And will we prepare in time? And will we prepare sufficiently to develop our might so that Russia will be convinced that even if she should pull a sneak attack our power of retaliation will be so annihilating that communism dare not risk the devastation of that retaliation?

Today's world is on fire. Unless we help to put it out we too will inevitably be consumed in the conflagration.

We are now in far graver danger than before either World War I or World War II. It required the sinking of the Lusitania to awaken us to our danger in World War I. The perfidious attack on Pearl Harbor was necessary to awaken us in World War II. In this atomic age we dare not risk the danger of an all-out attack by atomic bombing on this country before the scales drop from our eyes to disclose the danger by which we are confronted.

When Russia decided to use her puppets in Korea to further extend her control over Asia, we in America were genuinely aroused and deeply concerned by our battle losses in that far-off war. Now, well on to a year later, we seem to have settled down into a period of relative indifference, with business and politics and everything else as usual.

From the very fact that the Red Army in Korea is right now building its forces to a new power and maximum, there is renewed evidence that it is the purpose of Russia to force the fighting there even if world war III comes on thereby.

What do we in America propose to do to meet this tremendous crisis? That is a question every American should ask himself, because in a free country preparation depends in the end upon the sentiment of the people.

In my solemn judgment right now we in America face the ordeal of survival. It is imperative therefore that we make up our minds to what we intend to do. Then we must insist upon a program of action commensurate with the dangers. We must go forward continuously until we are in the position of such power that Russia dare not run the risk of starting world war III.

And to properly prepare this country, the present fogginess and confusion that exists in much of the public thinking must be burned out and that must be done immediately. Examine the situation in the command in Korea; the failure of many to realize the risk of having Western Europe overrun by Russia; and the recent directive on deferment of bright college boys.

The situation in the command in Korea is a specific instance. The American people have a right to know who is going to run the show in Korea, what the objectives are, and how those objectives are sought to be accomplished. There must be a definite, clean-cut statement as to what is political policy and what is Army policy and who is deciding which and why.

The MacArthur situation is a case in point. It is regrettable that the dismissal of General MacArthur had to take place. But if dismissal was the only way to accomplish unity then it had to be done because the lack of unity was harmful to the best interests of the Nation. When the commander in the field publicly and repeatedly disagreed with the Commander in Chief and the Joint Chiefs of Staff he thereby created an impossible situation that had to be resolved.

Supreme authority in the Armed Forces must reside somewhere. Under the Constitution of the United States it resides in the President as Commander in Chief. To permit a continuous dispute as to authority and military policy at the most critical juncture in our history is unthinkable.

Whether we agree with the political judgment of the President as Commander in Chief is entirely another proposition. That can only be resolved by the American people in the election of a new President.

As another example of the confusion that exists in the country and of the resentment that grows out of lack of proper direction, let us take the matter of deferment of college students of high grade. Certainly, that would be an un-American thing to do. I am sure our people would not tolerate putting bright college students on a pedestal and allowing the rest to remain in a subordinate position in the matter of service to their country. This country needs brains in its armed services right down the line, as well as in the other phases of our national activities. But above everything else, to create exemptions or preferences for any class in America is intolerable to the average citizen's ideas and would not work. The deferment of bright college students would absolutely be in contradiction to the fundamental principles of American democracy.

As for Western Europe, the so-called great debate revealed the utter confusion of many and the failure or unwillingness of some people to understand that we dare not risk the capture of Western Europe by Russia, even apart from the danger of Russia using Western Europe as a base for attack by her upon the United States.

The industrial production of Western Europe is too great to be joined to that of Russia in a war where production may well turn the scales for victory. During the past year the productive capacity of Western Europe increased to 130 percent of what it was during World War II. It is currently running at the rate of 140 percent of World War II production. When we realize that Hitler in World War II without the production of either Russia or England almost overran the world in 4 years, it becomes clear how imperative it is that this increased production of Western Europe must be denied to Russia if we are to win through in a possible conflict for survival against communism.

The people of Western Europe and the people of the United States are together responsible for 90 percent of all the inventions and betterments that go to make up modern living. They have the same know-how as we do. Without Western Europe, Russia cannot possibly defeat the free people of the world in the event the Reds decide to risk world war III in the attempt at world domination. Therefore, above all else, at this critical juncture of civilization, Western Europe with its common cultural, moral, religious and legal background, cannot be permitted to be overrun.

Here in America we are a free, peace-loving people, so we are at a tremendous disadvantage when dealing with an aggressor nation. We are in a terrific dilemma, because we do not know whether Russia will strike in the immediate future or after a long period of years. But in any event the tension will continue to be upon us and the danger will be as great one day as another, irrespective of what horn of the dilemma we face.

Therefore, first off we must be ready at all times against a possible attempt at a knock-out blow by a sneak attack. In this connection, never was this old slogan more apt—"Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." Consequently, we must prepare immediately to be strong and to stay strong. No halfway measures will do. We must not only be strong in military might, we must also maintain high industrial production geared for defense needs, because in modern warfare, in the long run, industrial production is equally as vital as military preparation. On the long view, if we are obliged to be ready over a long period, it is imperative also that we work and prepare our plans on the basis of feasible and practical financial costs so that we do not ruin ourselves by bankruptcy while we are waiting to prepare ourselves for what Russia will probably attempt eventually.

On the floor of the Senate the other day it was stated that it costs Russia only $7 a year for the pay of a private soldier. Even a brigadier general in the Russian Army receives compensation of only $300 per year. By comparison, the lowest-paid soldier in our Army receives $1,080 per year. And the maintenance of a man in the field in our Army, plus his allotted proportion of all the maintenance and equipment cost assignable out of general operations, puts the expense in the American Army at $10,000 per man per year. A Regular standing army of 4,000,000 men, therefore, would cost this country $40,000,000,000 per year while we stood by awaiting the course of Russian decision and action.

It is clear that this vast expense for a standing army is more than we can afford. Our problem must be solved some other way. The only practical alternative is universal military training.

Gen. George C. Marshall, Secretary of Defense, recently made the following statement with reference to universal military training, with which I am entirely in accord:

"No man is wise enough to know how long the present emergency will last. One thing we do know. Unless we give unequivocal proof now of our determination to organize our defenses on a sound, long-range basis, our potential enemies will be encouraged to believe that we will, sooner or later, relax our vigilance and provide them with an opportunity to achieve their goal of world domination. * * * Scrapping universal military training * * * would be sufficient to cancel the assurance that our defenses would have, for the first time, an enduring base that would guarantee us adequate military strength at a cost we could bear for the years of critical world tension that we now face. Universal military training is not a step toward militarizing our country. Its effect is precisely the opposite. * * * It would require fewer men under arms, while giving us a vastly greater number of trained men quickly available for duty in a sudden emergency."

As I have tried to make clear, in my judgment, we will face the danger of such an emergency for a long time, in the event world war III does not come up with shocking and startling suddenness.

One military crisis after another pops up here and there around the world; in each case with the Russians pulling the strings in the background. Within the last month the Middle East oil picture became strong in focus as a result of Russian manipulation and interference. Now Korea looms larger with mounting Red forces building up behind their front as a part of their spring offensive. In Yugoslavia and the Balkan countries the tempo steps up to a place where the possibility of a start of world war III looms there.

This world-wide movement and anxiety and turmoil makes clear that we in America must avail ourselves of these precious months of time to prepare ouselves for the worst, instead of assuming that our defense is a casual matter that may be attended to at some reasonable leisure. We have not adjusted ourselves and our attitudes or our preparations to the critical posture of events facing us. The fact is we are not treating the situation as the vital and tremendous emergency which it is. That goes for all America and since it does, certainly our slogan ought to be "Wake Up, America."

It must be made clear to every American citizen that unless we are realistic enough to appreciate the danger, to take the necessary steps in preparation of defense, and to make the necessary sacrifices, we of this generation may not be able to transmit to those who come after us the blessings of which we ourselves have been the heirs and beneficiaries and which have made us the most prosperous, the most fortunate, and the most favored of all people in the whole history of civilization. That heritage has come to us as a result of sacrifice and unless we are willing to approach our responsibilities in the spirit of sacrifice, we will not be worthy successors of the great men and women who have given us what we have.

We face the challenge of survival. If we are to successfully accept that challenge, we must be willing to do the things necessary to meet it. And unless we do and until we do, neither ourselves, nor our children, nor our children's children will continue to enjoy the blessings which have made America the most wonderful place in the whole world.

In the words of Abraham Lincoln, "Let us preserve this last best hope of earth."

Crisis in Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY P. CAIN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, in these days of stress and trial, all of us are particularly concerned with the present status and future of America's higher education. In the recent past, I have benefited from reading the thirty-first biennial report of the board of regents of the University of Washington. I was particularly impressed by the President's introduction. I believe that every Member of the Congress will benefit from what President Raymond B. Allen has said. Dr. Allen has stated that the University of Washington must and intends to prepare its students, as mature human beings, to assume their personal responsibilities for the welfare of their families, their communities, and their Nation. He concludes his definition of the university's teaching mission in these words:

The noblest end of education is the development of young men and women dedicated to useful lives of self-reliant citizenship and responsible leadership.

I ask unanimous consent that the president's introduction be printed in the Appendix to the RECORD, where it may provide the reader with encouragement, and with an awareness of the fact that one of America's great educational institutions is determined to conquer and scale the obstacles and problems of the present in order that the university and its students and graduates may keep pace with progress.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PRESIDENT'S INTRODUCTION

EDUCATION IN CRISIS

This report is written at a time of gravest crisis, at a time when freemen everywhere are striving to purge their institutions of weakness and buttress them for a struggle that threatens their whole way of life. By reason of this fact, this report differs from those that have gone before. It is far different from what it might have been had it been written 6 months ago.

The pattern of Communist aggression is unmistakable. To anyone willing to judge the Kremlin and its satellites by their actions rather than their words, the naked aggression in Asia can appear only as a part of a larger design of world domination.

Communist China's intervention in Korea insults and defies the United Nations decision to protect the free people of the world from violence and terror. The classic strategy of infiltration and of psychological, economic, political, and guerrilla warfare are softening Southeast Asia for conquest. India, Japan, and the Philippines have their places on the Kremlin's timetable. Western Europe raises its guard, uncertain when or where the blow will fall.

Inspired by hate and fear of the ideas, ideals, and moral unity of the West, the U. S. S. R.-controlled international Communist organization is engaged in a brutal international civil war against freedom and is using the United Nations organization as a battleground upon which to wage psychological and political warfare on the free world. Because it suits her design for world dominion, Russia gives lip service to the purposes of the United Nations. But now the Kremlin's true allegiance is clear, and the moral indignation of the free world mounts as practical security measures are finally being taken.

Perhaps the most important of the security measures we can take is the strengthening of education for freedom. Now that we know our enemy and know that he is active here at home and throughout the world, we should strengthen the educational bastions of the free world.

If we are to survive, we must know ourselves as well as our enemy. Our resources are many, but if we are to prevent another world war, or if we are to win such a war should it come, we shall have to excel in more than science, technology, and industrial output. We shall have to show the world that, as individuals and as a Nation, we are clear and strong in our resolution to act in the interest of freemen and for freedom for men everywhere.

Naturally, our enemy wants to engage us on ground that is to his advantage—ground on which guerrilla tactics will win. Fortunately, such tactics are not strange to Americans. By these tactics, Americans won their own freedom and opened up the West. This, however, is not the only lesson our national history has taught us. A more important lesson we have learned, or should have learned, concerns the nature of security.

BUILDING SELF-RELIANT CITIZENS

The only real security a society can have is based on the individual security of self-reliant citizens. Unfortunately, in our quest for security in an industrial society, we have too often weakened the incentives for individual self-reliance. We have done this in many subtle ways, some of which are rooted in education and the home. Are children encouraged to assume responsibility, and thus to become self-reliant as adults, by a society which gives them little or nothing responsible to do? Does lock-step education develop independence?

If education is to make its maximum contribution, it will do so by placing greater responsibility on young people themselves to sharpen their own powers of mind and perception, to strengthen their bodies, and to toughen their moral and spiritual fiber. Such toughness of body, mind, and spirit characterized our forefathers. The present generation has these qualities, but, in the all too many cases where they are only latent, it is the responsibility of the home, the school, and the church to bring them out and develop them and thus to better prepare our youth for survival in a world already at war. I am convinced that youth educated and trained for the kind of war in which we are now engaged will be individuals who can survive and who, by the very nature of their training, will forever cherish the freedom which is the priceless heritage of western civilization.

This kind of training always has been, and always should be, the objective of education in a democratic society. The present emergency challenges education by making clear that this objective is not merely desirable but is essential to survival.

The University of Washington is acutely aware of its responsibility in the present emergency. This report is not, however, a report of a university getting ready for cataclysm. It is precisely the opposite. It is a report showing how the university's long-term programs have actually strengthened it to assume positive leadership in whatever activities are needed, whether in peace or in war. It is this kind of forward-looking management that this report attempts to depict. The report seeks to picture the university's broad, over-all patterns of activity—what the university is, what it does, how well it does it. It does not pretend to detail all of the individual accomplishments, fine as they are, in the scores of colleges, schools, and departments, for to do so would risk losing sight of the forest for the trees.

No one knows precisely what the national situation holds for American education in general or for the University of Washington in particular. We are aware, of course, that the present situation, characterized by simultaneous search for peace and preparation for war, places a heavy responsibility upon higher education and poses for it a tremendous challenge. This is not merely a matter of how selective service calls may affect enrollment, although we must face realistically the probability of some kind of universal service if the Nation is to achieve its goal of armed security. It is not merely a matter of maintaining the Nation's pool of trained scientific manpower during a period of mobilization or universal service, difficult as this problem will be if all young men are called to service on reaching the age of 18 or upon graduation from high school. It is not merely the problem of getting the ablest of these young men back into college for specialized training, both in their own interest and in that of the Nation. It is not only the problem of how colleges and universities can best serve in national defense programs. It is all these things, yet it is something else as well. The real challenge that faces America's colleges and universities includes the challenge of preserving the truths and values of American civilization, of maintaining and enhancing the intellectual and spiritual, as well as the material, strength of the whole Nation and the Western World, of guarding, over a long period, perhaps, the habit of intellectual endeavor and the respect for principles and values which undergird the whole structure of our free society.

THE SEARCH FOR ULTIMATE VALUES

The University of Washington proposes to meet these challenges with selflessness and with a keen awareness of basic moral values. The university is not seeking merely to strengthen itself as an institution, nor does it feel that, if global war comes, it need only convert to training programs while it goes among the people bidding them to be strong. What the university faces is a decision on a course of action that will preserve it and, if possible, strengthen it as a rampart of freedom. If it should fail in this it will have failed to meet the greatest challenge of all.

Against this background the work of the university stands out in its many dimensions. Yet, if one is to judge the university and evaluate its performance, he needs something more. He needs a plumb line of permanent mission, of objectives, against which to measure for trueness the university's work. With this in mind, it has seemed proper to preface this report with a statement of the mission of the University of Washington, as those responsible for its administration conceive that mission to be:

The university exists to serve the people of the State of Washington; through teaching, to train young men and women for more intelligent, responsible, and productive lives; by research, to develop more adequate solutions to social and scientific problems; and by every means to apply its knowledge and skills in the interest of the people who support and sustain the university and thus give it life. The university's function is to so organize and nurture this life as to build ever more securely a free society of free and self-reliant men and women.

The research and service objectives of the university are clear. Their accomplishments depends upon the maintenance of superior staff and facilities, high standards of performance, and the application of energy, skill, and imagination to human and material problems. The university's record in this regard, an excellent one, is becoming better year by year.

The teaching mission of the university, on the other hand, is by no means so simple or so easy of accomplishment. It is a mission shared by education in free institutions everywhere. There is a great ferment over its definition and over means for its full realization. The university is concerned, of course, with creating the proper conditions for learning, with keeping alive the good and true in the past experience of mankind, with the development of skills, with the cultivation of habits of industry, curiosity, and imagination, and with seeking perspective and wholeness of understanding. But the university must go beyond these traditional and admittedly fine concepts if it is to be worthy of its name. It must prepare its students, as mature human beings, to assume their personal responsibilities for the welfare of their families, their communities, and their Nation. The university, then, must not be satisfied with mere training for vocational competence and personal achievement. Above all else, the University must seek and develop in youth those qualities of character, idealism, and spirit without which learning, however brilliant, is socially sterile and possibly dangerous. The noblest end of education is the development of young men and women dedicated to useful lives of self-reliant citizenship and responsible leadership.

This, then, is the mission that motivates your university and unifies it in time of crisis. Never before in history has the accomplishment of these objectives been more sorely needed. Never before have the integrity and security of the Nation been in greater jeopardy. It is the purpose of this report to show how the university has attempted to meet its own high standards and how it will seek to respond with purpose and force to whatever challenge the future may bring.

RAYMOND B. ALLEN.

Proposed Sale of Old German Embassy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Don't Sell the Embassy," which appeared a few days ago in the Cleveland Plain Dealer. It has to do with Senate bill 873, introduced by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], introduced for the purpose of preventing the sale of the old Germany Embassy. I hope the bill will be brought up for early consideration in the Senate.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DON'T SELL THE EMBASSY

What seems to us to be a waste of time and energy and a deal that we have to pay for in the end anyway, is the attempt of Alien Property Office to sell the old German Embassy on Massachusetts Avenue in Washington.

It is a nice little cottage with 70 rooms and 13 baths. It was seized from the Hitler government when the United States entered World War II. The highest bid received was $101,050, and this, the alien property custodian says, is too low. He will try to negotiate a higher price.

The folly of this projected deal consists in selling this property at a time when diplomatic relations are being reestablished with the Bonn government.

Because military government still retains a measure of control over German affairs, Bonn has not yet been authorized to appoint full ministers or ambassadors. It is empowered, however, to reestablish the consular service and to send charges d'affaires to friendly countries. Sooner or later, as occupational direction relaxes and Bonn becomes sovereign, ambassadors will be accredited to other powers. At the rate controls have been lifted that will not be far off.

Where, then, will the ambassador hang his hat? When, before that time, a charge d'affairs is sent to Washington as one already has been dispatched to London, where will he operate?

It would be much better to hold this property in trust until Germany is back on its feet and then return it to the new, responsible German Government. The Russians have given the German Embassy in Moscow into the keeping of an envoy from the eastern zone. In Prague the Czechs have done the same. Likewise, the Turks have returned the property to the Bonn government.

Maybe this isn't the way to operate on American lines. We will probably persist in selling the property. Then, when the Germans need a new embassy, some agency of the Federal Government will donate them the money with which to buy it just as we donate so much cash to other countries to make up for equally shortsighted mistakes.

Narcotics

REMARKS
OF
HON. HALE BOGGS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the press releases over the week end indicate that the Senate Committee on Crime intends to recommend, among other things, legislation greatly tightening up the penalties for narcotic violators in the United States. I am very glad to inform the House that a subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means has been working on this problem for the past 3 or 4 weeks, and we have now recommended to the Committee on Ways and Means the adoption of H. R. 3490, which has the full approval of the law-enforcement officials of this country and which, in my opinion, if adopted, will go a long way toward suppressing the narcotic trade in this country.

The letter from the Attorney General and the grand-jury report are as follows:

Hon. HALE BOGGS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BOGGS: In accordance with the understanding at the hearing held by your subcommittee on various bills, particularly H. R. 3490, introduced by you and proposing certain amendments to the Federal narcotic laws respecting the penalties to be imposed, there is enclosed a copy of a recent report of the Federal grand jury at Detroit, Mich., on drug addiction among teen-agers.

You will note that this grand jury recommends the passage of H. R. 2340, which, except for minor changes and clarifications, is very similar to H. R. 3490, and upon which the department commented in its recent letter to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

Yours sincerely,

PEYTON FORD,
Deputy Attorney General.

REPORT OF THE FEDERAL GRAND JURY AT DETROIT, MICH., ON DRUG ADDICTION AMONG TEEN-AGERS

We, your grand jurors, duly empaneled in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan, Southern Division, to inquire into and investigate such matters as are presented to us, or that shall be called to our attention, involving offenses committed within said district, and specifically matters involving violations of the narcotics laws, particularly the use of narcotics by so-called teen-agers, make the following report on our investigation of such matters:

Your grand jurors report that conditions of the most shocking nature were revealed in the testimony adduced before them; that young people ranging in age between 14 and 21 have become confirmed and inveterate users of heroin, morphine, and cocaine; that these young people, upon becoming enslaved through their addiction to narcotics, resorted not only to thievery in the homes of their parents and relatives but became shoplifters and common thieves, and that many of the young girls became prostitutes because of their craving for narcotics and the necessity of obtaining money to purchase enough to satisfy the daily needs of their uncontrollable craving.

The powerful stimulus of the constant threat of illness soon dominates the life of an addict. In the case of the school youth they start diverting their money for lunches and other school expenses to the purchase of narcotics. Soon they must quit school so that they can devote full time to the pursuit of the money necessary to support their habit. The tragic record shows that the girls usually drift into prostitution as one way to obtain the money necessary, and the boys drift into thievery of all kinds and into gambling. Usually the thefts first take the form of stealing valuables from the home to be pawned. Sooner or later, if the parents or guardians do not learn of the addiction and place the patient under treatment, continued thefts outside the home come to the attention of the juvenile authorities. From the foregoing facts your grand jurors reach the inescapable conclusion that narcotic addiction is the root of, and is responsible for, the widespread wave of crime that constantly plagues our society.

Your grand jurors find that the smoking of marihuana has become the daring thing to do among our school children of the teen-age group, and an increasing number of those who experiment with marihuana go on to experiment with the innocent looking white powder known as heroin, which has suddenly become so easy to purchase in many neighborhoods near schools. At first, there doesn't seem to be much difference between smoking marihuana cigarettes and sniffing white powder in searching for a thrill; the tragic fact is that the majority of the youngsters who start experimenting with heroin do not know that a physical dependence is developed which makes it impossible to stop taking it without becoming desperately ill. The painful withdrawal from heroin and other similar narcotic drugs can be accomplished only by a harrowing withdrawal illness of 10 to 14 days' duration, followed by a period of several months of convalescence and rehabilitation if the patient is to have any chance of remaining off drugs. From sniffing heroin ("snorting" is the less elegant expression), the new addict soon has to shift to the hypodermic or intravenous injection of heroin by syringe and needle in order to obtain the maximum effect from the drug which his body now demands.

Your grand jurors find that these young people first commenced the use of marihuana through association with those who had formed the habit; that their curiosity contributed to the habit of smoking marihuana and soon thereafter the nervous condition brought on by the smoking of marihuana led them to the use of heroin, which created not a habit but an addiction, dominating their bodies and minds. Your grand jurors were amazed and appalled by the revelations which reflected the moral degradation of the individual and the disintegration of the family life of those who were affected—the misery and sorrow that is caused by narcotic addiction can only be attested to by families whose members have become victims.

Your grand jurors find that in some instances these young people were able to obtain marihuana in stores across the street from some of the schools in Detroit, where they not only purchased it, but were given the opportunity to smoke it. In most of these cases, we find that the student would soon leave school to follow other smokers whose paths lead to bars where the bands are patronized, to a great extent, by young people. We find that there is a strong propensity on the part of users of marihuana to follow bands, a good many of whose members are marihuana smokers, and whose popularity with the so-called "be-bop" music attract large numbers of young people to dance halls and bars, and other places where liquor is dispensed. It was in such associations that most of the marihuana users were introduced to heroin, and once introduced to heroin, they became "hooked."

We find that treatment of the individual addict is extremely important, not only to bring about the rehabilitation of the individual, but also because drug addiction is, in a sense, infectious. Each active addict at liberty in the population acts as a focus for spreading addiction. In teen-agers, the invariable history is that addiction started as the result of association with another addict.

We find that some parents of victims were extremely remiss in their parental duties, manifesting in some cases a total lack of solicitude towards the welfare of their children; that many parents are completely indifferent as to the whereabouts of their children, their associations and social diversions or recreation, and many of these young people were left to themselves to mold their lives without any parental guidance or interest, rendering them in many instances easy prey to evil influences. The indifference and ignorance of some parents was so incredibly profound that some of these children were able to smoke marihuana and even inject heroin in their homes without detection for long periods of time.

We find that in the past very little emphasis has been placed upon the provision of adequate personnel for the enforcement of the narcotic laws; that apathy and total lack of appreciation of the importance of adequate and proper enforcement of the narcotic laws is responsible for the unbelievable numbers of narcotic peddlers providing the teen-agers with a facility for the purchase of narcotics which has led to the increase of narcotic addiction now rampant in our communities, and that, as many teen-agers testified before us, narcotic addiction will continue to increase unless a positive and systematic program of apprehending and prosecuting those who commercialize the illicit sale of narcotics is put into operation and supported with unrelenting vigor.

We therefore recommend the passage of Congressman DONOVAN'S bill, H. R. 2340, as the best weapon to suppress the abuse of narcotic drugs. This bill provides a mandatory sentence of 5 years for the second offense for narcotic peddling and 10 years for the third offense. This recommendation is made without any reflection upon the judge of the eastern district of Michigan, whose heavy sentences in these cases have helped to prevent a much heavier traffic in illicit narcotics here than we now have.

We recommend that the State Legislature of Michigan enact the following amendment to the State Uniform Narcotic Act, and suggest that other States adopt this amendment:

"Whoever violates any provision of this act shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $—— and be imprisoned not less than 2 or more than 5 years. For a second offense, or in the case of a first conviction of violation of any provision of this act, the offender shall previously have been convicted of any violation of the laws of the United States or of any other State, territory, or district relating to narcotic drugs or marihuana, the offender shall be fined not more than $—— and be imprisoned not less than 5 or more than 10 years. For a third or subsequent offense, or if the offender shall previously have been convicted two or more times in the aggregate of any violation of the law of the United States or of any other State, territory or district relating to narcotic drugs or marihuana, the offender shall be fined not more than $——, and be imprisoned not less than 10 years or more than 20 years. Except in the case of conviction for a first offense for violation of the provisions of this act, the imposition or execution of sentence shall not be suspended and probation or parole shall not be granted until the minimum imprisonment herein provided for the offense shall have been served."

We recommend that legislation now before the Michigan State Legislature providing, in substance, that persons under the age of 21 be excluded from establishments where intoxicating liquor is dispensed by one glass, be passed.

We find that some countries in Europe, particularly Italy and Turkey, where heroin is produced for medical purposes, for some unexplainable reason have a production of heroin far in excess of their medical needs. We find that of such excess of heroin produced by these foreign countries, a goodly proportion is being smuggled into the United States and thereafter is being illicitly sold here.

We find that the smuggling of narcotics into the United States from these countries is carried on to a great extent by seamen on steamships traveling between Europe and the United States. We find that vigorous measures to deter these seamen from smuggling must be applied, and that if such measures were used—such as permanent revocation of seamen's licenses and vigorous prosecution upon detection—the supply of illicit heroin in the United States would be reduced to a minimum. This would eliminate many peddlers and the consequent exposure of our youth to drugs.

We recommend that seamen detected in smuggling narcotics into the United States be severely punished by permanent revocation of their licenses, disbarment from membership in mariners' unions, and criminal prosecution. We urge that the United Nations Narcotic Commission make a firm and unrelenting effort to bring about the same vigorous measures in punishing seamen of other nations for the same violations.

We strongly recommend that the United Nations Narcotic Commission exert its influence upon those nations producing narcotics beyond their medical needs and that said Commission request these nations that the production of narcotics be limited to the necessary medical needs of their countries. We make this recommendation with the firm belief and understanding that the elimination of excessive production of narcotics on the part of some of these foreign countries will have a most beneficial effect upon the United States by eliminating much of the illicit narcotics now being smuggled into the United States.

We strongly recommend that the Congress of the United States make immediate appropriation of funds necessary to increase the facilities of the United States Public Health hospitals for the treatment of addicts at Lexington, Ky., and Fort Worth, Tex.

We strongly recommend that the Congress of the United States provide the Federal Bureau of Narcotics with more agents for the entire country, in order to bring about satisfactory enforcement of the law. This recommendation is made with the firm belief and conviction that unless the Federal Bureau of Narcotics is given sufficient personnel to cope with the illicit narcotic traffic, our youth will be constantly in danger.

We recommend that the city of Detroit, as well as other cities throughout the United States, increase their narcotic police forces. This recommendation is made with the firm belief and conviction that adequate personnel in a municipality for the enforcement of the narcotic laws will compensate for itself in relief from crime such as larceny, robbery, housebreaking, and prostitution, which are crimes generally engaged in by addicts to obtain money to support their addiction.

We find that the use of marihuana alone does not create an addiction, and that while the use of marihuana leads to the use of heroin, marihuana does not develop a physical dependence such as is developed following the use of heroin. We, therefore, find that exemption from military service of those found to be using marihuana is not justified. We recommend that no exemptions from military service be given to those merely using marihuana. We recommend that the military authorities set up a special work detail where those using marihuana to any substantial extent may be temporarily confined and rehabilitated for military service.

We recommend that the Michigan State Legislature pass legislation to quarantine drug addicts by requiring them to be committed to hospitals until they are pronounced cured by medical authorities.

Your grand jurors feel that the advisability and propriety of establishing an educational program for dissemination of information concerning narcotic addiction requires a more serious study.

The grand jury deplores the unnecessary publicity which followed the narcotic conviction of a popular picture star and the exploitation of this conviction by certain Hollywood studios, which had a telling impact on many young people who began using narcotics. Glorification of persons who have been connected with the narcotic racket is bound to have a detrimental effect on persons of impressionable age, and glamorizing these questionable characters has contributed to the current wave of youthful addiction.

We urge that the Michigan Liquor Control Commission and other law enforcement agencies increase their vigilance over those bars where the bands feature so-called be-bop music and attract large numbers of our teen-agers.

We urge that the owners of these establishments be compelled to assume more responsibility in guarding against persons suspected of dispensing narcotics; and that while most of these licensees are sincere in complying with the regulations to which they are subject, a few of them have shown a definite indifference to the presence of narcotic users and peddlers in their business places, and we recommend that the Michigan Liquor Control Commission consider seriously the revocation of licenses issued to those who display a lack of interest in and responsibility for the presence of suspected users and peddlers of narcotics in their places of business.

We urge that the parent-teacher organizations become more militant in a program of definitely eradicating demoralizing influences in the vicinity of the schools; that such organizations recruit for members more parents of high-school students, and adopt a system of screening, with vigorous and unrelenting determination, all business places in close proximity to school areas.

We urge that all civic organizations, particularly businessmen's organizations, in our communities seek out the business places where young people are permitted to congregate for long periods of time without any apparent reason and ascertain whether the owners thereof are sincere and conscientious in their efforts to detect the use of marihuana; that they expose business places where tolerance and indifference of the owners have made possible conditions under which users and peddlers of marihuana have flourished with impunity. We firmly believe that a cooperative program on the part of these organizations will contribute materially toward discouraging the use of narcotics among our young people.

Your grand jurors express their gratitude for the splendid cooperation given by the office of the United States district attorney, the agents of the Bureau of Narcotics, and the local bureau of narcotics. These agents are to be complimented for their devotion to their duties, working long hours under difficult conditions with inadequate personnel.

Your grand jury wishes to impress upon everyone that the problem of narcotic addiction places a responsibility not just on the enforcement officers, the social workers, the school authorities, or on any one segment of society, but upon every one of us. We must assume that responsibility and use whatever resources may be at our disposal to combat in every possible way the evil forces and influences that have, thus far, demoralized our youth to an alarming degree.

Respectfully submitted.

In the Public Interest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. McCARTHY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Commonweal:

IN THE PUBLIC INTEREST

In March 1945, a few days before the death of President Roosevelt, Robert Sherwood returned to this country from the Pacific theater of operations where he had made an inspection tour for the President, having been especially instructed to get General MacArthur's views on our future Pacific policy. When Sherwood, who said he was enormously impressed with the range of MacArthur's views on the Orient, made his report to Roosevelt, the President remarked: "I wish that he (MacArthur) would sometimes tell some of these things to me." So deeply suspicious of the Democratic administration were MacArthur and his staff, that Sherwood said he found the unmistakable signs of a persecution complex at work in the MacArthur entourage.

In recent months General MacArthur chose to impose his private views on his Commander in Chief by means of a message to a veterans' convention, an unauthorized message and implied challenge to the Chinese commander in Korea, and a letter to the minority leader of the House. All told, one can only judge these actions to have been the behavior pattern of a man who put himself above the laws of courtesy and country.

MacArthur's opinion on Pacific policy—which is, that Asia is the decisive battlefield to be defended against the Communists and that therefore we should extend and not limit the Korean war—is an opinion totally in opposition to American foreign policy; in holding this opinion, MacArthur was defying the judgment of the President, the State Department, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Eisenhower, the majority of the United Nations and the majority of the Congress. One may, if he is an admirer of the general's, believe that the general was acting in a democratic manner, in deference to the will of the majority and in the best interests of the principle we fight for, the principle of the democratic way of life. But the burden of the proof is on him. This, it seems to us, was the behavior of a man in defiance of the majority, a man with a will-to-power that was contemptuous of the prevailing reason of the majority; this, in short, was the behavior of the self-appointed genius who always thinks he knows what is best for the ignorant masses and whose actions are in the pattern of history's long chronicle of dictators.

Maybe MacArthur was right; maybe he was one of those rare and enlightened leaders destined to show mankind the way. Certainly he had reason to be restive, since he had been in a most difficult military position ever since the United Nations was forced to defend itself on the distant and disadvantageous Korean Peninsula.

But in our judgment MacArthur was disastrously wrong and we are of the opinion that the mystique of his enlightened leadership was a cult too jealously guarded by a selected group of admirers to be genuine. We consider MacArthur's policy to have been wrong for the following reasons:

First, we believe that in order to wage war now against the West, the Soviets must have the steel-making capacity of the Ruhr, or Japan, or both. Therefore western policy should be to prohibit Russia from the Ruhr and Japan by building up a defensive position in the free world with all haste, in the hope of stalemating the threat of a world war.

Second, we believe that in order to give us time to build these defenses, every effort should be made to limit the Korean war to Korea, because to bomb Manchuria means to bomb the rest of China eventually, and this in turn means that Russia will be forced to come to the direct aid of Mao Tse-tung. Since the United States cannot hope to defeat the Communists through nonatomic air power alone (we could not destroy the North Korean army with air power, nor can we destroy the Chinese armies now, even though we have had absolute control of the air), we would, then, following MacArthur's strategy, have to send our armies into the futile and bloody trap of a land war in Asia. Were this to happen, Russia would have accomplished her desire to spread and thin out our nonatomic air and land forces around the world to a point of such overextension that it is doubtful whether Western arms could be supreme in any one theater of war.

Third, since it is possible that under such circumstances the great powers will resort to atomic warfare (especially if the rumored atomic artillery shells are a reality), we believe that it is the moral obligation of Christians first to exhaust every possible means of averting this unspeakable massacre, and one of those means right now is to limit the war to Korea, making every effort to discharge our moral obligation to defend the United Nations there without providing further conflict.

Fourth, we believe that the present foreign policy of the administration is essentially correct in its European emphasis and in its combined objective of defense and negotiation. This policy is by far a better hope for an honorable peace than the swaggering belligerency of MacArthur.

In his last attempts to dictate the far eastern foreign policy of this country and of the United Nations, General MacArthur clearly exceeded his authority and, in defying the normal processes of the democratic code, he placed himself outside the cause and the ideology we are trying to defend; he in fact brought on his own dismissal. Surely the President acted with sincere regret, as he has said. But certainly his decision was for the common good; it was, we believe, the only decision he could have taken in the interests of discharging his responsibility to the country and to all those throughout the world who look to us now for a reasonable example of leadership.

In a very real sense Mr. Truman could only afford to make this decision trusting in the ability of his countrymen to weigh the facts impartially; if the MacArthur partisans choose to attack Mr. Truman as wildly as we anticipate they will, then we believe that those who support the President in this matter have every good reason to stand by him now and thus vindicate the high trust he has placed in them.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Unacceptable Explanation," from the Joplin (Mo.) Globe of April 13, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNACCEPTABLE EXPLANATION

In his radio address to the Nation Wednesday night, President Truman attempted to justify his summary dismissal of General MacArthur by explaining that the general is not in agreement with United States and UN policy in the Far East.

Even if one grants that this is true, it by no means will be deemed a sufficient excuse by MacArthur's admirers and supporters for the harsh and spectacular method used in ousting the general from all his commands.

But it is also true that millions are by no means convinced United States and UN policy, as President Truman outlined it, has been clear enough heretofore for General MacArthur or anybody else to understand just what it is or has been.

Merely to plead that we want no third world war is no explanation for the unceremonious firing of MacArthur. Nobody wants a third world war. Certainly MacArthur doesn't. But neither he nor millions of others are ready to accept a back-down from the position taken by the United States and the UN last June as the only safe recipe for avoiding a third world war.

Such a back-down is exactly what is proposed by the Asia policy as described by President Truman Wednesday night.

When he directed MacArthur to use United States military forces to challenge the aggression of North Koreans last June the idea was that the free nations of the world must make all of Korea safe for freedom. Now the President and his advisers are apparently convinced we cannot do this; that the best out is to accept a compromise that will leave the North Koreans at the thirty-eighth parallel to ready themselves for another march into South Korea at some future date.

Is it surprising General MacArthur would be dissatisfied with any such conclusion to a war that has already cost the United States more than 50,000 casualties? He is the type that believes in finishing a job. He doesn't accept defeat, partial or complete, with complacency—which is the major explanation for his great popularity with so many Americans. And which also is a major and sufficient reason why he should never have been subjected to the outrageous treatment he has been accorded.

Wheat for India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS R. UNDERWOOD
OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a letter I have received from the rector of Christ Church, Episcopal, of Lexington, Ky. The Reverend James W. Kennedy is pastor of the church of which I am a member. He is the author of the book The Man Who Wanted to Know, and has created the character "Parson Jim" in writings and radio programs.

Personally, I am very much impressed with his plea for wheat for India, because it strips this issue of all the doubts that surround it. This includes, of course, concern over the policies of the representatives of India in the United Nations. No one will question the use of our surplus wheat for this purpose when it is considered entirely as a humanitarian act.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHRIST CHURCH,
Lexington, Ky., April 14, 1951.

Hon. THOMAS R. UNDERWOOD,
The United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR UNDERWOOD: I quite realize the tremendous difficulties in the way of passing that wheat for India bill, both from the standpoint of governmental red tape and the private transportation facilities which it would require. I am also convinced that there is no intention on the part of either the Senate or the House of Representatives to use this bill as a political measure. When I think of the amazing job which Florence Nightingale did in the face of insuperable odds, and those odds mainly with Government officials and procedures, I realize that anything, no matter what it is, i. it is right and needful, can be accomplished, provided however there is one man or one woman utterly convinced and given to the cause. I believe more than any other single factor our delay in doing this Christian act has lost us more support in the world at large than any other single thing. Certainly the motivation behind it should not be to gain the good will of anybody, but to recognize the terrible needs which at least we can do what we can to meet.

I feel very strongly about this and I wish there were something I could do about it. I am sure you will do what you can. If only the sentiment of the country could filter into the committee where this is holed up. I believe this humanitarian step must be taken in God's name, or we'll never be able to look ourselves in the face again.

Best regards,

JAMES W. KENNEDY.

The Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a powerful editorial which appeared in the Lathrop (Mo.) Optimist, April 12, 1951. It was evidently written by E. L. Fisher, the editor and owner of this excellent paper.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MACARTHUR IS FIRED

Truman has fired General MacArthur. He says, to save the lives of American boys; to prevent the war from spreading beyond Korea. So, American boys and a few from other nations are to continue to give their lives indefinitely fighting Red Chinese who can retire behind a boundary line and be free from any attack by land, air, or sea while they mass their forces to sufficient strength to attack again. They can repeat this maneuver unlimited times until they mass sufficient strength to overwhelm us.

MacArthur kept insisting that a second front consisting of anti-Communist Chinese be armed and given the go sign. No one denies that there are millions of Chinese who are anti-Red, who would love to fight the Communists if they had anything more than sticks and stones for weapons. General MacArthur believes, along with millions of other Americans, that the quickest way to end the war (or Truman's police action) is to use these millions of Chinese on a second front. America is the greatest industrial nation in the world; but we do not have the most manpower. We are pitifully short on manpower compared with China and Russia. But, we could use our vast industrial ability, arm millions of Chinese to fight the Red Chinese, thus combining Nationalist China's manpower and our productive capacity. This should be a winning team if given a chance. But this seems to have no chance under Truman. What if we did have to put a few troops along with the Chinese? An American life lost there is no more precious than one in Korea.

Truman and his advisers have been proven wrong so much in recent events that it is difficult to have any confidence in their judgment now.

Remember, Truman withdrew an American army of 40,000 men from South Korea a few months before the Communist-led North Koreans attacked South Korea. If they had been there well armed, the Reds would not have dared to attack. That blunder started the whole war that has cost all these American lives.

It all adds up to this: Truman has fired one of the most, if not the most, brilliant military men this Nation has ever produced and has failed to accomplish anything by it.

Limited Expansion of the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE
OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial regarding General MacArthur's address before the joint meeting of Congress, which appeared in the Bluefield (W. Va.) Sunset News of April 20, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

General MacArthur's address to the Congress yesterday was able and more than a little moving in many places. The dramatic manner in which the "old soldier" appeared before the joint session will do more to help sell his point of view than all the words of all the others who favor the policies he advocates.

Except for the maudlin ending of the speech, the general spoke with obvious conviction and sincerity. He condemned the Truman administration's policy in Korea and the Orient, but there was none of the politics evident in the general's speech which others have been carrying on in his name.

MacArthur, however, said little that he has not said before, except his assertion that the Joint Chiefs of Staff have favored broadening the war. That is sharply at variance with the statements of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, Gen. Omar Bradley, who on Tuesday rejected MacArthur's views and stated categorically that MacArthur's military policies "would jeopardize world peace."

The general did not at any point question the President's right to remove him from command, nor did he deny what most commentators have termed his insubordination. On the contrary, he restated the policies which he previously advocated and which led to his dismissal.

In essence, MacArthur called for a limited expansion of the war in Korea by economic and naval blockade of China, by air operations over China, and by the use of Chiang Kai-shek's nationalist troops on Formosa.

These are proposals which have been considered and turned down, by the civilian policy makers of the Government, and, presumably, by the Joint Chiefs. They were rejected on the basis that although these operations might be conceived on a limited scale, keeping them limited could prove impossible.

The issue seems to us to boil down to this: Can there in practice be any such thing as the limited expansion of the war which MacArthur favors? Can United States objectives in Asia be attained in any other manner? And, if not, are we prepared to fight Russia in Asia, in Europe, or on any other front she might choose such as the Middle East?

It is quite true that we fought World War II on two fronts against great odds and won. If we have to, we can do it again. But let us go into this thing realistically, rather than on a wave of emotional patriotism stirred by a popular military hero.

MacArthur stated that he did not believe the prospect of having to fight on two fronts should deter this Nation. He said that Russia, too, would be fighting on two fronts. But what he did not say is that Russia would be supplying her armies over shorter land routes while we supplied our's across the vast distances of oceans, which this time would be infested with Russian submarines. Nor did he mention the fact that the brunt of Russia's war in the Far East would be borne not by Russians but by China's almost limitless manpower.

MacArthur's chief point was that he does not believe that Russia would necessarily come into the fight. But that is only conjecture. She might and she might not. All we know is that she has an agreement to come to the aid of the Chinese Communists in the event of attack which she might want to keep because of the effect on her other satellites, and that, further, she is masterminding the Korean war.

We agree with MacArthur that it is vital to American security to keep a firm hold on Formosa, but as for his plan to use Chiang Kai-shek's ill-equipped troops, that is another question. The general called for United States logistical support for them, but many competent observers say it would take much more. Chiang lacks sea and air power for an invasion and the only nation we know of which could supply such power is the United States.

Perhaps if the isolationists who have climbed on the MacArthur bandwagon had been a little less bent on keeping the United States from building up its strength, we might be in a better position now to risk starting world war III.

This newspaper has consistently and strongly advocated armed strength as the only answer to the Russian menace. We advocate that now. We firmly believe that only in strength is there a chance for peace.

But we do not advocate starting a new global war now—at least not until we are strong enough to win it, or until such time as the American people demonstrate they want such a war and are willing to make the necessary sacrifices to insure its success. Wars must be made of sterner stuff than ovations for heroic generals.

One positive gain for the Nation could result from all the controversy which the MacArthur case has caused. If the country faced now with the necessity of reiterating its present Asian and world policy or formulating a new and even stronger one—is stirred to a faster rearmament peace General MacArthur will have rendered another invaluable service.

The controversy centers upon the fact that our armed strength is not yet great enough to meet the challenges which it faces.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WRONG MAN WAS FIRED

There must be rejoicing in the Kremlin today. For Harry Truman has fired the man who has stood as the bulwark against complete Communist domination in the Far East, Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

And he did it with all the finesse of a Kansas City gangster bumping off a victim, or a mad butcher wielding a meat ax. The manner he chose is, in military circles, considered as only less disgraceful than by court martial, and many officers in similar straits have demanded a trial so that they could be heard. General MacArthur, notwithstanding he had committed the unpardonable sin of making an accidental President jealous by his stature and by his standing with the American people, deserved better than this.

The dismissal of MacArthur makes it official—ours are suicide troops fighting in Korea. We are not after military victory. They must fight on—die on— until diplomats who have messed up everything they have handled in the past finally achieve a Munich in the Far East. Not only that—any commander who speaks out against such folly must face the headsman's ax.

Yes, it is as if the bat boy had booted Joe DiMaggio off the squad—as if the office boy had fired the chairman of the board. For the man who keeps a General Vaughn has dared deprive the Nation of the services of a Douglas MacArthur.

Why was MacArthur fired?

He was fired because he sickened at the sight of American boys dying in a fight they cannot win. He was fired because he believes we should accept the eagerly offered help of Gen. Chiang Kai-shek's armies. He was fired because he tried to secure permission to blockade our enemy's ports, and to bomb the transportation centers through which are moving the men and materials which are killing American boys. He was fired because he asked for more American troops to help fight against such odds. He was fired because when he could not get action from an administration which has made such a muddle of things in the Far East and entangled us in such a hopeless fight he disregarded regulations and discharged his greater duty of informing the American people of the truth as he sees it.

He who dared speak out against a policy Prime Minister Mentzies of Australia has dubbed "midsummer madness" gets the sack.

The administration may try to tell the people MacArthur was relieved because he wanted to embroil us in a big land war in Asia. This is poppycock. He wanted nothing more than to turn Chinese loose on Chinese to blockade China's ports, to bomb Manchuria. A few months ago the general publicly stated that anyone who advocates invading China with American troops should have his head examined.

Yes, Harry Truman fired General MacArthur. Yes, the Stars and stripes have dipped to the Union Jack. Yes, our free enterprise country has knuckled under to Britian's socialist failures. We who put up with a Montie when we were furnishing the bulk of the troops must give up a MacArthur because a government contributing only a token force in Korea does not like him. Yes, American interests have been sacrificed to those of the British Empire.

Let's look at MacArthur.

Fourteen years ago, back in 1937 when an administration in Washington was serenely sure no war was ahead, General Douglas MacArthur, retired after a brilliant career which carried him to the top as Chief of Staff, left for the Phillipines to try to build up the Philippine National Guard against the war MacArthur saw brewing in the Far East. He wasn't given time enough, money enough, help enough, yet when Pearl Harbor came along he and his slender forces waged an epic fight for months against overwhelming odds.

Later, island by island, without a single bloody mistake, without taking a single backward step, using the gleanings left over after the needs of the European campaign had been met, he led our forces to victory over Japan months or years before Washington thought possible.

Then, within few short years as head of the occupation in Japan, he built it into a democratic, friendly ally, far more true than many of those beside whom we fought in World War II. He kept the Commies out of Japan. There were no such occupation headaches as came out of Germany.

In Korea, bound and shackled by ridiculous restrictions and never with enough troops to do the job, he first licked the North Koreans and then the Red Chinese, and had them on the run at the very moment the man who should have been his stanchest backer publicly disgraced him at a 1 a. m. press conference, about which MacArthur first heard on the radio.

In all those 14 years MacArthur has served this country well. In every endeavor of his life he has been a success. No American leader today knows the problems of the Far East so well, or understands the Orient so thoroughly. Never have his talents been so needed by the people.

It is to be hoped that General MacArthur will now return home and speak freely, that he will rally the American people to force our policy into saner channels.

What has happened is tragic, for the wrong man has been fired. The American people would reverse the situation if but given the chance, judging by the temper of Aurorans today.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Wrong Man Was Fired," from the Aurora (Mo.) Advertiser of April 11, 1951.

"There Has Been No Problem Out of the Hundreds in Government to Which John W. Snyder Has Put His Hand but What He Brought Order Out of Chaos, Successes Out of Failures, and Profits Out of Losses"—Frank W. Boykin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, as you know, last week I flew home to my district with a heavy heart. I had anticipated for months that traveling with me on that visit would be my good friend and your good friend, Hon. John W. Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury. I left him, thank God, well on the road to complete recovery after a serious eye operation, but still in the hospital and unable to make the journey.

The occasion of Secretary Snyder's visit to Mobile was to be in attendance at the annual convention of the Independent Bankers Association of the United States; and, inasmuch as he had previously written an article on the savings-bond program exclusively for the Independent Bankers magazine, I ask the unanimous consent of my colleagues to extend my remarks and include in the RECORD both the talk which I made in Mobile and an article entitled "A Report on the Savings Bond Program."

In the absence of Secretary Snyder, I made the following talk:

Mr. Chairman, honored guests, members of the Independent Bankers Association of the United States, and friends, I had long looked forward to this day in Mobile.

I know of no greater honor that could have been paid our city or of a finer American who could have visited us than Hon. John W. Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury of these United States.

I note the score that your association placed upon having him here as your principal speaker, and I share with you the keen disappointment that he is not here that we might do him honor.

I am, moreover, concerned with the fact that I left him in Washington recovering from an eye operation, and I know that it is the sense of every man present that the Good Lord keep and preserve John Snyder for many, many years to come, and continue him in the wonderful work that he is doing for our country.

I know of no greater honor that could have been bestowed upon me than to have been chosen to present to you a good, true, and long-time friend—humble, sincere, and yet, at the one time, one of the greatest men in our country today—Hon. John W. Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury, and second not even to Andrew Mellon or Alexander Hamilton as the greatest Secretary of the Treasury that this country has ever had.

Mr. Chairman, I need neither point up nor elaborate upon the confusion which we see on every hand in this country today. I am, however, assured by those who have recently returned from Europe as well as from the Middle East and the Far East, that the confusion which we know is not peculiar to these United States, but is, rather, worldwide in its scope.

Upon second thought, it is not hard for any contemplative mind to understand the unrest which exists everywhere on earth when one thinks of the millions upon millions of people who are only now emerging—or shall I say being projected—from centuries of autocratic rule into some form or another of self government entirely new to them.

Mr. Chairman, it is scarcely a fortnight since I sat in my office, one evening, discussing with a learned savant the tremendous changes that have been wrought in world governments in the last half century.

It seems like only yesterday that practically all the European and Asiatic governments were dominated by kings, shahs, sultans, kaisers, emperors, and czars. All were more or less absolute monarchs, whose decrees had the force of laws. In the short space of the last three or four decades, however, all of this has changed. Now there are but few royal monarchs sitting on thrones in today's world—and where that type of government still exists, it is more or less symbolic inasmuch as the crowned heads of such countries are more or less social entities and have little or no say with respect to executive, legislative, and judicial procedures. This, in a large measure, has led to the abdication of democratic processes and the success of dictatorship in lieu thereof.

Even here on our shore there have been marked extensions of human rights and liberties, although from abroad as well as at home have come problems that today are trying the very souls of men.

At the turn of the century a substantial portion of the business of this Nation was conducted in the coin of the realm. The pay envelopes of the workers, in both public and private employment, were stuffed with hard money or, at best, with but a little folding money. Such folding money as was in circulation was backed by huge deposits of gold and silver in the vaults of the United States. That, too, has now changed.

Currency or money today, either in the shape of coins or bills, is used merely as tokens and circulated for convenience' sake only.

Today the Nation's business is done under a system of credit rather than on a monetary basis. John Jones has so many dollars' credit to his account in the bank. Bill Smith, a carpenter, does a job for John Jones—and Jones transfers some of his credit to Smith. Now Smith has credit in the bank and he, in turn, issues checks to the rent man, one to the electric light or gas company, one to his grocer, etc. All, in turn, make deposit of these checks which, again, increases their credits, so that, in the largewise, it might be said that society, as constituted here in America, is today transacting business on the basis of a credit system rather than on a basis of money itself.

I know that all of what I am saying seems elementary to this skilled and experienced banking group; but, concomitant with the turn of the century and, more specifically, upon declaration of World War I, the Federal Government itself began the extensive use of credits and the issuance of long-term bonds to finance its war and other operations—all of which resulted in a huge indebtedness and a great public debt.

Mr. Chairman, it is almost superfluous for me to say that never in history has our Government had to face the problem of managing the public debts that it faces today.

Fortunately, we have as Secretary of the Treasury in the personality of your good friend and my good friend, John W. Snyder, a man distinguished by the genius of his leadership as well as one who inspires the solid confidence of all of his fellow men.

No nation in history has had to struggle more to manage a debt so huge that it taxes both the ability and the willingness of our people to meet it.

Enormous as was our indebtedness when we emerged from World War I, it still was insignificant as compared with the one that exists today.

By way of contrast the problems which faced our country then pale into insignificance.

It is no disparagement to point out that subsequent to World War II and in May 1920, it was practically impossible for the municipalities and States of these United States to sell a single issue of bonds, even though they carried as much as 5 percent interest per annum.

The lack of confidence in the ability of the Treasurer of the United States to manage the debt of that day was so shattered—that a single break in Government bond prices carried United States Liberty Bond issues to discounts of almost 20 percent below par.

Billions of dollars were lost to the holders of all types of bonds—Federal, State, county, municipal, and other bonds—with the financial panic that then swept the country.

True understanding and the real test of successful debt management is best expressed in the situation which exists today with respect to the value of all outstanding issues.

With more than two hundred and sixty billions outstanding, no one person has lost as much as a single penny. This has been due to the effectiveness of stabilization—the Federal-bond program and the successful management of the debt. These are wholly and directly attributable to the understanding, will, skill, and ability of John Wesley Snyder, our great Secretary of the Treasury.

It is indeed no happenstance that John Snyder was able to meet the tremendous task assigned him by the President of the United States when he called him to serve as the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

My friends, I do not have to tell you that John Snyder is no Wall Street tycoon. That he is no feudal baron called into office to serve vested banking interests, international or otherwise—that he is now and has always been a true public servant.

Scarcely 23 years of age, he entered the banking field as a bookkeeper for the First National Bank of a little city in Arkansas. In one aspect or another he has been in the banking business all of his life.

John Snyder has first-hand knowledge of the banking problems of the small-business man, the cotton, the peanut, the tobacco and the wheat farmer. He knows the fiscal problems of the cattle and the hog raisers and to my own mind, no man in the history of our country, with the possible exception of Alexander Hamilton or Andrew Mellon, has had such a comprehensive experience and deep understanding of banking and currency as that possessed by Secretary Snyder.

His steady advancement in his chosen profession had so marked him among those of his profession in the Middle West that it is small wonder he was called into service by the Comptroller of the Currency of the United States in 1931.

There, serving as the principal assistant to the receiver of banks, he conducted all administrative duties incident to the liquidation of a vast number of insolvent national banks subsequent to the world-wide depression of 1930.

During the next 5 years, which followed his induction, he proved himself to be probably the greatest administrator and authority on bank liquidation that this world has ever seen.

Mr. Chairman, it was not until 1940 that Mr. Snyder was brought to Washington as special assistant to the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Board. To this duty later was added those of the assistant to the full Board of Directors of that mammoth fiscal organization.

"It was here that his superb talents were directed to developing a program to provide for the building, the equipment, and expansion of war defense plants, and from the inception of the War Plants Corporation, Mr. Snyder was installed as operational vice president and director.

"Within 1 year from the day upon which that huge Corporation was founded, more than $1,000,000,000 had been committed to the construction and equipment of stupendous industrial plants in order to more successfully, economically, and expeditiously prosecute the war effort.

"By the end of 1944, commitments in excess of $10,000,000,000, covering aircraft, steel, machine tool, aluminum, magnesium, chemical, and ordnance facilities were financed. With prudence, sagacity, economic and financial soundness, and in wisdom—moneys had been advanced for plants to manufacture synthetic rubber, aviation gasoline (facilities and pipelines), and the United States Defense Plant Corporation owned not alone nearly 1,000 new huge, gigantic manufacturing concerns but had also financed the expansion of hundreds of privately owned industries in 46 States of the Union.

"Outside of the continental limits of the United States, likewise, commitments had been made for the production of critical and strategic war materials in other countries which ran into the millions of dollars.

"Over this vast banking operation John W. Snyder, war buddy, bosom friend, confidant, and beloved coworker of President Harry Truman—exercising full away—presided as active administrative officer.

When in July 1945 the President appointed Mr. Snyder Director of the War Mobilization and Reconversion, he immediately initiated an active program to deal with major problems of production and employment and to implement all economic adjustments necessary to a transition from war to peace.

"In preparation for VJ-day, he organized and held successive conference with the heads of all pertinent Government agencies to map out procedure. This to the end that when Japan sued for peace the machinery for a transition to a normal economy was all ready to be set in motion—the construction industry was freed from restrictive wartime controls, other limitations were eased or removed—labor difficulties were adjudicated, and labor strikes in such essential industries as steel and coal mining were quickly settled with both minimum of delay and dislocation in the reconversion program.

Mr. Chairman, I know John W. Snyder. I have been knowing him well—and for a long, long time.

I know that there has been no problem out of the hundreds in Government to which he has put his hand but what he brought—order out of chaos—success out of failure—and profit out of losses.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that there is a single man sitting on either side of the aisle or in both Houses of Congress that did not feel a glow of pride when, on June 25, 1946, John W. Snyder, with all of his great, proven talents and greater abilities, was called to serve by the President as the Secretary of the Treasury of these United States.

Mr. Chairman, the responsibility of that office has grown steadily and tremendously—year by year—since the time it was administered by Alexander Hamilton. The Secretary of the Treasury is today charged by law with the management of the Nation's finances. He superintends the collection of all the internal revenues of the National Government. He directs the form and keeping of public accounts, prepares recommendations for taxation programs and for the support of the public credit.

The Secretary of the Treasury determines methods and policies relating to the procurement of Federal supplies. Under his jurisdiction comes the Coast Guard, the Secret Service, the Bureau of Narcotics, Customs and Internal Revenue. Through the Bureau of the Mint and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, he supervises the coinage and printing of all the money in the land.

Last, but not least, of all the stupendous tasks with which this eminently great public official is charged are all activities of the Bureau of Accounts and of Public Debt. An indefatigable worker, it is the latter single activity that keeps John W. Snyder at his desk until the late hours of the night in the conduct of transactions with respect to Government bonds and Government securities.

Mr. Chairman, my secretary only last Thursday advised me that the cloak rooms of the House were ringing with the praises of my good friend, the Secretary of the Treasury, upon pronouncement that he now hopes that he can avoid an increase in Federal income and other taxes in the year of 1952.

This was because in his recent appearance before the Ways and Means Committee, Secretary Snyder anticipated that he might, even this year, be able to decrease the Federal debt from income-tax receipts, and declared that he would ask for a second round of taxes—only if and when the budget picture changed so much that such a second round would be absolutely necessary to keep the Government out of the red.

Mr. Speaker, the article which Secretary Snyder wrote for the independent bankers magazine is as follows:

A REPORT ON THE SAVINGS BOND PROGRAM

(By John W. Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury)

On May 1, 1951, the popular series E United States Savings bonds will begin to mature. During 1951 the E bond maturities will amount to $1,100,000,000.

Early this year legislation was introduced in the Congress to authorize the Treasury to provide a method whereby owners of matured series E Savings bonds who do not desire to cash them, may retain their Savings bond investment with no inconvenience to the holder. Some of the holders of maturing series E bonds may, of course, desire to cash them on maturity. These bondholders will find cash waiting for them at any of the 16,000 or more financial institutions which are authorized to redeem Savings bonds upon presentation by their owners. The Treasury believes, however, that a great many bondholders will wish to continue their investment in E bonds. Accordingly, a three-option plan was worked out for handling the maturing bonds.

The arrangements decided upon are that the owners of maturing E bonds may:

1. Accept cash, according to the original terms of the contract; or

2. Continue (subject to approval of Congress) to hold matured E bonds, and earn interest on full maturity value; or

3. Exchange the matured E bonds for current income Savings bonds of series G, in amounts of $500 and multiples thereof.

It bears repeating that under option 1, the owner of any maturing series E bond may receive full cash payment for his bond, if he desires. The Treasury wants this to be made absolutely clear to all E bond investors. Nor would a bondholder's choice of option 2 preclude the subsequent cashing of his bond. Matured E bonds which are retained under the extension plan would remain redeemable at any time.

Once the plan is placed in effect, its options will apply to all outstanding E bonds as they mature, and will apply, by right of contract, to all new series E savings bonds that are issued.

Option 2—that is, the option which permits extension with the payment of interest—would allow investors in E bonds to continue their investment without putting them to any trouble or inconvenience. A holder of a maturing E Bond who wishes to maintain his investment does not need to turn in his bond to effectuate the extension.

The tax feature of the plan—also subject to the approval of the Congress—would, in effect, disregard the original maturity date for series E savings bonds for purposes of tax treatment of interest, if a taxpayer elects to hold his investment in savings bonds in the manner provided by the extension plan. Under existing law, a cash-basis taxpayer may elect either (1) to pay income tax on interest in the year of redemption of the bonds or in the year of maturity, whichever first occurs, or (2) to pay the tax yearly as the interest accrues. Under the optional extension plan, interest on matured E bonds which are retained would not be taxable in the year of original maturity, but the entire amount of interest on the investment would be taxable at redemption or final maturity, unless the taxpayer elects to accrue interest on such bonds annually.

This tax provision would be applicable only to cash-basis taxpayers. It would not be applicable to corporations, or to taxpayers on the accrual method of accounting. No postponement of tax liability would be authorized when the bond owner exercises an option to exchange matured bonds for series G bonds.

As presented to the Congress, the extension option calls for the earning of interest on retained matured E bonds at the rate of 2½ percent simple interest for the first 7½ years, and interest thereafter at a rate sufficient to make the aggregate return for the 10-year extension period 2.9 percent, compounded semiannually. As an example of the operation of this option, it may be assumed that in May 1941, $75 was invested in a series E bond of $100 maturity value. The bond matures in May 1951. If the holder retained the bond for 10 more years under the option extension plan, he would receive $133.33 in May 1961.

The last of the series D savings bonds also are maturing this year. The extension plan would be limited to series E bonds and would not apply to series D bonds. The first series D maturities were in 1949. Obviously, serious administrative complications would arise from any attempt to make the extension plan retroactive. At the same time, it would be highly inequitable for the Government to apply the proposal to some series D bonds and not to others. Furthermore, it should be noted that the terms of issue of the vast majority of series D bonds were more favorable than the E bond terms, since all Government bonds issued prior to March 1, 1941, were wholly exempt from Federal income tax up to $5,000 principal amount.

The decisions with respect to the optional extension plan were made after long deliberation and extensive consultation, covering a period of nearly a year. The Treasury met with individuals and business, labor, industrial, and financial groups, who gave us the benefit of their thought and judgment as to a plan which would be in the best interest of both the bondholders and the Government. The program which was worked out was the result of this cooperative effort.

I want to take this opportunity to thank the readers of the Independent Banker, and others of the banking world, for the cooperation they have given the Treasury in the savings-bond program. A great majority of savings-bond owners look to their banks for information and advice about their savings-bond investments. The banks of the country have done a magnificent job in facilitating the smooth functioning of the whole savings-bond program. They can be equally helpful to the Treasury and to the public in carrying out the E bond maturities program.

MacArthur and Vandenberg

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

SENATOR WILLIAM BENTON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the New York Times editorial of last Saturday headed "Heard Round the World," and also Mrs. Anne O'Hare McCormick's column, "Arrival and Departure at a Historic Crossroads," which appeared on the same page. I remind the Senate that last Saturday was the day of the late Senator Vandenberg's funeral. I read the Times editorial page on the plane on the way to Grand Rapids as a member of the official United States Senate delegation to the funeral. Against the background of his great leadership, this editorial and this important column by

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Mrs. McCormick seem to be extraordinarily apt.

Mr. President, I submit that the Congress must join with the Administration in giving much more attention to the imponderables of foreign policy which, when disregarded, as the Times points out, have often led even the strongest military nations to disaster. We must now build firmly on that structure of policy Senator Vandenberg helped to build. I well remember, Mr. President, his guidance to me during my days as Assistant Secretary of State, when again and again I would slip into his office for advice. He never failed to live up in private to the great reputation for candor and courage which he had achieved publicly throughout the world.

There being no objection, the editorial and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of April 21, 1951]

HEARD ROUND THE WORLD

General MacArthur's speech before Congress has reverberated around the world, as was to be expected. Also, as was again to be expected, the world's attention is focused at the moment far more on the differences between MacArthur and the Administration, and especially on the possible consequences of the new controversy now dividing the strongest power of the free world, than on the more substantial areas of agreement. Yet, as in the case of the equally important debate on the issue of sending troops to Europe, the agreement on fundamentals is bound to prevail over the differences. There may be some adjustments on subordinate points, but in the end the sound sense of the American people will reassert itself, and this Nation will do whatever is necessary and possible to resist aggression, while striving to preserve the larger framework of world peace.

The areas of agreement have been obscured because the more dramatic passages of General MacArthur's speech dealt with the points of difference. But these areas of agreement are wide enough to assure continued action along lines that have been laid down. This means, first of all, continuation of the global struggle against Communist imperialism on both the Asiatic and the European fronts, and, for that matter, at all points of Communist aggression. It means rejection of any kind of appeasement, and a rapid build-up of our own and our Allies' military strength.

Beyond that, General MacArthur sees eye to eye with the Administration on other points. There are no differences between the two on the important question of Japan or on the proposed Japanese peace treaty. Both agree that the colonial era is being replaced in Asia by a resurgence of Asiatic nationalism which requires complete reorientation of Western policy, and one portion of MacArthur's speech can be quoted verbatim in support of President Truman's Point Four program. Even some of General MacArthur's specific recommendations are not so far out of line with Administration policy that they may not be adopted if circumstances warrant or conditions change. An economic blockade against China is already being considered by the Sanctions Committee of the United Nations. Formosa has not only never been promised to Communist China but the United States is already shipping military supplies to Chiang Kai-shek. Even bombing of Manchuria cannot be excluded if the enemy should resort to massive air attacks.

There are, however, two points on which the differences are substantial, and from these differences the whole controversy derives. One point is that General MacArthur apparently sees not only the Korean war but the whole struggle against Communist imperialism as an almost exclusively American affair, with little regard to the part which the United Nations, the North Atlantic alliance and all the other free nations of the world must play in it. That assumption, which ironically enough runs parallel with the Communist propaganda line, prompts him virtually to ignore the United Nations, whose first military commander he was, as well as the individual free nations and any views they may hold .

The second point of difference is that General MacArthur puts military necessity and quick victory above all other considerations and seems willing to run great risks in their name. That is a military point of view, appropriate for a commander bent upon achieving the objective set for him by the quickest route. But it cannot dominate the decisions of statesmen who must also take into account the political and moral imponderables on which, in the long run, final victory depends.

Disregard of such imponderables has often led to disaster for even the strongest military nations, and this consideration applies with special force to the Korean conflict, which is still dividing the United Nations and the extension of which could lead to consequences that might precipitate another new war requiring new strategic and political decisions, as did the Chinese intervention. It is for this reason that, sometimes in the face of even military advisability, the American Government is moving slowly in order to preserve as much unity as is possible within the United Nations and to avert an American isolation which is the first aim of Soviet policy and which is designed to make us fight a future war alone.

ABROAD

(By Anne O'Hare McCormick)

ARRIVAL AND DEPARTURE AT A HISTORIC CROSSROADS

Among the saddest aspects of the stirring drama of the past few days is that the homecoming of General MacArthur overshadowed the passing of Senator Arthur Vandenberg. By custom the Senate adjourns when a Member dies, but on Thursday it had to meet with the House of Representatives to listen and pay honor to the eye-filling and ear-filling hero of the Pacific. Following the joint meeting, his colleagues paid brief tribute to a hero in another field, but their words were all but lost in the reverberating echoes of the oration they had just heard. Hence, even in his death the great Senator from Michigan, leader and victor in one of the most crucial political battles ever fought in the United States, was deprived by a strange coincidence of the full homage he deserved from his country and the world. In the tumult and the shouting acclaiming the warrior's return the departure of the statesman seemed a muted and lonely ending. It was the statesman who faded away and the old soldier who strode into the limelight and assumed a new role.

In a way, however, the simultaneous coming and going of MacArthur and Vandenberg fitted into the historic drama in which both played decisive parts. MacArthur's is not played out; he has captured the center of the stage by sheer power of personality and histrionic art. Instead of diminishing the legend, the real figure enhances it.

NO APPEAL FOR UNITY

The first speaker before the assembly who could be both seen and heard by a national audience, the General did not use that grandstand to make the irresistible appeal for unity that some of us hoped for. He did not carry on where Senator Vandenberg left off. Although he declared that the issues were "beyond the realm of partisan consideration," and although his speech cut across the ideas of hemispheric defense isolationists on the Republican side as well as the political realities on which the Administration bases its course, it is bound to deepen and sharpen division not only on military versus political strategy, but on strictly party lines.

Senator Vandenberg's aim was to unite the country behind a nonpartisan foreign policy. He was so manifestly the prime mover in gaining support for the measures like the Truman doctrine, the European Recovery Program, the Atlantic Pact, and the Pan-American treaty that some of the President's advisers, including General Marshall, suggested at one time that he be named Secretary of State in recognition of his invaluable services as chief architect of an all-American foreign policy.

No doubt General MacArthur also passionately desires an all-American policy, but on his own terms, which he believes basic to our security. Senator Vandenberg was so convinced that unity was the paramount consideration that he was willing to compromise on methods and details in order to achieve it. More important, he was able to convince the majority in his party that a united front at home with the prime essential of American influence abroad. The confusion and schisms in the Republic ranks since he became inactive give the measure of his leadership—and the void his passing leaves in the council of the Senate. His loss at this juncture is as tragic as the break with the Supreme Commander in the Pacific.

VANDENBERG'S LAST PLEA

Yet the structure of policy Vandenberg helped to build remains; it will not fall. He is said to have left a letter which will undoubtedly be a last plea for a closing of the ranks in the face of growing danger. Nor is it by any means certain that the great, if unfinished, work he accomplished will not be furthered rather than halted by MacArthur. Just by stressing the global nature of the war and the necessity of creating strength enough to fight it on both fronts, the general must shock many of his followers—those who clamor for priority for the Asian front, or those who favor a war so much more limited than the Administration that they don't want us to fight anywhere but at home.

The President must be a little shocked, too, to hear the deposed commander come out strongly for Mr. Truman's pet project. One of the most impressive passages in an impressive speech was the insistence of the revolutionary character of the changes in the Orient. In an adroit thrust at his critics in Europe, MacArthur emphasized that "the peoples of Asia found their opportunity in the war just past to throw off the shackles of colonialism and now see the dawn of new opportunity, and heretofore unfelt dignity, and the self-respect of political freedom." The things they strive for he said—food, clothing, shelter, "the realization of the nationalist urge for political freedom * * * form a backdrop to contemporary planning which must be thoughtfully considered if we are to avoid the pitfalls of unrealism."

What is this but support for Point Four? General MacArthur drew cheers for his advocacy of economic help for Asia, more cheers than the President's program had yet evoked from Congress. But the new crusader for Point Four must be a bit embarrassing for its sponsor just the same. Many commentators have pointed out that MacArthur's entry into the great debate actually narrows and simplifies the issues. At least it reveals that they are not fixed or static. The coming and going of two great figures, at the same time reminds us that both are characters in a moving drama in which events are constantly catching up with and modifying the opinions of men and the policies of governments.

General MacArthur's Address at the Joint Meeting of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a thoughtful column by Lowell Mellett which appeared in the Washington Evening Star on April 21, last. The article is entitled "Question Must Be Answered."

Lowell Mellett is one of the most thoughtful columnists in Washington. He brings to journalism a rich, indeed, a unique, background as one of the great public servants of our time.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

QUESTION MUST BE ANSWERED—SPECIFIC INFORMATION FROM GENERAL MACARTHUR BECOMES MORE IMPORTANT THAN SPEECHES AND RECEPTIONS

(By Lowell Mellett)

This one is not a very easy one to write. That's because it has to be written with the cheers for MacArthur still ringing in the air. It's no fun to be a wet blanket at a party. With this weary old town enjoying such an emotional upheaval as it hasn't had in many years, who wants to be the one to say, "Hey, stop, look, and listen or stop and think about what you've looked at and listened to"? Why not leave it alone?

Here's why. Like everybody else with a television set I watched General MacArthur make his speech to Congress and heard everything he said. Like most everybody else I was carried away at times by the man's eloquence. Nothing like it, in my experience, since the early days of William Jennings Bryan. It had everything. Home and mother, our brave boys, hatred of war, love of peace, old soldiers never die, and God bless America.

Far as I know the general believed every word he spoke and I'm sure he made an awful lot of other people believe. But what was the occasion for his speech and what was the basic issue he discussed? It was whether the President had dealt justly with him in relieving him of his command in the Pacific on the ground of insubordination; that, and whether he or the President had the truer concept of what our national policy should be.

As he outlined his own concept, one completely contrary to that of the President, he scarcely endeavored to defend himself against the charge of insubordination. He offered instead a countercharge. This was, in effect, that certain civilians had been permitted to overrule the Nation's best military brains in a military matter. He said—or, rather, he seemed to say—that he had voiced the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff when he urged the bombing of Red Chinese supply bases in Manchuria and support for the return of Chiang Kai-shek's troops to the mainland. It wasn't surprising therefore that Republican Senators and Representatives leaped to their feet to give him the biggest cheer of the day. But it made you wonder. Had Generals Bradley, Collins, and Vandenberg and Admiral Sherman been telling MacArthur one thing, while allowing the President to tell the people something else.

So, as soon as it was available in cold print, you read the text of the speech to see exactly what General MacArthur had said. He had said that for entertaining these views he had been severely criticized, despite my understanding that from a military viewpoint the above views have been fully shared by practically every military leader concerned with the Korean campaign, including our own Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Which, it is fairly clear, does not mean what at first it seemed to mean. All it means is that the Joint Chiefs of Staff would readily agree that, all things being equal or if there were no other considerations involved, it would be good military tactics to do the things he suggested. It doesn't mean that the Joint Chiefs of Staff agree that there are no other considerations involved, considerations which the President and the Nation must take into account.

Nevertheless, General MacArthur in his carefully, not to say deceptively, phrased statement, has raised a question that should not be allowed to remain a question. The testimony of General Bradley and his colleagues is now demanded and with it any specific information that General MacArthur may have. This has become vastly more important than the speeches and receptions now being scheduled in Chicago, Milwaukee, and other cities.

Suppression of La Prensa

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR
OF MARYLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, realization of the vast implications of the suppression by the Argentine Government of its world-known daily, La Prensa, fortunately is widespread among the people of our country. The hemisphere-wide support accorded the day of mourning recently staged at the suggestion of the National Press Club is evidence of this.

The April issue of the American Federationist, official organ of the American Federation of Labor, contains an editorial entitled "La Prensa," authorized by President William Green, a great American, which presents in scholarly and convincing fashion the dangers inherent in repression of objective and fearless presentation of national and world events.

Indignation at such dictatorial action is completely in line with the progressive attitude of America's great labor organization, and the capable presentation of the matter in the editorial makes a valuable contribution to the discussions on this vital matter.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial from the American Federationist be reprinted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LA PRENSA

No act of Dictator Peron has met with more unreserved condemnation than his attack on La Prensa, the world-famous independent newspaper of Argentina. This paper had standing throughout cosmopolitan circles and was widely read by Spanish-speaking groups. La Prensa, which followed the standards and practices of the free press, continued to publish and comment editorially on developments and trends even after Juan Peron seized control of the government and began nullifying his country's constitution. While the paper was not popular with the dictatorship, it was not until Peron was harassed by economic difficulties that he took steps to silence this faithful recorder of developments and their implications.

He selected as his tool the captive news vendors' union, an affiliate of the government-controlled national labor federation. The sellers of newspapers and magazines submitted a series of excessive demands, concluding with a demand for 20 percent of the paper's gross income from classified advertisements. These demands were served only on La Prensa, although Peron's controlled union also services other newspapers. A picket line, aided by the police, prevented delivery and shipment of copies of La Prensa coming off the press. Publication had to be suspended.

The employees of the newspaper tried to confer with Minister of Labor to make plain that they had no grievance against management. They were dispersed by Peron's police.

The shameful action against La Prensa followed Peron's successful breaking of a nation-wide strike of railway workers. The dictator moved quickly to arrest the strike leaders, charging them with association with members of parties hostile to Peron and therefore suspected of fomenting the strike for political purposes. The government then promulgated an executive order to mobilize all railways for civilian service of national defense under the army. These workers ceased to be free.

These happenings demonstrate the inevitable development of dictatorships. They start by abandoning government by law. Then they undermine the integrity of the courts and educational institutions. They replace free enterprise by government control and undertakings. They replace free unions by government-controlled puppet organizations and lay violent hands on capital and other private property. To get away with these high-handed deeds the dictator must control the press and other information media.

The right to voluntary association is essential to freedom in living and participating in a free national life. Voluntary organizations are possible only when law and property are respected. Too often the first steps toward the curbing of freedom are taken in a national emergency and with the best intentions. Once started down the road to dictatorship, steps are hard to retrace.

That is the reason the American Federation of Labor attacks at once plans and proposals leading to compulsory work. Eternal vigilance is the price of freedom, which must be maintained by each successive generation.

The Organization of American States has been meeting in Washington to consider western hemisphere security against Communist aggression. A vital key to national security is a free press. We who love liberty cannot watch the murder of a great newspaper without vigorous protest. While Dictator Peron was taking the final step to strangle La Presna, he warned the remaining great independent paper that its editorial freedom will also be ended. A press emasculated and controlled by an irresponsible dictator in what used to be the most progressive country in Latin America is an attack upon the security of all, under present conditions.

MacArthurism: What It Is

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a remarkable editorial entitled "MacArthurism: What It Is," which appeared in the Washington Post last Friday.

Here we have an objective and, indeed, a scholarly analysis by one of America's great newspapers, a newspaper most intimately in touch with national policy, of the emotionally moving and elcquent address last Thursday by that great soldier, General Douglas MacArthur.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MACARTHURISM: WHAT IT IS

There was a classic and gladiator quality in General MacArthur's valedictory to America. It was a noble Roman who took his leave before an intent and watching people. The farewell, even if it had been limited to a ceremonial address, would have been charged with drama. But it was much more than that. General MacArthur, against the background of one of the great dismissals of history, made a spectacular attack upon his Government's strategy. No case could have been stated with more power and with more passion. It was an electric performance which had an entire Nation, if not an entire world, spellbound.

Now the real debate is on—the debate upon the edges of which this country has been hovering for a twelve-month past. Some of the facts are still missing. Outstanding among them is the past as well as present position of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. General MacArthur charged them with a belief at one time in the MacArthur strategy. To what extent is he right? The President must not let Secretary Marshall delay a single instant in putting the record straight. For a long time there has been more than a suspicion in the public mind that the Administration has got out of the habit of coming clean with the American people. It has seemed to forget that its authority springs from the confidence as well as the strength of its constituents. When the facts are in, when the arguments are heard, we have faith that the proper course will be made clear, and that a new unity will be created for following it.

What we plead for in the process is the eschewal of emotion. Wisdom is the product neither of hysteria nor of heat. If, as General MacArthur says (and, in the main, rightly), the Soviet's moves are the response of cold calculation, a free society cannot afford to govern itself differently. It must be sober in decision. To go off half-cocked is to court ruin and disaster. Action must be rigidly realistic when that action may influence the American destiny for a thousand years.

That is why MacArthur's text must be scrutinized with the head and not with either knees or heart. The first point of notice is that not only did he not mention any of the fighting Allies in Korea, he did not once refer to the United Nations. He did not refer to the United Nations because he knew full well that the line of policy he advocated will not commend itself to any of our covenanted allies. On the contrary, his counsel will repel them. This would not, of course, faze the general. The man who used to emit such glowing words about the organization of nations for peace is quite prepared to go it alone. He is a crusader if not a fanatic. But the rest of us must think of consequences. What are they? If Western Europe would not agree with us, then they would go neutral, and 270,000,000 people and 70,000,000 tons of steel would be lost to our armory.

Not only that. It was difficult to figure out whether the general wanted to take up arms against communism or whether he distinguished between Red China or Red Russia. If he had in mind a jihad, or holy war, against a social and political concept, then he should reread his Lincoln. It was not against slavery that Lincoln, idealistic though he was, took up arms, but against a break in the Union. A union is aborning today among all men who cherish liberty. Would Lincoln, as a practical matter, junk this nucleaur community in order to go off at a tangent and try to bayonet an idea? We do not think so.

Aside from the loss of Western Europe moreover, this country would lose the backbone of Asia by following MacArthur. The general is right when he casts out the foolish notion of some of his own supporters that the people of even Communist-run Asia are ideologically Communist. Asians still ask each other by way of greeting, "Have you eaten?" The belly and not the mind is the chief worrier in Asia. Yet, withal, they want to run their own affairs, and, as General MacArthur testified, they are seized with a new and intoxicating nationalism. That means they don't want to be "saved" by America, or by anybody else. To them, overwhelmingly, that would be exchanging one imperialism for another.

For proof of this let those who are bemused by MacArthurism go back to our history. One example will suffice. Toward the end of the First World War the United States decided to intervene in Siberia. The force was under the command of General William S. Graves. It was an idealistic assignment—to get the Czechs, who had been interned in Russia, out of the Siberian ports. But the orders to General Graves gradually changed, and the United States became party to British interventionism "to save Russia from bolshevism." This policy General Graves thought wrong and unwise, but, being a good soldier, he obeyed orders, and never thought of writing to the Joe Martin of his time. However, on his retirement he made known his dissent in a book America's Siberian Intervention. He described how he was the agent for delivering arms and food to one of the Russian Chiang Kai-sheks, Admiral Koltchak. General Graves writes:

"No government can add to its strength from its people while being held in power by foreign bayonets. Koltchak realised this, as I heard him tell Mr. Morris [United States Ambassador to Japan] that he did not want foreigners to fight for him, as the Russian character was such that the Russians would desert him if he received active military support from foreigners. This is not a characteristic of Russians alone, it is the characteristic of all nationals. The United States gained by this act [deliverying food and munitions to Koltchak] the resentment of more than ninety percent of people in Siberia. Our intervention resulted in placing the mass of Russians even more solidly behind the Soviets. This is shown by the promptness with which the Siberian people accepted the Moscow government after the departure of the Allies."

What applies to Russians applies to all nationals.

Ah, says General MacArthur, but the Chinese are different. How much General MacArthur knows about China and the Chinese is shown by the way he let down the President at Wake Island by assuring him that the Chinese would not intervene in North Korea, and particularly by his account of Chinese history. The Chinese, were "non-homogeneous," he says, meaning without political unity, till the turn of the century, when they became consolidated first by Chang Tso-lin, then by Chiang Kai-shek, and then by Communists. Instead of Chang Tso-lin, who was the independent chieftain of Manchuria in the twenties, General MacArthur meant Sun Yat-sen, father of the nationalist revolution which turned China into a republic in 1911.

But let that pass. General MacArthur, thinking of the Chinese in these pathologically nationalistic times as different from the Russians that General Graves encountered, says that all we have to do is blockade the Chinese coast, help Chiang Kai-shek land on the coastline, and give him "logistical support." Blockade, no matter how you slice it, means war. So, as we found in the 'twenties, does economic sanctions. Collective reprisals against China are now under consideration at Lake Success. But the issue is highly delicate. An all-in blockade from Vladivostok to Singapore—a tidy distance, if you look at the map—would mean a denial of raw materials to Western Europe and would put Japan solely on American charity. And what does "logistical support" mean? It means that not only would we have to ferry a discarded politician, Chiang Kai-shek, across, we would have to make sure he would win. How could it be otherwise? All our stakes would be on Chiang Kai-shek. Chiang knows that. Having run away from the Communists every time he came anywhere near them, he would never dream of trying to reconquer China without the United States in front of him, back of him, and all around him. General MacArthur can't make a warrior out of Chiang Kai-shek by thinking so.

No, the course that General MacArthur recommends is a course of all-out intervention, step by inexorable step. It is war. It is war against the wrong foe on the wrong battlefield, fought without allies, with our real enemy husbanding its men and resources while we are wallowing in the Chinese bog. The Japanese could tell General MacArthur something about the size and the depth of the morass into which he would commit America. And Chiang Kai-shek would be the tiger on the American back.

There is a remaining item in the American strategy that General MacArthur advised. It is to end the Korean "sanctuary" in Manchuria by bombing it. General MacArthur omits altogether to mention that we, no less than the Chinese and North Koreans, have a sanctuary. It is located in air-free South Korea and Japan. Whether this sanctuary would remain intact after we start to bomb Manchuria—none can tell. General MacArthur thinks so. The Soviet, he says, "will not necessarily mesh its action with our moves." Perhaps not, though after Wake Island, there will be some hesitation in accepting General MacArthur's judgment on that vital score. He is no better judge of the Russians than of the Chinese. Authorities like George F. Kennan tell us that the Russians are sensitive as no other people are about their frontiers. But, as we say, MacArthur may be right. Our own reaction to his view of Russian policy is that it is a good one for us to follow. Let us not mesh our actions with their moves. Let us not fight the foe that Russia picks for us and commit our force on the battlefield she selects. Let us keep the initiative, and be sovereign over our own strategy.

Our country is at the height of its power and glory. No great power in history has been tolerated which fails to act in concert with the general interests of mankind as mankind conceives these interests. That was the guiding rule of Pax Britannica. It must be the guiding rule of the American power, or it will perish. Our actions, in other words, are in the realm of politics as well as in the realm of military power. It was a simple recipe that MacArthur spelled out, too simple, and so simple we would have to do it alone. That the general is a false prophet is apparent in every line of what he said, even in his essay on the strategy of the Pacific. This newspaper pleaded that Formosa be taken over back in 1946; nevertheless it feels that it is nonsense to assert that the whole Pacific and the Americas would be lost by the breach of the Pacific moat through defection of Formosa. After all the aggressive Japanese once had it, and that did not finish America. General MacArthur started his address as a statesman and ended it as a drill sergeant.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Licensing of Radio Broadcast Stations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by the Allied States Association of Motion Picture Exhibitors.

Motion Picture Theater Owners of Maryland, Inc., a member of the Allied States Association, through Mr. Lauritz Garman, president, advises that its board of directors feels that the industry has suffered greatly from recent developments in the entertainment field, and that they will be further adversely affected as a result of the action by the Federal Communications Commission, which is discussed in the association's statement.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION WIELDS BLACKJACK

The Federal Communications Commission has just issued a declaration of policy, called a report, which sets a new record for usurpation of authority.[1]

By this report the Commission—

1. Imposes a condition on the right of motion picture companies to qualify for broadcasting licenses based on information coming to it from an unidentified source and without specific findings based upon evidence adduced in support of or opposition to any application for a license.

2. Asserts the authority to regulate the motion picture industry and the use it shall make of its properties although no such authority has been conferred on it by Congress.

3. Would compel the motion picture companies to make available to television broadcasters their finest films and talent as a condition to the right to qualify for broadcasting licenses.

The report was issued as a result of a hearing held a year ago looking to the establishment of a uniform policy to be followed in the licensing of radio broadcast stations to applicants accused or convicted of violating a law of the United States.

[1] Docket No. 9572, March 29, 1951.

The points set down for hearing, as enumerated in the report, did not even hint that the Commission wished to be enlightened as to its authority to advise prospective applicants for licenses or renewals as to the use which they should make of properties which are not subject to the Commission's regulatory powers, in order to qualify for such licenses or renewals.

Specifically, there was not the slightest intimation that the Commission had in mind the possibility of a ruling or even an expression of opinion to the effect that the motion picture companies, in order to be eligible for licenses or renewals, must first make their choicest films and contract artists available for exhibition on television.

While we have not examined all the briefs and arguments offered at the hearing in April 1950, we do not believe that any such startling proposal entered into the discussion. So revolutionary and drastic a proposal would have attracted wide attention and most certainly would have come to our notice.

Sometime between the close of the hearing and the issuance of the report the Commission either evolved the idea, or it was planted with it, that it could force the motion picture companies to supply their best available films and talents to this rival entertainment medium in order to qualify for licenses.

The report recites blandly that "It has come to the Commission's attention that many motion picture companies refuse to make copies of their films available for use by television companies." It then goes on to say that "the success of television will depend to a large measure on the ability of television stations to acquire the best available films and to use the best available talent and stories in their programs."

It would be interesting, and it may become necessary to ferret out the source of this information that "has come to the Commission's attention." We are confident that it was not openly supplied by the participants in this quasi-judicial inquiry. The motion picture companies represented at the hearing apparently had no warning that such a catastrophic ruling was in contemplation. And the thousands of independent theater owners, who are the concern of this association, had no reason to suspect that their interests were involved, much less in jeopardy.

WILL THE COMMISSION NOW REGULATE THE MOVIES?

It doesn't seem possible that the Commission itself could have realized the full implications of its action.

In order to make good on these "primary principles" which are to guide it "in making a case-to-case determination of these applications," the Commission must exercise strict control over the motion picture companies, even to the extent of fixing prices for their products.

Let us consider what could and doubtless will happen if the Commission persists in the policy of requiring the motion picture companies to place their "best available films" at the disposal of its competitor in the entertainment field. A film company desiring a license asserts in its application that it has conformed to the Commission's requirement. A TV station objects and complains that the applicant has not made its best films available. Is the Commission going to set itself up as an expert to pass on the quality of motion pictures?

But that is child's play compared to the difficulties that will arise when a TV station complains—and this will happen—that the applicant has sought to evade the Commission's policy by charging film rentals too high for it to pay. The Commission has proceeded in happy ignorance of the cost of producing the best pictures and the methods used in pricing them, or else it has made the cold-blooded determination to subsidize TV at the expense of the motion picture industry and thus confiscate the latter's property without just compensation.

We are forced to this conclusion because we do not believe it could have been contemplated by the Commission or the person or persons who persuaded it to adopt this policy, that TV would pay film rentals approximating those derived from the theaters.

Admission to a first-run or key neighborhood theater usually is 50 cents or more. Those theaters pay film rentals ranging from 25 to 40 percent of the gross receipts. If the film companies must make their best pictures available to television, they will be entitled to and should demand the same rentals, based on the same factors, that are charged the theaters. But when they demand that the TV people pay from 12½ to 20 cents for each claimed spectator—and we mean the claims they make in seeking sponsors—they will run snivelling to the Commission and claim that the movie companies are flouting the Commission's policy.

Then the Commission will either have to back down on its policy or start fixing the price of film.

COMMISSION WOULD DESTROY GOVERNMENT'S REVENUE

The country is engaged in a mighty preparedness campaign, the object of which is to insure peace. The Congress is confronted with the task of imposing additional taxes to sustain the effort.

Although the motion-picture business is currently in a serious slump, due in some measure to the free entertainment afforded by television, the United States Government still collects a 20-percent tax on every paid admission to a motion-picture theater.

These admission taxes collected from movie patrons amount to about $300,000,000 a year.

Yet the Federal Communication Commission by its declared policy of building up television at the expense of the movies would jeopardize, certainly greatly reduce and possibly destroy this valuable source of revenue.

This grave consequence, evidently not realized or taken into account by the Commission, illustrates the danger of adopting policies affecting industries which are not subject to the Commission's jurisdiction without a full, complete, and open investigation in the course of which information on all angles of the subject is obtained from those most affected and best equipped to furnish it.

Unless the Commission recedes from its position, this phase of the matter should receive the attention of Congress while the tax bill is under consideration.

AND IT MAY STILL BE ALL FOR NAUGHT

The gratuitous nature of the Commission's dictum, and the fact that compliance therewith still will not guarantee any film company a broadcasting license, is one of the most serious aspects of its action.

The greater part of the report deals with the points which were set down for hearing. That part of the report was within the Commission's authority and we have no special fault to find with the conclusions reached. It is true, as the Commission says, that "the major motion-picture companies * * * have violated the antitrust laws over a period of years in the motion-picture field." We think it follows, as the Commission concludes, that such violations are "a matter that the Commission must consider carefully in determining the qualifications of these companies to operate in the public interest."

That is an issue between the film companies and the Commission in which the independent exhibitors have no direct interest. It is a question which will have to be resolved on a case-to-case basis when and if those companies apply for licenses.

The only phase of the report that affects the theater owners—and it threatens their very existence—is the next to last paragraph therein which says that the motion-picture companies must make their best films, performers and stories available to television in order to be eligible for a license.

Because it is alien to the questions set down for hearing and does not even deal with adjudged violations of law, it seems to have been added as an irrelevant afterthought. The Commission is careful to say, "We express no opinion at this time as to whether such practices (not supplying films, etc., to TV) are or are not in violation of the antitrust laws." So far as we are aware, no law provides and no court has ever held that it is a violation of law for a private corporation, acting alone and not in concert with others to choose its own customers. And yet the whole purpose of the proceeding was to determine the weight to be given law violations in the granting of licenses.

To reduce the Commission's position to complete absurdity, let us suppose that a motion-picture company has attempted in good faith to comply with the Commission's policy; has made its best films available to TV and thus destroyed their value for exhibition in the theaters. It has destroyed one vast market in hopes of gaining another. And then the Commission, applying the principles discussed in the first six and a half pages of its report, decides that it cannot grant a license to that film company because of its antecedent violations in the motion-picture field.

MOWING DOWN THE INNOCENT BYSTANDERS

The report gives the impression that the Commission moved by some undisclosed impulse hurled a rock at the film companies; but it struck the exhibitors.

It might at least have given consideration to the extent of the havoc which its policies, if carried out, will wreak among the motion-picture exhibitors.

When a picture is shown on television its box-office value in the area in which it is shown is destroyed. About 17,000 theaters are dependent upon an adequate supply of box-office attractions. Of the $2,700,000,000 invested in the entire industry, only $160,000,000 is invested in production and distribution. All of the remainder—94 percent—is invested in theaters.

The 1940 census shows that 177,420 persons were employed in the motion-picture industry. Of these, 33,687 were engaged in production, 11,332 in distribution, and 132,401 in exhibition.

Thus the Federal Communications Commission, of its own motion, has laid down a policy which, if carried out, would endanger the more than $2,000,000,000 invested in theaters and threaten the livelihood of many. The rule prescribed by Congress for the granting of licenses is that "the public convenience, interest, or necessity will be served." Certainly Congress never contemplated that the public interest could be served by tearing down an established industry in order to help a rival industry which, once the novelty has worn off, may not retain public favor.

Despite all the hullabaloo, television's future is still clouded with uncertainty. Its forward surge has slowed down to a walk. Those who glibly predict that television will supplant the movies should read the feature story in the Wall Street Journal for March 26, 1951, entitled "Teetering TV." The Communications Commission may wake up some day and find it has backed the wrong horse. In the meantime, grave damage may result from its present policies. They call for stern resistance by the motion-picture industry, the theaters as well as the producers.

Conditions Behind the Iron Curtain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARGARET CHASE SMITH

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. President, Mr. Adin Ladd, of the merchant marine, has written a most interesting letter to his grandmother who resides in my home town of Skowhegan, Maine. His letter deals with what he saw behind the iron curtain and how what he saw gave him a deeper appreciation of the freedom which we of the United Nations still enjoy.

I commend the letter to my colleagues, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Skowhegan (Maine) Independent-Reporter of April 17, 1951]

ADIN LADD, OF MERCHANT MARINE, WRITES HE IS BACK IN SWEDEN AFTER BEING BEHIND THE IRON CURTAIN

Adin Ladd, A. B., merchant mariner, with the Moore-McCormack Lines, aboard the steamship Mormackfir, lately behind the iron curtain has written his grandmother an entertaining letter from Stockholm, Sweden, under date of April 6. He says:

"There are only two ports left now before heading back to the States. So far we have been to Goteborg, Oslo, Copenhagen, and Gdynia. I am disappointed that we aren't to go to Helsinki after coming so near.

"If you asked a Pole when it was the last time he smiled, I think he would have a little difficulty remembering off-hand the occasion. My O. S. and I walked from the docks across the city and back just looking and listening. The only person with a smile on his face was the innumerable pictures of one Joe Stalin that in varying sizes hang in nearly every shop window. And at that, his big moustached grin is as mirthless as the mouth of a cannon. There is almost a chill in the air, like the moment between seeing the smoke and waiting for the explosion. People we met on the streets, as soon as they recognized us as Americans, would avert their eyes, stop talking, and walk a little faster. It was almost embarrassing to walk down the street and definitely uncomfortable. I noticed in one clothing store just two suits in the window and they were second-hand, very old and shabby. The price—$200 and $184 or the equivalent in Polish money. There were several posters in the windows showing American planes bombing Korean women and children, and the only film (movie) had to do with racial discrimination and Russian soldiers beating the American Army. They are doing an excellent job of teaching the Poles to hate everything American including the Americans themselves. Well any way, the short time I spent in Poland was enough to make me depressed in mind for a long time, after we left that sorry country. Also, I realize a little better the broader meaning, and greater yet, the value of the thought 'freedom.' How can mankind have lost the right to smile or look at a stranger walking down a street? This is a three-dimensioned society now all right. We have not only a right and wrong but a left as well. The Communists are right in not allowing their slaves to see the rest of the world and vice versa; that is—right in their own power-hungry way because no one would stand for them if they knew what the other half was missing. I think a Pole would be happy to miss the soldiers and sailors with their submachine guns and constant checking of papers that goes on day after day.

"It is a relief to be back in Sweden today and until iron curtain is just a phrase in history books, I don't care about going on the other side of it again.

"I didn't send the Copenhagen address in the last letter because I didn't think there would be time enough to receive a letter over here. Now it is too late but there should be mail in New York when we get there."

Supplies for Soldiers on the Black Market

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER E. CAPEHART

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Report From Korea—'GI Says United States Goods on Black Market,'" published in the Bloomington Herald-Telephone, Bloomington, Ind.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT FROM KOREA—GI SAYS UNITED STATES GOODS ON BLACK MARKET

A Bloomington soldier, fighting in Korea, asked today in a letter to the editor of the Daily Herald-Telephone why American GI's there are forced to turn to the black market to buy American goods such as cigarettes, candy, beer, and writing paper.

Pfc Gerard N. Sira, son of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Sira, of Maxwell Lane, is with an engineering outfit in Korea. What he has seen in the far eastern country he apparently doesn't like.

He wrote the following letter to the Herald-Telephone:

"DEAR EDITOR: I am just one of many hundreds of GI's over here in Korea that would just like to have a few of his questions answered. I've never seen the fellows in this outfit with me feeling so low as they are here. Their morale is as low as it could possibly get, and that's not good.

"The first question that I want answered is, What are we here fighting for? It's plain to see that the Korean people don't like us. They don't want us around. As far as we know we haven't any real right to be here."

REPORTS BLACK MARKET

"Where is the stuff that should be on the PX shelves going to? I can answer that one for you. I'll even send you pictures to prove it if you want. Our cigarettes, candy, beer, writing paper, and such stuff is all over the streets of Pusan and other Korean cities, in little stands that the kids have rigged up, and selling for 10 times their values. Cigarettes sell for 25 cents a pack on the black market and 10 cents in the PX. The trouble is that they never get on the PX shelf to start with.

"The paper that I am writing this letter on came from a friend of mine in Bloomington. It's a shame when a fellow has to write home for things he should be able to get right here."

ASKS WHERE TRUCKS ARE

"Where's our trucks? We have to drive trucks that are made in Japan, while our trucks are all used by Koreans who let one last about a month.

"Where's our beer. I am drinking Jap beer right now, because the only American beer we could get is on the black market and it costs $1 a can. Ask yourself these questions and see if you can give me a halfway decent answer.

"Where's our clothes? We all have clothes, yes, but the Koreans and the English soldiers also have them. A soldier is supposed to honor his uniform. I'll ask you people from my home town—could you honor the uniform that all the soldiers of the world, and half of the prisoners of war are wearing? I don't think you could. Our Army is supposed to be outstanding. I don't see how it possibly could be with everything wearing one of its uniforms."

WANTS ANSWERS

"I guess maybe this sounds like a lot of plain old griping to some of you folks back home, but just ask a few veterans around there and see if they don't set you straight. I'd like some of these things answered, so let's hear from someone who thinks he knows.

"I hope this gets in the paper, so a lot of the mothers of boys who are over here can see what they are up against.

"Your friend,

"Pfc G. N. SIRA."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Arthur Krock, from the New York Times of March 27, 1951:

ON THE OUTSKIRTS OF ARMAGEDDON

(By Arthur Krock)

FRANKFORT, GERMANY, March 18.—The historic rift between France and Germany, the tragedy of Europe that eventually brought the United States into two global wars and the leadership of the west, must first be bridged over, then eliminated, to preserve human liberty. This is the task to which the Americans in Western Europe are devoting themselves, on the spot. From all the complicated moves and situations which bewilder the newcomer to Germany from Washington this fundamental fact emerges, and dominates the path to any conclusion.

Paris and France, except for the Hotel Astoria near the Arc de Triomphe, are as native to their own culture as ever. But Frankfort, where the High Commission has its base in the I. G. Farben headquarters, and Wiesbaden, where the Air Force soars through and over the town, have become a visible part of the United States. Many sights and sounds declare this. But among the most interesting are the road signs as the traveler nears Frankfort: "No Passing," "Soft Shoulder," "United States P-X 600 Yards." For this is one of the great focal points for the most unusual adventure ever undertaken by the United States. And the historian would be pressed to present a parallel.

The task is not only that of the Economic Cooperation Administration, now well on the way to transition, which was to restore the productive economy of nations devastated by the Second World War. It is not only that of General Eisenhower, which is to build the military section of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to deter the Soviets from Western European aggression. It is not only that of the British and the Western Europeans, plus some others, to do their part of this building and evolve a continental army at last. It is enormously the task of the Allied High Commission in Germany, of which the American part under John J. McCloy is laboring with extraordinary devotion to instill among the Germans the will to place the independence of the individual and the dignity of the human spirit above every other consideration of human life.

This is not to imply that the High Commissions of the British and the French are not pursuing the same objective. But there are several well-known reasons why the most powerful influence to this end must and does come from the American section. If this goal is not attained, neither of the related ones can be, and it is far too early to form an opinion whether success can come.

The principal labor of Mr. McCloy, which is to forge and bind a common social-economic link between France and Germany, can be only briefly appraised in this space. But at this writing there is reason to hope that before it can appear in print the Schuman plan for the basic economic interdependence of France and Germany will have been initialed by the Governments, to be submitted for legislative approval, and that within a matter of weeks this approval will be forthcoming. There is just about that much time for the west to acquire this essential foundation, in the opinion of informed persons here.

If the Schuman plan, originated by French statesmen in one of the few inspired moments since postwar Soviet foreign policy disclosed itself, shall come into being in the required time the principal personal credit must go to Mr. McCloy. To reach the present status of hope for the Schuman plan he has wrestled with the French, the Germans, the British, the industrialists of the Ruhr—and some attorneys they employed in the United States—with greater exertion than Jacob had to put forth with the angel.

From the outset of serious consideration of the Schuman plan Mr. McCloy laid down three absolute conditions. The Ruhr industrial combine, composed of about a dozen men who follow three or four and were determined to regain their cartelized monopoly, must be broken. Instead of being able to obtain even more of the coking coal of the Ruhr required for their productive capacity, they must be limited to 75 percent (he first tried to make it 50 percent) so that steel mills elsewhere on the continent could have essential supplies. Third, the single procurement agency for coking coal must be disbanded and something resembling a free market take its place. The reason why the Schuman plan is on its way to initialing with the indispensable approval of the United States is because Mr. McCloy gained his objectives in substance and largely in detail. The apex of victory was the signed approval of the Conditions by Chancelor Adenauer of the new West German Republic.

If the Schuman plan gets into operation, and works, then, for the first time since Bismarck failed to interest France more in colonial expansion than in the recovery of Alsace-Lorraine, the basic cause of the tragedy of Europe will be on its way to removal. If that happens, the accomplishments of the Marshall plan will take on the fiber of endurance; the "Eisenhower army" will have shorter life as a mere blueprint surrounded by adoring staff officers; the European army will advance from the stage of debate, and the Soviets will be faced with the plain necessity of a change of foreign policy.

There are lions in the high grasses of the untrod areas near the path to these goals—one can almost smell their feral odor from this shattered city—and they may at any time be loosed to destruction which will include their own. No one in authority here disputes the hazard. But the procession of peace is advancing, and the flag of the United States is at the fore.

The Brilliant Record of General of the Army Douglas A. MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, with Gen. Douglas A. MacArthur's return to the United States after an absence of over 14 years, it is fitting that we pause in our tribute to him and study his remarkable military career which is unparalleled in the history of this Nation:

GENERAL OF THE ARMY DOUGLAS MACARTHUR

Douglas MacArthur was born at Little Rock, Ark., January 26, 1880. He entered the United States Military Academy on June 13, 1899; graduated at the head of his class on June 11, 1903; and was commissioned a second lieutenant of engineers.

Shortly after he was graduated from the United States Military Academy, he sailed for the Philippine Islands. Here he engaged in engineering duties, including construction work at Guimaras Island until October 1904. Upon his return to the United States, he served at San Francisco with the California Debris Commission and as Assisting and Acting Chief Engineering Officer, Pacific Division, until October 1905. He was then ordered to Tokyo where he served as aide to his father, Lt. Gen. Arthur MacArthur, until September 15, 1906. While on this detail he was given a confidential mission which took him to many countries throughout Asia.

Upon his return to the United States, he was assigned to duty with the Second Battalion of Engineers at Washington Barracks, D. C., and, in addition served as aide to President Theodore Roosevelt until August 1907. In February 1908, he was graduated from the Engineer School of Application. He then served as assistant engineer at Milwaukee, Wis. In April 1908, he joined Company K, Third Battalion of Engineers, at Fort Leavenworth, Kans. Here he served as company officer and also as an instructor in the Mounted Service School and the Army Service School. His 4-year tour at Fort Leavenworth was interrupted by periods of service at San Antonio, Tex., and in the Panama Canal Zone.

He was assigned to duty in the Office of the Chief of Engineers from 1912 until April 1913; as Superintendent of State, War, and Navy Building, until November 1913; and as a member of the General Staff Corps until September 1917. From April until September 1914, he accompanied our expedition to Veracruz as a member of the General Staff.

He conceived the idea of the Rainbow (42d) Division and as Chief of Staff helped direct its organization and training. He arrived with this division in France, October 1917, and served with it until August 1918, in the Vaucouleurs, La Franche, and Rolamont Training Areas; in the Luneville, Baccaret, Esperance-Souain Sectors; in the Champagne-Marne defensive; and in the Aisne-Marne offensive. He commanded the Eighty-fourth Infantry Brigade in the St. Mihiel, Essey, and Pannes, Woevre, Meuse-Argonne, and Sedan offensives. He then commanded the Forty-second Division until November 1918 and served in the Army of Occupation in Germany until 1919.

Upon his return to the United States, he served in the Office of the Chief of Staff, Washington, D. C., until June 1919. He was Superintendent of the United States Military Academy to June 1922, during which time he modernized the courses in military training.

From West Point he was sent to the Philippine Islands, where he served at Headquarters, Philippine Department, until November 1922, in command of the District of Manila until June 1923, and in command of the Twenty-third Infantry Brigade at Fort William McKinley to January 1925. Returning to the United States, he commanded the Fourth Corps Area, Atlanta, Ga., to July 1925; and the Third Corps Area, Baltimore, Md., to September 1928. He was selected president of the 1928 American Olympic team, which he took to Amsterdam, Holland.

In 1928 he returned to the Philippines where he served 2 years as department commander. Upon his arrival in the United States in September 1930, he commanded the Ninth Corps Area, San Francisco, to October 1930, when he became Chief of Staff of the Army. Funds for national defense were at a low ebb. He first saved the skeleton army from the economy wave, then modernized it. He set up the four army and corps area organizations, and the General Headquarters Air Force. The basic blueprints of manpower procurement and industrial mobilization were developed under his direction.

Upon completion of his duty as Chief of Staff in October 1935, he was appointed military adviser to the commonwealth government of the Philippines. He inaugurated a long-range military training program financed by the Philippine Government. His 10-year plan was based upon universal military service.

As conditions in the Orient became critical, on July 26, 1941, he was designated commanding general, United States Army Forces in the Far East. His command included the Philippine department and the forces of the commonwealth government, which were inducted into the United States Army. When he took over this command the Philippine department consisted of 18,000 American and Philippine Scout troops. There were ample Filipino reservists, but their period of training had not been completed.

The stubborn defense of the Philippine-American forces on Bataan threw Japanese conquest plans out of gear and gained valuable time for the defense of Australia.

In March 1942, President Roosevelt ordered General MacArthur from Corregidor to Australia for the purpose of organizing and leading rescue forces back for the liberation of the Philippines. On April 18, 1942, he was made supreme commander of the southwest Pacific area and a meager force of Australians and Americans.

With insufficient forces to justify aggressive action, he decided to defend Australia, first by blocking the Japanese advance in New Guinea, and then by assuming the offensive. In heavy fighting the enemy was stopped at Gona in December 1942.

The next year General MacArthur assumed the offensive and pierced the strong enemy outer perimeter, between Wewak and Rabaul, by securing the Vitiaz Straits.

Seizure of the Admiralty Islands by a coup de main, February 29, 1944, marked the end of a great swinging move pivoting on New Guinea which has been a basic purpose of operations initiated June 29, 1943, when the Southwest Pacific and South Pacific areas were united under General MacArthur's command. Possession of the Admiralties relieved his supply line from threat of flank attack from the east and enabled him to change the axis of his advance from north to west. In the Solomons and Bismarcks a strong enemy had been isolated and bypassed.

The way was now open for a shore-to shore advance to the northwest along the land mass of New Guinea. On April 22, Hollandia, 500 miles west of the Bitiaz Straits, was occupied. The enemy was completely surprised; our losses negligible. The operation threw a loop of envelopment around the enemy's eighteenth army which was dispersed along the New Guinea coast east of Hollandia. Throughout the campaign the enemy had lost 110,000 men and the remainder of his original strength of a quarter of a million was bypassed and became strategically unimportant. By the last of July 1944, General MacArthur had occupied key positions along the entire New Guinea coast with campaigns at Wadke, Sarmi, Biak, Noemfoor, Opmarai, and Sansapor.

Occupation of Morotai, 300 miles south of the Philippines, on September 15, penetrated the Halmahera-Philippine line and imperiled enemy conquests in the East Indies by the threat of envelopment and air attack.

General MacArthur's landing on Leyte on October 20 pierced the center of the enemy's strategic defensive line which extended from Japan through Formosa, the Philippines, the East Indies, Singapore, and Burma. Both enemy flanks thus created were vulnerable to envelopment to the north and to the south. The so-called greater east Asia coprosperity sphere was cut in two and the conquered empire to the south occupied by half a million troops, was severed from Japan proper. Fully realizing the importance of Leyte, the enemy reinforced to the limit of his ability and with his air, land, and sea forces made suicidal attempts to dislodge General MacArthur from the island. This supreme effort of the enemy failed. His fleet and air arm suffered major defeat and his land forces were annihilated.

On December 15, sites for air bases and naval facilities were occupied on Mindoro which would support Luzon operations and insure domination of enemy sea and air routes in the South China Sea. From Leyte a corridor had been driven from east to west which cut the Philippine Archipelago in two.

Luzon was invaded on January 9, 1945. The enemy expected a landing south of Manila. Consequently the Lingayen Gulf landing north of Manila was practically unopposed. This placed American troops in rear of the enemy's main forces, cut his reinforcement and supply lines, and closed his avenue of escape.

By February a great converging movement on Manila was under way. The XI Corps which landed unopposed was driving east from Zambales coast. The Eleventh Airborne Division of the Eighth Army which landed without losses on the west coast of Batanges February 1, was moving rapidly north toward Manila. The Sixth Army had occupied the entire Central Plain of Luzon and its Thirty-seventh Infantry and the First Cavalry Divisions were fighting their way into the outskirts of north Manila.

On February 3, 1945, in a wide envelopment from the east, elements of the First Cavalry Division entered Manila, seized Santo Tomas and Bilibid Prison and liberated thousands of internees and prisoners of war. After desperate fighting Manila was finally liberated on February 23.

By the end of February, Corregidor and Bataan had been occupied.

In March, a vigorous campaign was launched in the Visayans. Palawan, Zamboanga, Panay, Cebu, and Negros were occupied in quick succession. Seizure of the Sulu Archipelago in early April made Tawitawi available as a great strategic air base from which the enemy empire life line to the south was within easy air range. By the 21st of April, General MacArthur's control of the entire Visayan Group was complete. On the 19th of April, from a surprise landing at Malabang and Parang in western Mindanao, Eighth Army units fought their way eastward in a 2-weeks' overland march which brought them to the outskirts of Davao.

In a collateral drive on Borneo, supported by Allied naval and air units, Australian forces occupied Tarakan May 3, Brunei Bay June 10, and Balikpapan July 1. Possession of these objectives made available sources of oil and other needed war materials and completed General MacArthur's tactical control of the entire Southwest Pacific area.

On the 5th of July, General MacArthur declared his Philippine campaign closed. It had been a campaign characterized by great economy in the lives of his men and heavy destruction of the enemy. Twenty-three enemy divisions, or equivalents, had been annihilated and more than 400,000 Japanese had been killed. Of the Philippine campaign General MacArthur announced:

"Working in complete unison the three services inflicted the greatest disaster ever sustained by Japanese arms.

"The objects of the campaign were as follows:

"1. To penetrate and pierce the enemy's center so as to divide him into north and south, his homeland to the north, his captured Pacific possession to the south. Each half could then be enveloped and attacked in turn.

"2. The acquisition of a great land, sea, and air base for future operations both to the north and to the south comparable to the British islands in its use as a base for Allied operations from the west against Germany.

"3. The establishment of a great strangulating air and sea blockade between Japan and the conquered possessions in the Pacific to the south so as to prevent raw materials being sent to the north and supply or reinforcement to the south.

"4. The liberation of the Philippines with the consequent collapse of the enemy's imperial concept of a greater east Asia coprosperity sphere and the reintroduction of democracy in the Far East.

"5. The liberation of our captured officers and men and of internees held in the Philippines.

"6. A crippling blow to the Japanese Army, Navy, and Air Force.

"All of these purposes were accomplished."

On April 6, 1945, General MacArthur was named Commanding General, United States Army Forces in the Pacific. Three months later his Okinawa-based air force had launched air strikes against Japan itself. On August 14, 1945, President Truman announced the appointment of General MacArthur as Supreme Allied Commander to receive the Japanese surrender and command the occupation forces in addition to his duties as commander of the United States Army forces in the Pacific. In January 1947 he was designated commander in chief of the Far East Command, retaining his position as Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers in Japan.

On July 25, 1950, a month after the North Korean Communists had invaded South Korea, General MacArthur assumed command of the United Nations command in the Far East, organized to direct United Nations Forces in the defense of South Korea.

DECORATIONS

Thanks of the House of Representatives, the Senate, the Philippine National Assembly, the Philippine Congress, and the Australian Government have been expressed to General MacArthur for his part in liberating the Philippine Islands during World War II.

He has been awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor, Distinguished Service Cross with one Oak Leaf Cluster, Distinguished Service Medal with three Oak Leaf Clusters, Silver Star with six Oak Leaf Clusters, and the Purple Heart with one Oak Leaf Cluster.

His foreign decorations include the Philippine Medal of Valor, Distinguished Service Star, Defense Medal, and Liberation Medal; British Knight Grand Cross of the Bath; French Grand Officer, Legion of Honor Fourragère, and Croix de Guerre with four Palms; Belgian Commander Order of Crown; Netherlands Knight Grand Cross of the Order of Orange-Nassau with Swords (military division); Italian War Cross and Grand Cordon Order of the Crown; Polish Grand Croix Polonia Restituta and Virtutae Militaire; Hungarian Grand Cross Order of Military Merit; Czechoslovakian Grand Cross Order of White Lion; Yugoslavian Grand Cross Order of Military Merit; Mexican Grand Cross of Military Merit; Ecuadoran First Class Decoration Abdon Calderon, and Greek Medal of Valor.

Following are the citations for his American military awards:

Medal of Honor: "For conspicuous leadership in preparing the Philippine Islands to resist conquest, for gallantry and intrepidity above and beyond the call of duty in action against invading Japanese forces, and for the heroic conduct of defensive and offensive operations on the Bataan peninsula. He mobilized, trained, and led an army which has received world acclaim for its gallant defense against a tremendous superiority of enemy forces in men and arms. His utter disregard of personal danger under heavy fire and aerial bombardment, his calm judgment in each crisis, inspired his troops, galvanized the spirit of resistance of the Filipino people, and confirmed the faith of the American people in their armed forces."

Distinguished Service Cross: For heroism in the Salient du Feys, France, March 9, 1918. When Company D, One Hundred and Sixty-eighth Infantry, was under severe attack in the Salient de Feys, France, he voluntarily joined it, upon finding that he could do so without interfering with his normal duties, and by his coolness and conspicuous courage aided materially in its success.

Oak Leaf Cluster to the Distinguished Service Cross: As brigade commander, General MacArthur personally led his men and by the skillful maneuvering of his brigade made possible the capture of Hills 288, 242, and the Cote de Chatilon, October 14, 15, and 16, 1918. He displayed indomitable resolution and great courage in rallying broken lines and in reforming attacks, thereby making victory possible. On a field where courage was the rule, his courage was the dominant feature.

Distinguished Service Medal: He served with credit as chief of staff of the Twenty-fourth Division in the operations at Chalons and at the Chateau Thierry Salient. In command of the Eighty-fourth Infantry Brigade he showed himself to be a brilliant commander of skill and judgment. Later he served with distinction as commanding general of the Forty-second Division.

First Oak Leaf Cluster to the Distinguished Service Medal: As Chief of Staff of the Army of the United States since November 21, 1930, he has performed his many important and exacting duties with signal success. He devised and developed the four-army organization of our land forces; he conceived and established the General Headquarters Air Force, thus immeasurably increasing the effectiveness of our air defenses; he intiated a comprehensive program of modernization in the Army's tactics, equipment, training, and organization. In addition, the professional counsel and assistance he has continuously rendered to the President, to the Secretary of War, and to the Congress have been distinguished by such logic, vision, and accuracy as to contribute markedly to the formulation of sound defense policies and the enactment of progressive laws for promoting the Nation's security.

Second Oak Leaf Cluster to the Distinguished Service Medal: For exceptionally distinguished service as supreme commander of Allied forces in the southwest Pacific since March 1942. Under extremely difficult conditions of terrain, climate, and limited forces and material, he expelled the enemy from eastern New Guinea, secured lodgments on the island of New Britain, and gave strategical direction to coordinated operations resulting in the conquest of the New Georgia group and the establishment of the United States Army and Navy forces on Bougainville Island. He had inflicted heavy losses on the enemy and established his forces in positions highly favorable for the construction of offensive operations.

Third Oak Leaf Cluster to the Distinguished Service Medal: "As supreme commander of Allied air, ground, and sea forces in the southwest Pacific, General of the Army Douglas MacArthur planned and personally directed the campaigns which resulted in the liberation of the Philippine Islands. Strongly entrenched and superior enemy forces were overwhelmed and completely destroyed in a series of decisive operations exploiting United States air and sea superiority, coupled with the resolute and courageous fighting of the ground forces. The immediate result of the campaign was control of the China Sea, the isolation of Japanese forces in Burma, Malaya, and Indochina and the termination of coastwise traffic supporting the Japanese armies in central and south China.

"The liberation of the Philippines began with the landings on Leyte on October 20 in which complete strategical surprise was achieved. After bitter fighting under most difficult conditions of weather and terrain, General MacArthur destroyed the Japanese forces, which included the noted First Division of the Kwantung Army. Again surprising the enemy, General MacArthur moved his forces boldly up the western coast of the main Philippine island and effected a landing on the shores of Lingayen Gulf on January 9, 1945. The flawless execution of this hazardous amphibious approach and landing so disorganized the enemy that in a series of deep thrusts Manila was liberated on February 25. The fortress of Corregidor fell soon afterward in a brilliantly conceived and directed combined land, sea, and air operation. By the end of June only isolated groups of the enemy remained on Luzon.

"While the United States Sixth Army was so engaged, Eighth Army units cleared the enemy from the southern islands in a series of amphibious operations. By July 4 organized resistance had terminated, completing the liberation of the Philippine Islands and the 17,000,000 inhabitants from Japanese domination. More than 300,000 dead and 7,000 prisoners were lost by the enemy, our casualties in killed, wounded and missing totaling 60,628. Seventeen of our divisions had opposed and defeated 23 enemy divisions. The air, ground, and naval forces worked in complete unison to inflict this crushing disaster on the Japanese Army."

The Christian College in America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a pamphlet entitled "The Christian College in America," by Ralph Waldo Lloyd, president of Maryville College.

There being no objection, the pamphlet was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CHRISTIAN COLLEGE IN AMERICA

(By Ralph Waldo Lloyd, president of Maryville College)

The United States of America has more institutions of higher learning and more college students than have all the other countries of the world put together. The proportion of American young people who attend college has been multiplied by 5 and the number by 10 during the first half of the twentieth century.

These are important facts, but they are not so much reasons for pride as for concern and action. If our colleges wield wider influence than ever before, wider than do colleges in other nations, then obviously the nature of that influence is of supreme importance. It is cause for grave concern that so many contemporary events in the world confirm what Lord Macaulay said years ago, "Nine-tenths of the calamities that have befallen humanity have no other origin than the union of high intelligence with low desires."

The latest report of the United States Office of Education lists 1,808 colleges, universities, and professional schools. In terms of control, 506 of these are independent, 594 are tax-supported, and 708 are church-related (475 Protestant, 228 Roman Catholic, 5

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Jewish). In terms of emphasis and teaching, most of the church-related colleges and some of the others state that it is their purpose to be Christian. This bulletin is written to set forth the role of the Christian colleges, of which Maryville College is one.

AN AMERICAN HERITAGE

When the Thirteen Colonies became the United States of America there were in existence nine of the present 1808 institutions (Harvard, William and Mary, Yale, Princeton, Columbia, Pennsylvania, Brown, Rutgers, Dartmouth). All of them had grown out of the Christian movement, although none is today actively related to any church. During the first half century after adoption of the Constitution, about forty permanent colleges were opened. Of these, three-fourths (among which was Maryville College) were established directly by ministers and people of the churches. From then until the end of the nineteenth century extension of the southern and western frontiers was accompanied by church missionary enterprises which placed schools and colleges all across the land. Often these institutions provided to vast territories their only facilities for educated leadership.

In 1860 there were in the United States 180 higher institutions related to the church and 17 to the State. In 1900 there were still five times as many church colleges as tax-supported colleges, with twice as many students. Today the colleges which announce that it is their purpose to be Christian constitute a less impressive part of the total higher educational system than they once did. Yet they are more numerous, more firmly established, enroll more students than at any time in the past.

Being church-related does not necessarily make a college Christian and being independent or tax-supported does not necessarily prevent its being Christian. But it is common knowledge that only a few colleges which are not related to a church consider their function to be distinctively Christian or organize their faculties and programs to that end.

In the history of the United States the Christian college has played a far more important role than most historians accord it. When the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution were formulated and throughout the ensuing century, a century in which the Nation laid the foundations for its present greatness, Christian colleges carried most of the task of higher education. Might there not be some causal connection between these facts? Among all our institutions, the free Christian college was most closely related to our early history and is the most typically American.

THE CHRISTIAN COLLEGE IS DIFFERENT

It is not different in its general academic standards and procedures. The accredited Christian college must meet the same educational standards that other accredited colleges meet. But it is different, and that which makes it so is something which it is and does in addition to what other institutions are and do. For one thing, it adds an announcement that its purpose is to be Christian. Substantially all tax-supported and most independent universities feel themselves limited in this matter by laws, tradition, clientele, alumni, faculty, or their own educational philosophy. On the other hand, all church-related and some independent colleges are free to adopt, as definitely as they wish, a program for training students in Christian belief, Christian character, and Christian motives of service.

It is true that some church-related colleges make a far more serious and thoroughgoing effort than do others to add the things that create a distinctive Christian atmosphere and influence. One common and disturbing criticism is that college A or B, which announces itself as Christian, is no different from college or university C or D, which makes no such claim.

What must a college do to be effectively Christian? It must be under a controlling body that adopts and makes regulative a purpose to be Christian; it must have a president and faculty who are committed to this same purpose in contrast to the practice of religious neutrality now so dominant in most large centers of American higher education; it must give to Christianity and the Bible a place in the curriculum comparable to the places given to other great fields of knowledge and life; it must have an over-all program and student and faculty organizations which will foster Christian fellowship, expression, and service; it must test its own official policies and practices by the Christian standard. Colleges are not Christian by drift or by imitating other types of colleges, no matter how famous; they are Christian only through strenuous and constant effort.

An institution can accomplish these things without creating sectarianism. It is not a sectarian but a Christian college which we advocate. It is a college which frankly stands with the church in its larger ministry to the world and for the great central affirmations made by all Christian churches—affirmations made in clear language about God as Father, about Jesus Christ as divine Lord and Savior, about the Kingdom of righteousness on earth.

At the heart of these things is the Christian faculty. Only sympathetic and active Christians should ever be appointed. The chief difference between the Christian college and other colleges may well be in that little word "only." It assures that the teaching of all subjects and the management of all its affairs will be from a Christian point of view. Religion thus becomes a natural and organic part of the college.

"Secular education is only half education with the more important half left out," wrote Sir Robert Peel. It is this more important half which the Christian college particularly aims to supply. Fifteen years ago Dr. Kenneth Scott Latourette published an article under the challenging title, "Dare a College Be Christian?" After reviewing the practical factors involved, he came to this conclusion: "In such a situation colleges and universities which will dare to enter on the Christian pilgrimage have a unique and urgent mission."

THE CHRISTIAN COLLEGE IS ESSENTIAL TO THE FUTURE

To some of us it seems self-evident that since Christian belief, character, and service are recognized as essential to our civilization, they should have a regulative part in the life of our colleges and universities where a large proportion of our future leaders spend four or more of their most maturing years. But to a great many people this does not seem self-evident at all. They do not think it matters much what the colleges or the churches do about religion in higher education; or whether there are colleges which can and do give major emphasis to these fundamentals. That is why the case for the Christian college should be stated plainly and urgently. Here are some of the arguments in that case.

1. It is essential to the Nation: The writers of the Constitution of the United States in 1787 rather surprisingly did not include any reference to education. But the famous ordinance creating the Northwest Territory, between Pennsylvania and the Mississippi River, adopted the same year by the very Congress that called the Constitutional Convention, contains a significant statement, which was substantially repeated in the Ordinance of 1790 that created the Territory south of the Ohio, as follows: "Religion morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall be forever encouraged." Here in the same sentence education and religion, with morality, are magnified. The assumption seems clear—they go together. That is the view of those who founded this Nation.

Those who wrote the Declaration of Independence, with its basic recognition of God, and later the Constitution and other documents which established government on those principles of independence, would doubtless be amazed that their wise provision for separation of church and state has been used to defend the present extensive separation of religion and education. President Faunce of Brown University once wrote: "Here is our national peril, that the supremely important task of our generation will fall between church and state and be ignored by both; the church may say, 'Education is no longer in our hands'; the state may say, 'On all religious matters we are silent.'"

The roots of democracy and the foundations of this Nation are in the Christian convictions and ideals. Decisions of the United States Supreme Court have contained more than once the statement that this is a Christian nation in its historic beginnings and its dominant religion. For democracy and the Nation to endure, those Christian convictions and ideals must influence men and events more widely and profoundly than they have done in our generation.

Secularism, the organization of life apart from God, runs to its logical results in the pagan nazism of Hitler and in the atheistic communism now seeking to dominate the world. Democracy stands against them as the hope of freemen. But if democracy also organizes life apart from God, how can it stand permanently? Many of our political and educational leaders are sincere Christians, but too often they act with unnecessary timidity about religion.

At the heart of the matter is our education, including our higher education whose influence extends into the Nation and its leadership as never before among any people. In 1910 approximately 4 percent of our college-age youth were in college; by 1940 it was 16 percent; since World War II a million veterans have sent the percentage considerably higher than that. This latter is temporary, it is true, but some increases will certainly continue. The President's Commission on Higher Education, in its much discussed report of 1947, proposes that ways be found by 1960 (chiefly through tax-supported colleges and Government subsidies) to increase the number enormously, to 50 percent of all college-age youth.

It is unthinkable that the nation's 700 church-related colleges could be closed or secularized without national disaster. These church colleges, with the 500 independent institutions, constitute the historic American free-enterprise program of higher education. It is essential to the Nation as well as to education that their influence be increased proportionately as tax-supported colleges and universities become larger, more numerous, and more dominant. It would be a national misfortune if all higher education were under the church; however, there is no danger, even remote, that this will come to pass. It would be an equal, perhaps a greater, misfortune if all were under some unit of Government; and that could happen here as it has happened in other nations.

The Christian philosophy of life and standard of morals, a knowledge of the Bible, and the protection of freedom which strong Christian colleges provide, are essential if the original foundations of this Nation are to be kept and if there is to be a free and great American Nation of the future.

2. The Christian college is essential to the church. It is the only medium through which most Protestant denominations now participate in the formal educational program in the United States. The churches are doing an impressive work through student pastors and foundations on campuses of large State and independent universities; these institutions, therefore, are not without the ministry of religion, a ministry which officials of the universities value highly and encourage. But we are speaking here especially of schools in whose operation the church has a part. In the nineteenth century there were throughout the country hundreds of academies established and maintained under stimulus from the churches. Most of those under Protestant auspices were abandoned as the system of American public high schools was extended in the early years of the twentieth century. The Protestant churches were and are principal champions of tax-supported public education for all people, yet they probably made a mistake in withdrawing so completely from the fields of secondary and elementary education. However, there is no turning back now, and the college level is the only one on which the Protestant church will have any considerable number of institutions in the future.

The Christian colleges do much to keep the church educationally minded; they increase the church's appreciation of the values of Christian higher education; they save the church from losing touch with modern scholarship; they raise the educational standards within the church; and they supply a majority of the ministers and a large proportion of the lay leaders of the churches. Without these colleges is is conceivable that the church's leadership would shrink to a point where its whole program would be threatened. Furthermore, this other simple but fundamental fact must not be overlooked: the Christian college provides higher education in a Christian atmosphere for the youth of Christian homes.

3. The Christian college is essential to higher education. Each group of American higher institutions (tax-supported, independent, church-related) makes a contribution to the whole and to the others. In accenting the place of the Christian college, there is no intention to discount the essential services of the other types of college. State universities are essential and can do some necessary things which otherwise would not be done. Independent colleges draw support and serve a clientele often not available to other institutions. On their part, Christian colleges are in a position, not occupied by the others, to act on the truth that all higher education is incomplete without religion. It can put the study of religion and the Bible on an equal basis with the study of other great fields of knowledge. It need not divide the student into parts, with one part going to college and another part going to church. Christian education says that man's life is a unity and the whole man ought to be educated. A complete education must treat religion as an integral part of the whole. This is a much needed emphasis in contemporary American higher education.

The church-related colleges have a special mission (shared with independent colleges) in behalf of freedom in higher education. The church is freer from political control than is any other body in the world, as recent and earlier history of many nations abundantly shows. The colleges related to the church, therefore, have the strongest assurance of remaining free. They do a major service in preserving the freedom of all colleges. Tax-supported institutions are the more free from political interference because of the strong Christian colleges which cannot be subjected to any political domination.

THE CHRISTIAN COLLEGE IS UNDER SEVERE PRESSURES

That an institution so typically American, so important to the Nation's pest growth into greatness, and so essential to the future, should be subjected to threatening pressures exerted by the very society it serves is a strange turn of events indeed. But such is the case.

1. Under and through all other pressures is that of the secularism of our modern society. One historian writes that "the history of the modern western mind may be said to be the history of the gradual secularization of man." As in recent generations man discovered and developed more and more the natural forces in his world, he became more and more self-satisfied and self-confident, believing that by wise planning he could master his own situation without reference to God or religion.

Events of the past 10 years have shocked many out of this self-sufficiency. But on the whole, our society continues to put its faith in itself and in physical power, not in God and in spiritual power. Our American education, with all its marvelous advances, has steadily receded from its earlier emphasis on religion and has become secular with its society. Morality is stressed, but usually in terms of humanism and pragmatism, not on a basis of theism. Men have forgotten George Washington's warning that morality depends on religion. This situation had developed by the time this writer was in the public schools, but at that time so much was left out of the school program on all levels that leaving out religion did not seem so remarkable. Today, however, schools include so many things that to omit religion suggests that society and educators count it relatively unimportant.

2. A natural result is the pressure of unappreciation. In many influential educational quarters the need for a positive Christian emphasis is discounted and the Christian college as such is ignored in educational planning. For example, the President's Commission on Higher Education, in 1947, practically dismissed the church college and even the independent college from serious consideration in its proposals for the future. Educators, political leaders, ministers, parents, and students all are affected by such estimates from high quarters.

3. There is a distracting pressure, educators discover, in the very accrediting processes which are intended to do institutions and education good. The major standardizing bodies render an indispensable service. The Christian college must and should meet the standards set for the accrediting of all colleges. But in the final analysis the accrediting bodies find it necessary to measure chiefly by money—money spent for buildings, for instruction, for books, for laboratories. It is hard to give due consideration to other factors such as tone and spiritual influence. The constant necessity of meeting the accrediting standards and their financial demands tends to turn the Christian college's attention from the value of its distinctive Christian function to the values and requirements of the academic function. There are no corresponding pressures upon the college to develop or even to retain its Christian emphasis.

4. There is a pressure of Government also, usually unintentional and indirect but real. The inexorable growth of Federal, State, and municipal taxes is rapidly reducing the giving ability of individuals who otherwise might provide adequate funds for private and church colleges. Because of the endless search for more revenue and because of a limited appreciation for the colleges which are not tax-supported, there now appear frequently in Congress and legislatures proposals to take away the historic tax-exemption privileges of private and church colleges while keeping them for tax-supported colleges. So far most of these proposals have been defeated by the vigilance of the friends of free institutions.

But it ought to be of deep concern that Federal and State officials so often appear to act on the idea that tax-supported colleges are the only ones seriously needed for the future. At this writing there are bills in Congress to provide various new subsidies or education. Some of these are not available to independent and church-related colleges; some are available, but dangerous. This writer believes that nongovernment colleges should not accept any government subsidy lest that subsidy reduce or destroy their historic freedom.

5. There is, of course, an ever-recurring economic pressure. Operation costs go up with every wave of inflation. Endowments earn less than they once did. Charges to students ought not to be made so high as to put the Christian college out of reach of the average Christian home. Enrollments need to be relatively small to insure an effective Christian program even though large enrollment and higher charges would help financial income. There are no unlimited sources of support available to the private college as the taxing power of Government, theoretically unlimited, is available to the tax-supported college. Where can the necessary support be found?

THE CHRISTIAN COLLEGES' FUTURE DEPENDS UPON THOSE WHO BELIEVE IN CHRISTIAN EDUCATION

The Christian colleges have withstood these pressures with remarkable success in spite of the added and continuous problems of war. They have actually grown stronger, not weaker. Yet, under the pressures which have been mentioned "it may well be," as one prominent educator said 2 years ago, "that within the next two decades will be determined the fate of the independent college in America, and therefore, in the world." The term "independent" here refers to all colleges except those supported by taxes.

If they are to continue, the Christian colleges on their part must be true to their distinctive purpose. But that is only half the need; the other half is support in terms of students and money. Both can be provided adequately if, and only if, Christian people, the church, business firms with vision, and other organizations with the motive of service, really understand and care. They must care a great deal—enough to pay double taxes; one required tax to Government for support of its program of higher education, and one voluntary tax (which really is not a tax but a gift and an investment) to the Christian college and the church for the support of a program of Christian higher education.

The cost is high, but the future is at stake. Our plea is for appreciation and support of all worthy higher institutions—State, independent, and church related—because all are necessary to insure a citizenry enlightened and trained enough to meet the demands of democracy in this complicated age. We urge all colleges, just as we urge the avowedly Christian colleges, to give due place to the first essential which is now so often forgotten—spiritual religion. But our plea is especially for the institutions which also are being too frequently forgotten—the historic Christian colleges of America.

Students from Christian homes are as necessary to these colleges as is money or appreciation. There must be many students to give the colleges strength and breadth of influence. There must be Christian students and alumni to keep the colleges Christian. A majority of church people agree that Christian colleges are essential to American life, but only a limited number really believe this deeply enough to guide their own young people to them. Christians must take Christian colleges more seriously.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER E. CAPEHART
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, April 17), 1951

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by Dr. Charles Devol, a member of the Marion College faculty, Marion, Ind., and an editorial, both of which appeared in the Marion Chronicle, Marion, Ind.

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, I have a copy of the statement of Dr. Devol and of the editorial, and had intended to ask to have them printed in the RECORD. I am therefore glad to join in the request of my colleague.

There being no objection, the statement and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A CHINA VETERAN SPEAKS

Dr. Charles Devol, who was born in China and resided there for 25 years, and who is on the Marion College faculty, made the following comment today in connection with the dismissal of General MacArthur:

"I feel that in America, where we are accustomed to the freedom of speech and the democratic form of government, that a change of an officer would not be looked upon so seriously, but in China or India or the Philippines or any place else in Asia, I am afraid that the people would gain the impression that we had lost confidence in General MacArthur or that we were not agreed among ourselves in our policies. Some of the Chinese, Filipinos, and others in the anti-Communist groups will be disappointed while the Communists will be happy, because it was their wish to remove him years ago."

MACARTHUR FIRED

There is no question that General MacArthur knew he had stepped out of bounds repeatedly by ignoring the orders of his Commander in Chief and issuing statements in defiance of them. Why he did all the things he did which seemed calculated to bring his removal is a mystery which the general can be expected soon to clear up. He will be welcomed back to his beloved country which he had not visited in many years, as a returned hero, as a man who put his high position on the altar in order to serve his country.

It had been apparent for a long time that MacArthur was trying to win a war in the Far East rather than fight a "police action" which could not be won in Korea. The Pentagon and the United Nations tied his hands. Two weeks ago he said that the best that could be hoped for in Korea was a stalemate. The wanton sacrifice of thousands of fine young Americans plainly revolted and outraged him. To have continued the war in Korea entailing sacrifices of men on such a scale was not in the MacArthur tradition. Obviously he felt that the time to strike in China had come. But the striped pants boys in the State Department and the British influence there finally had their way. Truman dismissed him summarily and the International News Service said the general read the dispatch from a news report before he received the telegraphed message.

Whether the menace of Red aggression could have been stopped in the Far East will remain forever an unsolved mystery by Mr. Truman's off-the-cuff action. The British were acting in their own interest by holding down the troops committed to the Far East while they were carrying on trade with Red China. Certainly with the men at his command MacArthur could see only defeat for his forces and the sacrifice of additional manpower, 90 percent of which was American.

The general now can perform a greater service for his country by disclosing what as commanding general he was forced to keep secret.

Reaction in the United States to the MacArthur dismissal was immediate and bitter. Plainly the American people are sufficiently informed to have stalwart opinions on a subject of great import to them and their country. Widely expressed was the belief that Truman had created another crisis in order to cover up the scandals that are being exposed by the hour. But this may be a sort of crisis with the consequence of which Mr. Truman had not reckoned. The conscience of the people has been stirred. The feeling of outrage and frustration may take many forms. Certainly it will not pass over without furore the like of which has not been seen or heard in the present generation.

Rather than being finished, apparently the great debate has just started.

Was the So-Called British Loan Aid to the English People, or Was it a Weapon for Socialist Politicians To Enslave Them?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOWARD H. BUFFETT
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, the tragic and disastrous stupidity of loans from one government to another stands starkly revealed in the case of the British loan.

In 1946 the so-called British loan was bulled through Congress. The final tactic to put it through was the claim that handouts to the British Government would prevent the spread of communism.

Now take a look at England. It is far down the road to socialism and communism—thanks to the British loan. That handout burdened the American taxpayer with more inflation and more taxes—and at the same time, was a weapon for shackling the British people with socialism.

How many of the present administration policies will have equally disastrous consequences over the next few years?

A solemn and sobering appraisal of England's plight today is contained in the following review from the New York World-Telegram and Sun of April 18, 1951:

THE SOCIALIST TRAGEDY BY IVOR THOMAS

Not in anger but in sorrow, this brilliant Oxford "blue"—newspaperman, officer of the Royal Norfolk Regiment, M. P., and erstwhile stalwart of the Labor Government—admits the resounding flop of socialism in England.

SOCIALISM UNMASKED

Mr. Thomas, like most of the world, wants to see the greatest good for the greatest number. While never a Socialist himself, he was so sympathetic to the aims of the Labor Party that he accepted the offices of Parliamentary Secretary for Aviation and later Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for the Colonies under the present Government.

This gave him a chance to see the fantastic inefficiency of the present Marxist bureaucracy in England. He saw the payroll padding and chronic deficits of the blundering nationalized industries, the growing tendency of the citizenry to consume as much as possible and produce as little as possible. He saw the island steadily plunging toward sympathy with the Communists, toward uncooperative nationalism, and toward bankruptcy.

Naturally there was only one course which an honorable man could take. In 1948 Mr. Thomas resigned from the Labor Party and now tells in detail why this was his only possible choice.

Why have millions of intelligent Englishmen changed their minds about socialism? Because they are beginning to learn that socialism is only communism by degrees—communism by another name—communism by stealth rather than communism by bloody revolution.

Those who still wear rose-colored glasses when viewing socialism should be reminded that in 1948 the British Labor Government published a special centennary edition of the Communist Manifesto of Marx and Engels, admitting their undying gratitude to the authors to whom socialism owes so much.

Mr. Thomas is convinced that in not-too-long an interval, unless the present Government is overthrown, Englishmen will be deprived of profits, interest, and rents, the first aim of Marx in destroying or leveling all classes above the proletariat.

Already private initiative has been virtually destroyed. The confiscatory taxes have knocked the independence and the courage out of large parts of the populace.

Mr. Thomas insists that the principal ultimate difference between communism and socialism is a matter of tactics. But the Communists at least have the honesty to admit their plot against western civilization.

To support the Socialists as "the best bulwark against their fellow Marxists, the Communists," is, according to Mr. Thomas, the rankest folly. Socialists are already convinced Marxists. Socialists pave the way, both through their ideology and through their economic blundering for Communist dictatorship. Mr. Thomas proves his point with six European examples.

There are only two known ways to make men work: The incentive of pay (plus the right to own personal property) and the incentive of the whip.

Already in England miners and farmers may not leave their industries. And discipline has sunk to such a level in some mining areas that a Labor Government professing the complete interest of the workers has had to close down entire pits.

Already members of the Government are telling housewives they have no more intelligence than their 4-year-old children in choosing items of diet. The next step, presumably, is a nationalized menu.

Despite the fact that this summer the Labor Government is trying to add the second element of "bread and the circus" in the form of the rather desperately conceived festival, England is facing moral, political, and economic crisis. As Mr. Thomas does not say, they will soon be asking America for additional funds, while continuing to play the United States against their fellow Marxists in Moscow—a balance-of-power game which has always ended in war, even when England was a first-class instead of a third-class power.

The time has come to tell our ungrateful debtors that we are not giving our billions to underwrite their form or any other form of Marxism.

What Is To Happen to Our Eighth Army in Korea?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial written before General MacArthur's address before Congress:

[From Barron's of April 16, 1951]

THE EIGHTH ARMY: ITS FUTURE IS THE NATION'S FIRST CONCERN

In the momentous week that lies ahead the chances favor an intensification of the fighting in Korea at the very time that political debate in this country rises to crescendo.

The announced Communist intention to make their big push in April, the pick-up in air fighting, the sighting of large concentrations behind the Yalu—all favor this conclusion. It should be a sobering one, we think, to all those who may be tempted to make General MacArthur's return to this country into a kind of Saturnalia, as well as to his midget detractors.

For the fact is that the times are too serious for emotionalism and nothing could serve the general or the country worse. Nor is there the slightest point now in rehashing whether the President should have dismissed a great and honored commander, and even less whether he had the right to do so. As in a great trial these "procedural" questions lie behind us. It is time to come to grips with the merits of the case. What should be done about some 250,000 Americans now at the battle front What should this country's Asian policy be—not tomorrow, not a decade hence, but now?

THE GENERAL'S STAND

The opening statements in the case, to continue the legal analogy, are by now well known. The essence of General MacArthur's position is as follows:

1. The American Army in Korea cannot go on indefinitely fighting a limited war, under wraps with no power to strike back at the enemy's supply bases.

2. The war therefore should be extended to the extent of bombing Communist supply lines and releasing the potential of Chiang Kai-shek's forces on Formosa.

3. In the all-out struggle with communism, Asia, not Europe, is today the decisive theater.

The administration position as thus far developed is to deny all three of these propositions. It apparently believes that a limited war can be kept going at least until snow flies again and the danger of Soviet adventures in Europe or other parts of the world is put off at least for another year when the United States will be incomparably stronger. It holds to the view that further involvement in China, particularly on the China mainland, would be a total tragedy for this country. As against the Asian emphasis of General MacArthur, it gives top priority to Europe and the rapid implementation of the Atlantic Pact.

EAST VERSUS WEST

In trying to understand, if not pass on, these fundamental questions, it is well to recall that the pull between an Asian and European orientation for this country is an old one. The United States is a continental Nation, clasping, in Theodore Roosevelt's phrase, "the crest of an ocean in either hand." Through historical accident as much as anything else, the Republican Party, from the turn of the century when John Hay inaugurated the open-door policy, has always emphasized the Pacific. The Democratic Party, due in no small part to the fact that it was in power in two World Wars, has always emphasized the Atlantic and Europe.

The fact is that no foreign policy worthy of the name can disregard either ocean. Europe remains the greatest industrial workshop outside this country. It may be readily granted that loss of this workshop to the Communists would be a fatal blow. At the same time, however, the United States has established interests in the Pacific—Japan, Formosa, the Philippines, and the protection of Australia, if not of Malaya—which cannot be set aside, and it has been the consistent duty of MacArthur to uphold them. Moreover—and the point is important—it should be noted that the conditions which in World War II made strategic decision as between the two oceans relatively easy no longer exist.

When, specifically, in 1941, Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill decided against General MacArthur's judgment to make Europe the primary theater of action and the Pacific secondary, their choice was in large measure dictated by the harsh realities of the situation. In Europe there was a going war against Hitler, carried forward by Britain. In the Pacific the American Fleet lay at the bottom of Pearl Harbor, requiring at least 2 years to rebuild. The orientation to the Atlantic followed almost inevitably from these circumstances.

Today none of these circumstances is present. The going war against the Communists is in the East. In Europe, General Eisenhower still commands a phantom army. That fact may be used to argue for delay on all fronts, but to the degree that the United States purpose is not just to bend to Communist aggression but to defeat it, then it can be argued—as General MacArthur does argue—that one must close with the enemy where one is at grips with him. And we are at grips in Korea, not in Europe.

Finally, and tipping the scales in favor of MacArthur, there remains the hard, persistent question: What is the Eighth Army in Korea supposed to do? Maybe, it can for a few more months go on fighting a delaying action. Yet General Ridgway himself has described his position as impossible. He sees no chance for decision and meanwhile mounting danger, with the initiative in enemy hands. If the enemy throws in additional air forces, then a wider war, such as MacArthur argues for, becomes inevitable. If he does not, the prospect is for continued casualties, with perhaps in the end a negotiated truce which, on the terms proposed by the U. N. and never openly disavowed by this country, will represent complete and abject far-eastern appeasement.

HIS FINAL SERVICE

The return of MacArthur, in short, must inevitably help to end the State Department's double talk, and smoke the administration out of its micawberism. Meanwhile, and particularly in the coming week, it behooves all citizens to keep their heads. They may thank God they personally do not have to make the vital military decisions now necessary. They may and should do their utmost to allow those in command to work in an atmosphere not of hysteria, but a calm determination.

To welcome General MacArthur back as a returning proconsul, to use him as means of advancing purely partisan causes, is to throw away the great service he can still render his country—the spelling out in detail of what he believes should be done. At stake is more than the reputation of a general or the future of a President or a party. At stake is the fate of as gallant an Army as America has ever put into the field.

Britain's Part in the Korean War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, a distinguished former Member of this House, Hon. Bruce Barton, of New York, has long since been known as one of America's most lucid and forceful writers. His books were read avidly by millions of our people and his news articles have been widely read.

The following article touches a hot spot in our relations with foreign countries especially Great Britain. I agree with my friend and former colleague.

BRUCE BARTON SAYS

(By Bruce Barton)

THE BRITISH

Dr. George Riley, the famous osteopath, was once invited to meet George Bernard Shaw, a devotee of osteopathy.

They had hardly shaken hands before Shaw burst into bitter vituperation of America.

Dr. Riley stood it for about 3 minutes and then cried out: "Stop that. You ought to be ashamed of yourself. How dare you, a man whose food and clothes and rooftree are principally paid for by the money of American bookbuyers and playgoers, how dare you say such things about a country and a people of which you are so abysmally ignorant. I never knew such impudence."

Shaw shut his mouth. A look of amazement came into his eyes, but with it a glint of admiration. He told a friend afterward: "That man Riley is one of the most interesting people I ever met."

Too many British authors and lecturers have accepted our hospitality—often lavish and effusive to the point of servility—taken their winnings and gone back home to write and talk scurvily about us.

Too many of the British people as a whole, jealous of our prosperity, are unfriendly at heart. For years they sold us the idea that, except for the protection of their fleet, we would have been helpless. But they never said from whom their fleet was protecting us; and in our Civil War, when our need of help was most desperate, their sea power, instead of helping us, tried to destroy our merchant marine.

Yet I admire the British. They write the English language better than we—we have no Shakespeare, no Milton. Their administration of justice is swifter, cheaper, and more dignified. In the conduct of foreign affairs they are so much smarter that it just isn't funny.

Indeed, one of my distinguished lawyer friends, a long-time subscriber to the London Spectator, tells me that by reading it he has long been able to predict 6 months in advance just what our State Department would do—the British loan, the Marshall plan, the Atlantic Pact, etc.

Lately Russia has been making our foreign policy. When she lets out a blast, we promptly blast her back. When she nudges the North Koreans into starting a rumpus, we obligingly reply with our whole army and heaven only knows how many billions of dollars, while she loses not one soldier or one ruble.

Dancing to Russia's fiddle is getting us nowhere. We might better go back to letting the British manage us. They know their way around, especially in the Orient, where they operated for more than 150 years at a handsome profit.

Many of us have another idea—that we ought to have our own American foreign policy. But since, to make any sense, this would have to be based on America first, it seems to be out. Every other nation can be for itself first. But not the United States. The mere suggestion is branded "un-American."

Why We Are Where We Are

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Witness, a Catholic newspaper published at Dubuque, Iowa, on April 19, 1951:

WHY WE ARE WHERE WE ARE

The dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur as commander in chief of the U. N. forces in the Far East has given rise to frenzied argumentation and bewilderment among people in all walks of life. Behind that action is the seemingly impossible war in Korea. And behind that struggle stands the fierce, implacable monster of the Soviet. As from a smoldering current of fear and misgivings, frustrating confusion and a thousand unanswered questions have risen. There is one basic question—why are we where we are?

We are where we are because the nations, as a whole, have rejected Christ. This answer appears to be extremely simple. It is that simple. Yet the failure to accept Christ, that is, His teachings, as proclaimed by His church, is the one big cause of the tragic chaos of today. Historically, the failure in a chain of causes and effects goes back for centuries. Even in our time, however, we have been the witnesses of how that failure has brought us to the door of disaster.

In February 1945 the big three met at Yalta. The meeting was held to plan the strategy for ending the war and building the peace of the world. Roosevelt was there. Churchill was there. Stalin was there. (Alger Hiss was there.) But Christ was not invited.

Mellow-voiced radio commentators and high-salaried newspaper columnists told the public how this great meeting was to lay the foundations for the future peace of the world. The leaders were called the Big Three because they were from the big powers and they were to accomplish big things. But what actually happened?

At the Yalta Conference, Poland (largely Catholic) was sold out to the armed atheism of the Soviet and the way was paved for the Communist domination of Eastern Europe and China. Now these eventualities are ascribed to political or diplomatic blunders. But basically it was all because Christ was not welcome at Yalta.

In July 1945 another big conference was held at Potsdam. Churchill was there. Atlee was there. Truman was there. Stalin was there. But Christ was not invited.

Again silver-tongued radio analysts and fast-writing columnists described the Potsdam meeting with shining words. How wonderful it was, they said in effect, for such powerful leaders to get together to plan the peace of the world. But what actually happened?

The Council of Foreign Ministers was formed at Potsdam. Representing the United States, Great Britain, Russia (and China and far-eastern questions), they were to meet to fashion the framework of peace. They met, remember, five times, and each meeting ended in bitter bickering. Some will say these are matters of international relations. But the real reason why the Potsdam plan failed was because Christ did not have a part in it.

The San Francisco Conference sat from April to June 1945. Representatives from 50 nations participated. But Christ was not invited to take part.

Self-appointed prophets of the air waves and last-word-on-anything newspaper scribes classified the formation of the United Nations as a powerful agency for guaranteeing the peace of the world. Fifty-one nations signed the pact of new union. But what actually happened.

The veto power was insisted on by the Soviet delegation and incorporated into the working program of the U. N. (Alger Hiss, remember, was one of the big wheels in the organization of the U. N.) Ever since the Soviet delegates have been using the veto power to cripple the effectiveness of the U. N. The U. N. is failing because from the start Christ was ignored.

Today there is excited debating and painful confusion all over the land. One faction says, "Bomb Manchuria because Red China is already in the war in Korea." Another says, "Confine the war in the Far East to Korea and concentrate on Europe because the Reds may strike there anytime." And millions of people are asking, "Do we know where we are going or what we are to do?"

All this time Stalin and his atheistic henchmen are laughing in secret. For a long time they planned and plotted to divide and confuse us. And now they are succeeding. Our leaders played games with the delegate of hell. The men from Moscow have led our diplomats and so-called statesmen into a snake pit—any way they move they get hurt (and we get hurt).

Many are deliberating over how we can get out of this mess. But we cannot stop effects from causes once set in motion. Our Nation as a whole has turned its back on Christ and now it must eat the bitter fruits in the chaos of hell that is upon us.

Merchant Marine Memorial

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the New York Times of Monday, April 23, 1951. Those of us who have had the opportunity of coming to know the great work done at the Maritime Academy will appreciate the importance to the Academy of the early construction of the chapel and we urge the friends of the Merchant Marine to assist as much as possible:

MERCHANT MARINE MEMORIAL

The United States merchant marine is one of the most useful but least lauded organizations for its military and peacetime service to its country. During the Second World War its members bravely faced the dangers of the seas to supply our embattled forces, following the traditions set down by merchant seafarers since the days of the American Revolution. Although many gave their lives to see that the supplies reached their destination, very few of their number have received the recognition bestowed on members of the military and naval services.

With the naming of John M. Franklin, president of the United States Lines, as chairman of the memorial chapel fund campaign of the United States Merchant Marine Academy, a forward step has been taken toward doing honor to these devoted men, of whom 6,000 officers and seamen and 212 cadet-midshipmen died keeping the supply lines open during the war. The planned memorial is an all-religion chapel to be constructed at the United States Merchant Marine Academy at Kings Point, Long Island.

This memorial is long overdue. Contributions for its construction may be mailed to memorial fund campaign, United States Merchant Marine Academy, Kings Point, N. Y.

Cards on Table

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an editorial which appeared in the East St. Louis (Ill.) Journal on Friday, April 20, 1951:

CARDS ON TABLE

Accorded the privilege of presenting his views before a joint session of Congress, General MacArthur acquitted himself with honor and skill.

There was no doubt that the general, who suddenly has become a violently controversial political figure, desired nothing more than to present his arguments to Congress so that the issue may be debated on its own merits.

He did so with conviction and without injecting any political side issues or using the occasion to stir a partisan frenzy.

The policy he presented was a strictly military policy. The administration believes such a policy is unwise at this time because we are not prepared for the eventuality of world war III.

General MacArthur's proposals make sense strategically so long as we are equipped to face the eventuality. The decision to push to the Manchurian border of Korea made sense strategically, too, but we were not equipped to face what happened—the direct intervention of Red China. General MacArthur's estimate of the situation had a great deal to do with the decision to push north.

It is as unreal to call the administration's policy appeasement as it is unreal to call MacArthur's policy warmongering. There is, however, the risk that the pursuit of MacArthur's policy will touch off world war III despite his belief that it won't. We are not prepared to handle both east and west aggression now. Eventually we will be, and it is entirely possible that administration policy can ease its present restrictions. Now, it must be geared to the eventuality and our ability to meet it, even though the Korean stalemate is a regrettable byproduct. The administration in no sense is abandoning the east, but it must be subordinated to global defense.

General MacArthur has given his side of the picture, the administration has given its side. The debate in Congress can now be held to those practical considerations. The general did his final job well. Now we can get on with the business at hand without emotion and partisanship.

Address by Kenneth Erickson, Youth Governor, State of Washington, Before Joint Session Hi Y Youth Legislature, Olympia, Wash., April 13, 1951

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY M. JACKSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the fourth annual YMCA Model Youth Legislature was held in Olympia, Wash., on April 13 and 14. The youth governor this year was Mr. Kenneth Erickson, of Puyallup, Wash. It is a very fine talk, and I am sure the Members of the House will be interested in reading it. The speech is as follows:

Mr. President and Mr. Speaker, Your Excellency Governor Langlie, State officials, my fellow colleagues in the Fourth Washington Youth Legislature, and friends, today we are meeting as the youth of a great Nation and a great State. We are the youth of the world's most progressive and strongest democracy. Yes; our democracy has gained momentum as each succeeding generation of youth has grown and matured to step into the shoes of their elders and take over the ever-increasing problems of national and State Government. Until now, with our generation nearing the threshold of adulthood and responsibility, the United States stands as the one stanch bolt in the door of freedom, straining to hold back the menace of a world threatened by sinister foreign influences.

It is during this struggle, both physical and psychological, that we meet in this legislature; during a time of national emergency, deficit spending, high taxes, and an economy disrupted by enormous defense and rearmament programs. As youth of this State then we have had a great honor bestowed upon us in that we have been given a chance to express our views freely in a State legislature of our own; a chance to use our youthful enthusiasm and optimism, undimmed by prejudice and political viewpoints, to find solutions to the many problems and dilemmas that are unsolved in our State at the present time.

The scope of our task is tremendous. The present National and State situations will hinder us greatly in our attempts to create better conditions in our State. Lack of funds, as you all know, is our main barrier, and it is my firm desire that you take this problem into careful consideration while studying any appropriation bill. In other words, a source of money will have to be found for any legislation which will require funds to enact and carry out. Furthermore it is my desire, and I am sure that it stands to reason, that we confine ourselves with major issues, and discourage any unimportant or otherwise frivolous legislation. The short span of time we have to work in makes this imperative and in the best interests of the success of our legislature.

In short let's use our heads and show the citizens of our State that they have an alert, and intelligent youth, capable in time to take over the real State legislature with integrity and good judgment.

Because time is short and we cannot hope to cover the entire field of wants and needs in our State in 2 days, I have chosen only three main issues which I would like to suggest and outline to you.

National emergency has already been mentioned, defense and rearmament have already been mentioned. They should be spoken of in another regard. Our State of Washington is as important an implement now in our Nation's defense and offense as it was during the Second World War. We are strategically located and within our borders are located some of the Nation's top war installations. Because of these conditions our State occupies a precarious position in case of attack. The science of devastation has made such terrific progress in the last few years that, until effective international controls assure safety, not one country on the earth is entirely safe from the lethal, vehement, and indescribably devastating blows that can be rent with atomic weapons. I have not said these things to scare you or unduly disturb you, but merely to wake you to action on a problem that these conditions bring about. The problem is civilian defense and it is a responsibility and a duty of this legislature to provide an adequate and suitable civilian-defense program. Yes, thousands of our citizen's lives may someday depend on our ability and foresight in providing sufficient protection from attack through a workable plan of civilian defense.

I would recommend for your careful consideration, legislation which would set up a civilian defense commission to be made up of members of the legislature and what technical help deemed necessary. The purpose of this commission would be to set up within our State adequate fire protection, medical aid, and above all a means of educating the public on what to do in case of an attack. Schools present a definite problem in the question of civilian defense. I encourage infinite care in the study of schools' defense problems, and believe me they have them. All students should be taught what to do in case of attack, and drill procedures should be practiced in each school. There is now published by the United States Defense Department a booklet entitled "Survival Under Atomic Attack," which could and should be either given to every student or explained to him carefully. A copy of this booklet should be in the home of every family in the State. Above all, a uniform and clearly defined signal system for caution, warning, and all clear should be set up throughout the State. Cooperation on a local basis will undoubtedly make this problem much easier to solve and is to be greatly encouraged. All in all, this challenge of civilian defense is one which will undoubtedly tax your mentality and knowledge to meet in an adequate manner, but it is a program that must be built strong in our State. We are a link in the Nation's chain of defense, and we owe it, not only to the people of our own State, but to the whole Nation, to be a strong link.

The solving of our defense problem is going to take funds and so it is imperative that you provide a source of revenue to cover the cost of this much-needed program. We have a source of revenue in our State that is providing us with much tax money at the present time, but which has not been developed to its fullest extent, in my opinion. Last year an estimated 2,500,00 tourists visited our State. This was an increase of over 20 percent from 1949. Through proper and intelligent planning this figure could be doubled in a few years. Proper development of our tourist trade could assure monetary changes in our State treasury through gas tax, sales tax, and other revenue paid by tourists who enter our State. We are not doing all we can to develop this important source of income. Actual tourist comments in the Washington Tourist Survey for 1950 made by the State College of Washington School of Economics and Business showed that we do not advertise enough. And may I pause long enough to congratulate the State College on a fine service they have rendered to the State in this survey. Many tourists came to Washington and thoroughly enjoyed it and left wondering why they did not see anything about Washington in national magazines. There is at the present time in our State, a State development agency, which supposedly handles the publicity of the Evergreen State. Yet not one major sportsman's magazine carries advertising concerning our State. Many States have active commissions in this regard and are profiting from them. Mount Rainier, a paradise of scenery for business-weary travelers; Grand Coulee Dam, largest man-made structure on the face of the earth; the beautiful Olympic Peninsula; the ever-interesting Inland Empire; Lake Chelan; Puget Sound, and many other spots of breath-taking beauty and primitive grandeur are located within our borders and afford us with a chance for development toward a profitable end.

I would recommend a complete reorganization of the present agency. This agency should be activated to advertise our State's scenic beauty in a way that would encourage a larger number of tourists. Information should be made readily available to anyone who should inquire concerning our State and careful consideration of the project, I feel, would be of a beneficial nature.

In our State constitution today there is one section which needs amending. Article VI, section I, of our constitution does not stand up to all our system of government should mean to our people. A democracy is supposed to be a government of, by, and for the people; a government of balanced rights and responsibilities. In my estimation, the fact that 18-year-olds cannot vote, which is a right, and yet fight for our country, which is a responsibility, produces an apparent contradiction to this fact. The educational development of our country also has developed to the point where the 21-year-old vote law now in effect is outmoded and unfair to a faction of our people.

There is nothing so magical about the number 21. We don't suddenly change and become intellectually and mentally capable to cast an intelligent ballot overnight. Rather it stands to reason that an 18-year-old, with his high-school course in civics still making an impression on his mind, would be a better voter than a person who, for 3 years, has been away from much contact with the real processes of elections and the qualities to look for in a candidate. An 18-year-old, if he started voting immediately after leaving high school, or even in his senior year in high school, would be more likely to keep on voting and keep his parents voting than a person who has had to start voting of his own accord when he reaches the present legal age of 21. Our schools could provide information concerning voting; how to register, qualifications for voting and other preliminaries to voting. Qualities of various candidates could be discussed in history and world problems classes on an undiscriminating level. Thus we would not only have an increased vote, but we would have a more intelligent vote.

The true unproportional distribution of rights and responsibilities, however, has been written in blood on the battlefields whenever the United States has gone to war in the last 32 years. Our principles are shaken whenever a soldier under 21 is made to fight and perhaps die for a democracy which has not even given him the prime privilege of a mature citizen, the voting privilege. I say if we are old enough to fight for the future of our country, we are old enough to vote for the future of our country.

These three issues do not even scratch the surface of the bills and ideas which will be presented for your approval or disapproval, but they give you an idea of what seem to me to be the major issues for your deliberation.

Efficiency, good judgment, common sense, and faith in God have made our country

Members of Congress have been saying so in a chorus for several days just as if General MacArthur, after 52 years of military service, did not know what was and was not a military order or instruction.

6. General MacArthur's summary dismissal was not recommended by any military man since it meant he was instantly relieved and not only could not say farewell to his troops but had no opportunity to turn over the complicated affairs of his command to a successor.

7. Not a single piece of evidence exists that General MacArthur failed to carry out the policies of the President and the Department of State in his post as Supreme Allied Commander in Japan. Though it wasn't necessary to relieve him of his command when General Ridgway was given command of U. N. operations in Korea, the President swept General MacArthur from all three of his posts and gave the impression that this action was based on the unanimous recommendation of the Joint Chiefs.

Small wonder that America is disunited. For, when military men are compelled to become the scapegoats in petty political blunders, respect for institutions of military importance can hardly be enhanced.

Suppression of News Versus Smothering of News

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOWARD H. BUFFETT

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, we live in a time of world-wide tension. Under these conditions, freedom of the press creates more than ever the responsibility to report important news fully and fairly.

A sample of the smothering of significant news has recently come to my attention. It concerns General Eisenhower's 3-week military mission to Europe early this year, which was extravagantly publicized, to say the least.

Yet the significant news that, when General Eisenhower was in Rome, the Pope declined to see him was smothered in the New York Times, which reported it, and not printed at all in most American papers. Obviously, the Pope was not willing to be even remotely identified with our new military intervention in Europe.

The New York Times buried this significant news deep in the middle of a column-long story under a different heading on page 11, January 19. The column follows:

EISENHOWER SIFTS ROME ARMS EFFORT—TWO DEAD AND SIXTY INJURED IN CLASHES DURING VISIT—RED MASS PROTESTS FAIL

(By Arnaldo Cortesi)

ROME, January 18.—Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower plunged today into his work of investigating Italy's will to fight if attacked and to contribute her share toward the common defense of the West against Soviet imperialism.

His mission being exploratory nothing that could by any stretch of the imagination be regarded as negotiations took place in the conversations that he had this morning with the Italian Cabinet and he limited his role almost exclusively to listening.

This evening after dedicating the rest of his working day to consultations with United States officials in Rome he had a store of data to guide his opinion on how intense the Italian rearmament effort was and how far it might be expected to develop in the future. His task in Rome is thus completed and he plans to leave by plane tomorrow morning for Luxemburg.

Two rioters were killed in clashes with the police during General Eisenhower's stay. One was killed yesterday at Adrano, near Catania, Sicily, and the other today at Comacchio, a poverty-stricken town at the mouth of the Po River. Sixty persons, including several policemen, were wounded or injured in these two places and in minor scuffles in Florence, Milan, Naples, and some smaller places.

ONE THOUSAND COMMUNISTS HELD

About 1,000 Communist activists were arrested or detained in various places. Scattered strikes of brief duration took place in many cities and towns throughout the country today. The day passed in comparative quiet, however, the Communists having abandoned their effort to arouse mass demonstrations against General Eisenhower's presence in Italy.

In Rome the Communist-dominated General Confederation of Labor held a peace meeting with police permission in an open-air, theater. Workers were supposed to abandon their jobs at 3:30 p. m. to attend, but all public services continued to run as usual.

Six or seven thousand workers turned up for the meeting but were easily outnumbered by the truly imposing police force that the authorities concentrated in the vicinity. The meeting broke up quietly after Giuseppe di Vittorio, Communist secretary general of the confederation, and other labor leaders had delivered speeches in favor of peace.

General Eisenhower started his day in Rome by calling on Premier Alcide de Gasperi. After a preliminary exchange of views lasting 40 minutes Foreign Minister Count Carlo Sforza, Defense Minister Randolfo Pacciardi and Treasury Minister Giuseppe Pella joined the session. The meeting went with considerable detail into the problems of rearmament and preparedness, with particular emphasis upon its economic and financial aspects.

TALK WITH MILITARY CHIEFS

General Eisenhower, who was accompanied by Maj. Gen. Alfred M. Gruenther, his chief of staff, and by Col. Vernon Walters, then conferred with Signor Pacciardi and the Italian chiefs of staff.

He paid a courtesy call on President Luigi Einaudi and later was the guest of honor at a luncheon given by Signor Pacciardi. The general spent the afternoon working with his staff in his hotel and dined with Ambassador James Clement Dunn. Other guests included leading members of General Eisenhower's mission and top United States Embassy, Economic Cooperation Administration and mutual defense assistance program officials in Rome.

General Eisenhower will leave without being received by the Pope. Vatican circles said that General Eisenhower let it be known that he would have been happy to present his respects to the Pontiff and that the Pope also wished to see him.

Later, however, the view prevailed that it was preferable for the Pope, who has never ceased to plead for peace and who considers himself outside and above all "earthly competitions," not to meet him.

NO INFORMATION ISSUED

No information was given either by the Italians or General Eisenhower on what was said in today's meetings. There is reason to believe, however, that in discussing the political aspects of the European rearmament the Italian Government reiterated its view that war was not imminent. It thinks that the West has 1 year to 18 months in which to rearm and that by the end of that time it may be strong enough to deter Russia.

The possible Soviet reaction to the rearmament of Western Germany is regarded by the Italian Government as a danger. Nevertheless, it favors the rearming of Germany, because otherwise it sees no possibility of defending Europe.

Both Italians and Americans emphasized the cordiality of today's conversations. That is not surprising since there are no fundamental points at issue. The Americans stress the necessity of speed. The Italians are willing to exert their maximum effort and to go as quickly and as far as the United States puts them in a position to go.

If Italy has any requests to make to the United States apart from aiding her rearmament effort they could be summarized as follows: To accelerate the dispatch of men and arms to Europe since these are regarded as essential morale builders, to use whatever troops Italy places at the disposal of an integrated European army for the defense of Italian soil since these are conditions under which they would give the best account of themselves and to extend European defense plans as soon as it is feasible to include Italy in the area that is to be defended in case of aggression.

DAV Warns of Repetition of the Economy Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter I have received from Mr. Francis M. Sullivan, national legislative director of the Disabled American Veterans, who calls the attention of Congress to the threat of another Economy Act:

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS,
Washington, D. C., April 6, 1951.

The Honorable EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MRS. ROGERS: We, of the Disabled American Veterans, are perturbed and somewhat alarmed by certain recommendations made to the Congress recently. The first report is that of the Committee on Federal Tax Policy, a nongovernmental group. The second is the report of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report, a congressional committee. Each contains recommendations or suggestions to abolish or curtail certain disabled veterans' benefits. Meantime, there are the various pertinent recommendations of the so-called Hoover Commission pending in the Congress.

The officers and members of our organization are mainly disturbed because some of the recommendations or suggestions are suspiciously similar to those of two decades ago when the vicious misnamed "Economy Act of 1933" was enacted.

The Committee on Federal Tax Policy labeled its report "A tax program for a solvent America." How much alike is this to the citation of the Economy Act, entitled, "An act to maintain the credit of the United great and have made our State great. Let us, then, in these next 2 days, use all four with equal fortitude and courage. And let us remember and consider this: In a few years we will no longer be the youth and will enjoy the carefree years no longer. We must learn now what is to be expected of us in the years to come. Preparedness will make our task much easier and will enhance our chance to find a solution to brotherhood among men under the fatherhood of God. Abraham Lincoln stated our problem with immortal beauty and simplicity when he said in his famous "house divided" speech, "If we could first know where we are, and whither we are tending, we could better judge what to do, and how to do it." Today Lincoln's statement still stands as a challenge of tomorrow, and it is our challenge for a better future. It is up to us. Why not start now?

The Importance of Rice in World Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, those who have traveled in the lands of the earth where rice constitutes the primary food for millions of people will appreciate the keen observations made by Mr. George E. Sokolsky and all as set forth in a form letter, "To our Distributors:" mailed by the Adolphus Rice Mills, Inc.

In view of present military activities and the proposal to effectuate a Pacific pact, it will be well for our people to obtain a better understanding of the great economic force which is involved in the little word, "rice."

Peoples who live on lower standards than ours do not vary their foods as we do. They eat with monotonous constancy almost the same food every day.

For instance, rice eaters are never satisfied with any other grain or even with a variety of meats and vegetables. Their basic food is rice and whatever they put on the rice is a side dish. This is true of millions of people in the east of Asia.

The rice line lies south of the Yellow River in China and it includes Korea, Japan, the Malay Peninsula, Burma, Siam, French Indochina, and areas of India. It might be possible in such a country as ours to eat cake instead of bread but a rice eater wants rice. Without it he starves. He might try wheat or millet but they do not serve him adequately. He craves rice even after a full meal.

The world production of rice is about 7,600,000,000 bushels and about 95 percent of it is produced in Asia. China never grew enough rice to meet the demands of her population.

It is just diplomatic trickery that, under such circumstances Soviet China offers to sell rice to India, risking the starvation of the people with the object of winning a propagandistic victory. It is a design for conquest at any cost. On the other hand, if Soviet China should conquer Burma or French Indochina or Thailand during the forthcoming summer, the offer of rice to India could be made with safety.

It is to be assumed, therefore that all the factors indicate that both for internal and diplomatic reasons, Soviet China must seek to increase its rice reserves as soon as possible, even if that means that pressures have to be put on neighboring countries, to the extent of conquering them.

Hindsight is of little advantage and these days usually ends in the loss of human life. The Burma, Thailand, French Indochina situation must inevitably lead to trouble as they are the granaries of surplus rice. It does not make sense to ignore this situation or to misunderstand it. We do not have to wait for another Korea, where we were caught without policy or purpose.

The Manchu dynasty, for instance, fell in 1911. This was preceded by unusually high imports of rice in 1902 and in every year following up to 1911. The import of the staple food of a country weakens that country's economy unless, as in the case of Great Britain, exports of products pay for the food. China obtained its additional rice from French Indochina, Thailand (Siam), and Burma.

If we translate this into current politics, it is essential to Communist China that that country have free access to the rice of these other Asiatic nations. If anti-Soviet countries interfere with the movement of rice from those countries to Soviet China, the lack of rice or the high price of rice could be the reason for revolutionary movements in China. A starving people blames its government for failure to provide food, and rebels.

As a matter of fact, much of the labor troubles in China, which preceded the Communist revolution of 1925, was over rice, and the escalator clause which Walter Reuther and General Motors think that they invented was introduced in China many years ago by the British-American Tobacco Co., whose wage scale was determined by the price of a picul (133 pounds) of rice. They found that rice was more important than money.

But it did not work, because inflationary prices knocked the props out from under all schemes and as the price of rice rose the discontent increased. Thus, Li Li-san, now in charge of Manchuria for Soviet Russia, was able to organize strikes in the Yangtze Valley and Shanghai in 1925 to pave the way for the victories of the armies led by Gen. Chiang Kai-shek and Gen. Galens-Bluecher, the Russian, who then was engaged in conquering China—an effort which failed when Chiang Kai-shek turned on the Russians and the Chinese Communists.

Rice is then the one commodity which is related to the politics of these Asiatic countries as it is the basis of their economic life. And Soviet China does not have enough rice to take care of the needs of the people.

Joint Chiefs of Staff on a Political Limb

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David Lawrence from the Washington Star of Monday, April 23, 1951:

JOINT CHIEFS ON A POLITICAL LIMB—WHITE HOUSE STATEMENTS ON GENERAL MACARTHUR'S DISMISSAL ARE IN VARIANCE WITH WHAT ACTUALLY HAPPENED

(By David Lawrence)

It's a new experience and a very uncomfortable one for the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff to be dragged into the center of a bitter political controversy.

There is, moreover, a serious discrepancy between what the White House has been saying officially—as to the unanimous recommendations of the Joint Chiefs in the MacArthur case—and what actually happened.

The first chapter—the initiative—in the controversy was the administration's sanction of a speech by General Bradley, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, last Wednesday in Chicago. This was the day before General MacArthur was due to present his case to a joint meeting of Congress. The big headline in the Wednesday afternoon papers was "General Bradley blasts MacArthur's views." The explanation offered for this advanced rebuttal was that General Bradley had for a long time scheduled the engagement and had to deliver the speech.

The general could as readily have talked about universal military training or something else unrelated to the MacArthur episode.

But once the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs spoke out it was natural that General MacArthur in his Thursday address should reveal that his own military recommendations had been approved in the past by the Joint Chiefs.

Not content with one blunder, the administration then went from the frying pan into the fire with another statement. This one, while issued at the Pentagon, was actually directed by the White House. It came immediately after General MacArthur's speech to Congress on Thursday and the full text of it reads as follows:

"In response to inquiries from the press concerning General MacArthur's reference to the Joint Chiefs of Staff, a Pentagon spokesman said the White House had authorized him to state that action taken by the President in relieving General MacArthur was based upon the unanimous recommendations of the President's principal civilian and military advisers including the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The reasons for General MacArthur's release have been stated previously by the President."

Now the foregoing gives the impression that General MacArthur's reference to the Joint Chiefs of Staff in his address to Congress had to do with his removal. Not a word of his address had any reference to that point. He merely outlined his own military recommendations about the prosecution of the war in Korea and stated that the Joint Chiefs had supported his proposals.

This latter point, therefore, the White House in its statement did not deny at all though a local paper headlined its frontpage article: "MacArthur says Joint Chiefs shared his views but Pentagon declares they favored ouster."

This was natural in view of the misleading official statement. For the White House declaration that the Joint Chiefs had unanimously recommended the President's action is a half truth.

The facts are these:

1. There was no meeting of the Joint Chiefs and no action of a formal nature taken by the Joint Chiefs.

2. There was a meeting in which civilians and military men met with the President who asked their views about the controversy and they generally felt that since Mr. Truman and General MacArthur differed in foreign policy there should be a replacement.

3. The timing of the replacement and the method of making the replacement was not agreed upon, this being left to the President to decide.

4. Some of those present at the meeting had their first news of what the President finally decided when they read the newspapers on Wednesday morning, April 18.

5. Not a single recommendation of a formal nature is in the record to show that the Joint Chiefs took cognizance of any military insubordination or preferred any such charge against General MacArthur. Yet ence than conditions warranted. When the blow-off finally came the only criticism we can offer is that it was so long coming.

Last August, on the occasion of General MacArthur's withdrawn message to the VFW convention, the News-Democrat commented:

"General MacArthur apparently has lost sight of the function for which he was hired. Definitely this is not to make or decide the official policy of the United States. His job is merely to help carry out whatever policy is set forth. MacArthur is not Commander in Chief, and although he's been in the service long enough to appreciate this difference, nevertheless he has asserted himself as a rookie."

To this we might add that ever since, he has behaved like a spoiled brat, ignoring the cardinal tenet of the military which is uncompromising obedience to the superior officer.

The headstrong tactics of projecting himself as a principal, responsible only to himself, has unquestionably wrought great harm to our cause. It revealed in MacArthur a streak of ineptness damaging to peace overtures and threatening to spread the Korean conflict into a full-scale world war.

Prior to Korea, MacArthur had generally acquitted ihmself as a competent, and sometimes brilliant, military leader. With his lengthy and well-rounded background in the Orient he should have been in a position to add counsel of inestimable value to this Nation, if tendered confidentially to his superiors.

If, then, an insurmountable conflict of views still persisted, an honorable alternative would have dictated the general's resignation from office and respectful withdrawal from the scene.

Had he chosen this course, General MacArthur's stature would have been enormously enhanced and his potency compounded.

As things turned out, the general has merely succeeded in fomenting a distasteful political tempest at home that can only serve eventually to lessen his evaluation in the eyes of his countrymen.

Missourians Score in National Poster Contest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article entitled "Missourians Score in National Poster Contest," taken from the Missouri Wildlife magazine, an official organ of the Conservation Federation of Missouri edited by Mr. Charles H. Callison:

MISSOURIANS SCORE IN NATIONAL POSTER CONTEST

A Missouri boy, Donald Fleming, of Ritenour High School, Overland, was awarded first prize of $250 in the annual conservation poster contest sponsored by the National Wildlife Federation. Donald's poster was adjudged best among nearly a thousand entries from all over the country in the senior high school division.

A Missouri girl, 12-year-old Margie Bussinger of Carthage, won honorable mention and a $10 prize in the junior high school division of the national contest.

Judges for the contest were Walter Weber, noted nature artist attached to the staff of the National Geographic magazine; Albert M. Day, director of the United States Fish and Wildlife Service; and Dr. William Mann, curator of the National Zoological Park in Washington, D. C.

Last fall the executive secretary of the Conservation Federation of Missouri served notice on the national federation that Missouri was going after some of the poster prizes. All chapters were supplied with information about the contest and urged to encourage local entries. Several of them did, and found the poster contest an excellent project through which to stimulate community interest in conservation.

Margie Bussinger, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Bussinger and an eighth grade student at Mark Twain school in Carthage, won first prize in a local competition sponsored by the Carthage Sportsman's Protective League. Prizes of $15, $10, and $5 were awarded in the Carthage contest. The winning entries were then forwarded to Washington for the national competition.

Bob Esterly, president of the Carthage league, said plans have been adopted to secure a large participation next year, particularly among the rural schools.

An Authentic, Documented Statement on the MacArthur-Truman Controversy by the World War II Chief of United States Propaganda Warfare Against Japan and on Behalf of Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN T. WOOD

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. WOOD of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, the Congress of the United States is the last hope of this Republic. Despite the fact that the Congress has abjectly surrendered to the administrative branch of the Government much of the authority vested in it by the Constitution, the Congress still has the power and the responsibility to maintain our constitutional form of government and repudiate those who would surrender our national sovereignty to a totalitarian state in which we would be outnumbered 15 to 1 and outvoted 59 to 1, as we now are in the United Nations.

Knowledge is power, and the Good Book says, "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free"; but if, because of prejudice or partisanship, we close our minds to the truth, we are in a fair way of losing our liberties.

Jonathan Swift stated an everlasting truth when he said, "There is none so blind as they that won't see." And I implore my colleagues, particularly the members of the Armed Services Committees, to read with open minds, the following documented statement by my good friend, Clay Osborne, World War II chief of United States propaganda against Japan and on behalf of Korea, so that they may understand more clearly our foreign policy which has brought us dangerously close to world war III:

THE MACARTHUR-TRUMAN CONTROVERSY—WHY?

(By Clay Osborne)

The purge of General of the Army Douglas MacArthur by the President of the United States raises two questions of utmost gravity to the people of the United States.

One question involves the motives and aims of Harry S. Truman and his administration in committing an act unprecedented in American experience. Never, from the time of George Washington until now, has any American President exercised authority as Commander in Chief to remove from any field of battle any top American general:

Whose career and record have been unblemished by failure, incompetence, treason, or personal aggrandizement.

Whose patriotism and personal integrity have been unquestioned even by his critics and enemies.

Whose leadership in the field and whose skill as a military tactician and strategist are unsurpassed in American annals.

Who has been recognized by enemies of America as their No. 1 foe.

Who has under the most perilous and disadvantageous circumstances consistently transformed military disasters into unprecedented American victories by the genius and inspiration of his command.

Who has enjoyed the confidence of the American people at home and of their fighting forces in the field.

Who has been universally recognized as a foremost world authority on both the military and political problems of his areas of command.

And who has throughout a long lifetime and useful career unfailingly and unyieldingly placed the interests and security of the United States above all other considerations—who has unfailingly and unyieldingly never compromised in any matter or challenge involving honor, integrity, and allegiance to the people of the United States and their Constitution comprising the highest authority of law and government.

When any attempt by anyone to render voiceless, and indeed to attempt to discredit, an American leader of General MacArthur's caliber is made, there is compelling challenge to the American people to try to find out why.

MOTIVES AND AIMS OF GENERAL MACARTHUR

The second question raised involves the motives and aims of Gen. Douglas MacArthur. Here has been one of the greatest of all American generals honored and respected by his own people—and even by his once-bitterest enemies, the conquered Japanese—to a degree unsurpassed in either American or world history.

At 71 years of age this exemplary American patriot might well have rested content with laurels of achievement far beyond the most extreme expectations of his youth. He might then have been secure in position guaranteeing ease and comfort to himself and his family during remaining years. He then would have been certain that the name "MacArthur" perpetually would be engraved in the hearts of his grateful countrymen and their posterity, and forever enshrined among the great of the earth.

What have been the motives requiring him to risk the damnation of his superiors; to dare the wrath of self-styled politicians; and to place in hazard his life, his fortune, and his sacred honor effectively to defy those who have tried to silence him?

In this hour of established real and present danger there can be no challenge more compelling to every American than to try to understand why.

Examination of some basic evidence in the record of the past 5½ years may enlighten us.

One explanation of the MacArthur conduct is implicit in his oath as a soldier of the United States. Accepting responsibility he vowed, in part:

"I solemnly swear * * * to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies foreign and domestic * * * so help me God."

Nowhere in the soldier's oath is to be found even implication of unquestioning loyalty

States." This infamous measure was passed by the Congress with comparatively little consideration and with solemn promises that the disabled veteran and survivors of deceased veterans would not be affected. Within a few months, however, its horrifying results became evident and during the next several years the Congress found it necessary to repeal many of its features. These are so well known they need not be noted herein.

One suggestion in both reports is that all plans for the present Veterans' Administration hospital-construction program be suspended. With this Nation now engaged in the Korean war and seemingly on the verge of world war III, those advisory staffs and researchers responsible for this recommendation should go to some of the Pacific coast ports and meet the hospital ships now returning American war casualties to their homeland. It might be well also for them to visit some of the service and veteran hospitals and meet hospitalized veterans there. Incidentally, these include some of the same service hospitals which only last April were ordered closed in the name of economy.

Other suggestions and recommendations are outlined in the two reports. Explanation of them in this letter would require too much of your time.

The DAV has not objected to any humanitarian project requiring the spending of billions of American dollars and resources abroad, but we do point out these expenditures have increased the inflationary trend and that some of this aid is expended upon former armed enemies of American veterans, with the latter now in danger of another economy act in their own country.

The members of this organization are taxpayers. Their patriotism has been proved. We are as anxious as members of the Committee on Federal Tax Policy to combat inflation. Only recently we vigorously supported the House version of H. R. 1, Eighty-second Congress, because it would provide universal indemnity coverage and, at the same time, we were reliably informed that it would have saved millions of dollars. We desire economy in Government, but we do not desire a repetition of the Economy Act of 1933 at the expense of disabled veterans and of widows and orphans.

It is doubtful if a modern economy act will be a one-package measure. In all likelihood it will be advanced piecemeal and necessarily come from many congressional committees. Therefore, we of the DAV implore you to observe and study each measure before your committees and on the floor to make certain disabled veterans and survivors of deceased veterans will be protected.

The officers and members of this organization will appreciate any consideration you may give to this most important subject.

FRANCIS M. SULLIVAN,
National Legislative Director.

Nation-Wide Freedom Day Movement Will Be Launched in Chrisman, Ill., May 4, 1951

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. JENISON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. JENISON. Mr. Speaker, a grass-roots expression of public sentiment against Government controls over the press, radio, and our other freedoms will be demonstrated in Chrisman, Ill., in the congressional district I have the honor to represent, on Friday evening, May 4, 1951. Because it is hoped that the idea may find national acceptance and spread to other communities across the Nation where similar demonstrations may take place, I am calling it to the attention of my colleagues under permission granted by the House.

Stanley R. Kent, editor and publisher of the Chrisman Weekly Courier and chairman of publicity for the program, has announced detailed plans for the event, which is said to be the first such public meeting of its kind in the United States. To provide a clear picture of the scope of the undertaking, I include in the RECORD the announcement of the program as carried in the Chrisman Courier in its issue of April 12, 1951. The article follows:

NATION-WIDE FREEDOM DAY MOVEMENT WILL BE LAUNCHED IN CHRISMAN ON MAY 4 WITH PUBLIC MASS MEETING IN NEW GYM—SPONSORED BY LOCAL LEGION POST, COMMERCIAL CLUB, AND LIONS CLUB

Extensive plans are now under way for the launching of a Freedom Day movement in Chrisman on Friday, May 4, from which may stem a national expression of public sentiment against governmental controls of press, speech, radio, and the other freedoms that Americans take for granted.

The Freedom Day movement will be launched in the form of a public mass meeting that will be held in the new Chrisman gymnasium, with a seating capacity of more than 2,000 people. The meeting will start at 8 p. m.

It will be the first such public meeting of its kind in the United States, and will be the first grass roots expression of opposition to governmental regulations, particularly in its apparent effort to control a free press and a free radio.

Newspapers all over America flew their flags at half-mast last week, in mourning for the newspaper La Prensa that was confiscated by the Argentine Government. This was the first invasion by a totalitarian government against the free press in the Western Hemisphere.

The same thing could happen in the United States unless the people are awakened to the fact that their liberties are being threatened by governmental regulations.

The Freedom Day movement is being inaugurated in Chrisman through the combined efforts of the Chrisman American Legion Post, No. 477; the Chrisman Commercial Club; and the Chrisman Lions Club, with the idea of attracting Nation-wide attention.

The suggestion for a freedom day came from various national organizations and individuals who believe that action by the American people should start in a typical small American town. Chrisman has been selected and designated as the typical small American town for the start of such concerted action.

Principal speaker for the freedom-day meeting in Chrisman on May 4 will be Charles Allen Crowder, publisher and editor of the Flora Sentinel at Flora, Ill., who has consented to speak here in the interest of preserving a free press in America.

Mr. Crowder and the Flora Sentinel were the targets of pressure groups who tried to boycott and suppress the Sentinel in 1949 because of the newspaper's presentation of both sides of a labor controversy in the city of Flora. The bitter fighting over the issue brought Nation-wide attention when six of the opposition leaders bought a note and mortgage against the Sentinel and sought to destroy the newspaper. The freedom-of-the-press battle was won when labor unions rallied to the defense of the Sentinel and Mr. Crowder, and the newspaper was saved from the auction block by the loan of $12,000 from an investment-banking firm in Washington, D. C.

Members of the general committee in charge of arrangements for the meeting are Nash C. Breen, commander of the Chrisman Legion Post; Harry E. Haworth, president of the Lions Club; Harold McGlosson, president of the Commercial Club; D. E. Bradley and Stanley R. Kent.

The Freedom Day meeting is entirely nonpolitical and nonsectarian, and is open to the general public. There will be no admission charge. All expenses will be borne by the three local sponsoring organizations.

Invitations to the May 4 meeting are being extended to Vernon L. Nickell, State superintendent of public instruction; United States Senators Paul Douglas and Everett M. Dirksen; Edward H. Jenison, Congressman from the Twenty-third District; W. O. Edwards, M. R. (Bob) Walker, and John P. Meyer, State representatives from this district; William E. Wayland, State senator from this district; and many other dignitaries.

Arrangements are also being made to have represenatives of press associations, radio stations, and daily and weekly newspapers present at this meeting. An effort is also being made to get writers and photographers from Time, Life, and Saturday Evening Post to be present at the Chrisman meeting.

Radio station WLBH at Mattoon has already made arrangements to send a tape recorder to Chrisman to record the activities of the May 4 Freedom Day meeting. This recording will be rebroadcast on the air at a later date.

Local ministers will also participate in the program, and the Chrisman school band will play several patriotic selections during the program.

MacArthur Blow-Off

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an editorial which appeared in the Belleville (Ill.) News-Democrat of April 12, 1951, which follows:

MACARTHUR BLOW-OFF

Congressional admirers of Gen. Douglas MacArthur have pounced upon his dramatic ouster as Supreme Allied Commander in the Far East as political fodder, which it certainly is not.

The firing of the general, in fact, reflects a legitimate exercise of necessary action and sound executive common sense by the President of the United States.

We have been considerably less than enthusiastic over many of President Truman's policies and performances, but in this instance we do not question the rightness of his judgment.

Had there been any compromise of principle or lack of decision in the light of General MacArthur's continuing and flagrant insubordination, President Truman would have been grossly remiss in the exercise of his plain duty.

Firing MacArthur was no error of judgment on Mr. Truman's part, as is now charged by many Republican congressional leaders.

Throughout his dealings with his prima donna commander in the Far East, Mr. Truman has shown far more patience and defer-to his Commander in Chief. MacArthur swore a higher loyalty—to the people of the United States who are the government of freemen under the Constitution.

PRESIDENT'S PURGE ANNOUNCEMENT

When the President asserted in his purge announcement of last Wednesday:

"I have concluded that General of the Army Douglas MacArthur is unable to give his wholehearted support to the policies of the United States Government and the United Nations."

Mr. Truman stated a fact which has divided MacArthur from the administration and U. N. policy makers throughout the past 5½ years. MacArthur clashed with his political superiors in matters affecting the security of the United States and of the freedom-loving world even before the actual occupation of Japan and Korea after VJ-day.

Some days prior to the occupation of Korea by either American or Soviet forces, in late August 1945, the Japanese throughout Korea surrendered to Korean underground leaders. Immediately thereafter Korea-wide elections were conducted by and among the Korean people themselves in more than 600 of the principal cities, towns, and villages. By this means a provisional government of liberated Korea was established, temporarily headed by the beloved Korean patriot, Lyuh Heung. The post of chairman was left open for acceptance by the venerable Syngman Rhee when he might arrive from the United States—honoring him for his long fight in exile for a free and independent Korea, and recognizing his wartime service to that nation as head of the Korean Commission in Washington, D. C., and leader of all exiled Koreans—except the Communists—in America and on the Asiatic mainland.

There were at that time no Communists of any consequence in Korea, for they had been exterminated or driven to join the guerrilla bands of Chinese Communists. One of Japan's aims was to destroy communism utterly.

STATE DEPARTMENT IGNORES ESTABLISHED KOREAN GOVERNMENT

Washington's instructions—both political and military—were to ignore the government established by the Koreans, and pressure was brought to bear upon Syngman Rhee not to accept the chairmanship of the provisional government. MacArthur was directed to arrange for the second "surrender" of Japanese north of the thirty-eighth parallel to Russians and south of the thirty-eighth parallel to Americans.

MacArthur protested both these decisions—and the later agreement of the Big Three Foreign Ministers' meeting at Moscow, in December 1945, to preserve the thirty-eighth-parallel line of demarcation between Soviet and American forces of occupation—without avail. He was compelled to obey orders.

The policy of the American Government at that time was not to recognize a government freely chosen by the Korean people themselves and to sponsor division of Korea into two zones of occupation. The northern zone, source and center of practically all power, manufacturing, and industrial capacity of Korea, was handed over to the Russians with signed and secret agreements even before the Soviet forces had crossed the Yalu River from Manchuria.

Prior to actual occupation, there had been American political agreement with the Russians at Yalta and Potsdam to reward Russia's entry into the war against Japan by giving the Soviets control of the three northeastern provinces of free China; concessions at the ice-free port of Harbin; control of the Chinese Eastern Railway; the outright gift of the strategically vital Kuriles, Sakhalin and other islands immediately north of Japan—and suzerainty over the northern half of liberated Korea, which had categorically been promised complete freedom and independence by the official propaganda of the United States directed throughout the Far East during the most critical stages of World War II.

Whether or not such policies of the United States Government ought to have been protested by all right-thinking and decent men in 1945 may be made clear to you by information which at that time was classified as secret. This information is now extremely important to understanding by Americans of the controversy between General MacArthur and the President.

G–2 (MILITARY INTELLIGENCE) REPORT

Before he died, President Franklin D. Roosevelt became suspicious of the aims and motives of the leaders of the Soviet Union, and particularly of the activities of the Communist International on the mainland of Asia. For his information, and for the guidance of the State Department and other top-level agencies of the Government, the Military Intelligence Division of the United States War Department undertook an exhaustive study of communism in the Far East.

In final form, this G–2 report was over 100,000 words in length.

It was delivered to the White House, the State Department, and to top commanders of the United States Army, Air Force, and Navy in all the principal theaters of war under date of July 5, 1945.

It was signed by Gen. P. E. Peabody, Chief, Military Intelligence Service. It was entitled "The Chinese Communist Movement." I have a copy of it before me as I speak.

I read to you the exact text of the five fundamental conclusions of this then secret but since declassified intelligence report:

"Careful study of all materials available and examination of over 2,500 documents and reports has led to a number of basic conclusions. * * * The most important conclusions may be summarized as follows:

"(1) The 'democracy' of the Chinese Communists is Soviet democracy.

"(2) The Chinese Communist movement is part of the international Communist movement, sponsored and guided by Moscow.

"(3) There is reason to believe that Soviet Russia plans to create Russian-dominated areas in Manchuria, Korea, and probably north China.

"(4) A strong and stable China cannot exist without the natural resources of Manchuria and north China.

"(5) In order to prevent the separation of Manchuria and north China from China, it is essential that, if Soviet Russia participates in the war, China not be divided (like Europe) into American-British and Russian zones of military operations and occupation."

There are these further conclusions set forth with extensive and detailed authentication in the body of that G–2 report:

"Throughout their history the Chinese Communists have loyally supported and followed the policies of Soviet Russia and have accepted the whole content of Marxism-Leninism-Stalinism.

"Contrary to the widely-advertised reports of their sympathizers, the Chinese Communists have fought the Japanese far less than have the National Government troops (of Chiang Kai-shek).

"The Generalissimo and his followers have yielded ground politically and militarily to the Communists in order to avoid an open break; as a Nationalist, Chiang Kai-shek has been primarily interested in the war against Japan."

ADMINISTRATION IGNORES INTELLIGENCE REPORT

And here, Americans, is really a punch-line in this intelligence report:

"The type of peace we shall gain by our victory over Japan depends on our success in aiding the Chinese to regain complete independence * * * for China is the center of the Far East; political, economic and military relationships in the Far East have always revolved around China. Russia became one of the leading world powers by acquiring vast regions from China. * * * Russia's growth as a far-eastern power has depended greatly upon its success in extending its influence in China."

Those are exact quotes from this military intelligence report dated July 5, 1945. It was completed too late to confirm President Roosevelt's own suspicions about the aims of the Communists. But it was delivered to Harry S. Truman and the State Department, as well as to General MacArthur's headquarters:

Nearly 3 weeks before the American appeasement at Potsdam.

Nearly 1 month before the 5-day war of the Russians against Japan, during which the third-rate remnants of the Kwantung Army of the Japanese in Manchuria offered practically no resistance.

Nearly 40 days before the delivery to the Russians of Northern Korea and northern China itself.

It is impossible to overemphasize the importance of these documented facts of record in this particular hour of confusing political propaganda.

Had they been heeded by the President of the United States and the American State Department 5½ years ago in July 1945, there would never have been:

A division of Korea at the thirty-eighth parallel;

An establishment of the Communist Kim Il Sung government in northern Korea, and the infiltration of Korea by the Communists;

Southern Korea would today not be shattered, and a shambles of wrecked cities, destroyed agriculture, with more than 1,000,000 South Korean dead;

China itself would be a great power in the Far East friendly to the United States under that government which we still recognize as the legal representative of more than 400,000,000 Chinese on the mainland, as well as on Formosa;

Russia and the International would not today have the power to cause internal strife in Indochina, Malaya, Indonesia, Korea, and the Philippines, as well as to pose a threat to the internal stability of Japan now that MacArthur is rendered impotent;

Nor would billions of our money be required to finance what Mr. Truman previously has labelled a police action, but which he termed, tonight, for the first time, a war;

Most important of all, there would not today be some 60,000 American dead, missing, and wounded fighting to correct political decisions made contrary to 5-year-old military knowledge.

Despite information and facts made available to the President of the United States in July 1945—the mass of which was not by any means confined to this single G–2 report—there have been more than 5 years of top-level political decisions and unilateral and secret enunciations of American policies which have month-by-month given the Russians and world Communists more power, with a corresponding decrease in the military and political effectiveness of the American people.

FANTASY BORDERING ON IDIOCY

It ought to be clear to anyone possessing common sense that to speak of political decisions in the international arena as something entirely separable and apart from military decisions is fantasy bordering on idiocy. Russian military and political decisions and policies are inseparable: the one implements or complements the other. And the unsupported United States Government propaganda of these most critical years proclaiming a chain of political victories in the so-called cold war comprise a long series of genuine military disasters for the United States and the free world when appraised by the yardstick of the record itself.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

On VE-day in 1945, Russia was in no military or political position to compel any nation to her will. British-American power was overwhelming in both the military and political sense.

Yet during the years since then, Russia has acquired domination of more than 40 percent of the world's peoples. Beginning with Estonia and reaching a high-water mark recently in Tibet, the Communists have overrun 21 formerly independent nations. It was not possible for Russia to realize this tremendous expansion by her own effort alone.

It was largely the fantastic sums of money—$19,000,000,000 provided by the United States and Great Britain and never recovered at even 10 cents on the dollar—the mountains of matériel freely given by American appeasers and raped from every territory occupied by the Soviets, and the American policy of granting Russia anything demanded that, the record shows, was responsible.

INCREDIBLE RUSSIAN DEMANDS AND AMERICAN APPEASEMENTS

The incredible extremes of such Russian demands and American appeasements is documented in the single example of a startling disclosure by the United Press, datelined Washington, August 6, 1947: I have this before me and I read it to you verbatim:

"Sledge-hammer diplomacy by Soviet Foreign Minister Molotov and his Deputy, Andrei A. Gromyko, forced reluctant United States Cabinet officers in 1944 to turn over to Russia the American plates for printing German occupation currency, it was revealed tonight by secret records gathered from the files of the State, War, and Treasury Departments and made available by the Senate Appropriations Committee.

"The documents show that Gen. George Marshall, then Chief of Staff, compelled Director A. W. Hall, of the United States Bureau of Printing and Engraving, to give the Russians the master plates, inks, paper, and know-how for printing this currency."

That is the end of the direct quotation. The files of the leading American news services contain additional facts uncovered during the years 1947 and 1948. Among the most important of these is the established fact that American taxpayers redeemed—via the medium of their occupation authorities in Berlin—more than $500,000,000 of this worthless currency up to 1947. There is considerable evidence that this diplomatic triumph of the Washington international policy makers cost Americans in excess of $1,000,000,000 before the occupation reichsmarks were replaced, in 1948, with the new Deutschemarks, and the unlimited and never-accounted-for printing by the Russians at American expense finally halted, after 4 years of unrestricted counterfeiting legalized by the United States Government.

Had Gen. Douglas MacArthur been guilty of this kind of a "deal" with the Russians or Communists in the Far East, he would have been labelled a traitor, court-martialed, and expelled from the service in disgrace.

On November 24, 1947, 12 former Ambassadors of the United States telegraphed the chairman of the Foregin Relations Committee as follows, and I quote:

"We, the undersigned former Ambassadors of the United States, believing that the vital interests of our country would be gravely menaced if China should fall under the domination of the Soviet Union, urge you most strongly to give essential military equipment and economic and financial aid to the Chinese Government.

"F. Lamont Belin, William C. Bullit, William M. Collier, Josephus Daniels, Wesley Frost, James W. Gerard, Boaz Long, Lithgow Osborne, William Phillips, Robert P. Skinner, William H. Standley, Alexander W. Weddel."

STATE DEPARTMENT PURGED FAR EAST EXPERTS

But by 1947, unfortunately for Americans, the leading authority on Japan and Korea, Mr. Eugene Dooman, and our greatest authority on the entire Far East, Dr. Stanley Hornbeck, had been purged by those in control of the State Department, and altogether excluded and silenced in the policies of American affairs in the world.

Despite the recommendations of the unquestionably patriotic American experts on the Far East, and directly contrary to the information and documentation supplied to the White House and the State Department in 1945 by top-level military authorities, the President according to his own statement of record caused the issuance of an ultimatum to Chiang Kai-shek that he would either take the Communists into his Government or else.

In the summer of 1946 Henry Wallace, accompanied by Owen Lattimore, were sent to China allegedly to gather the facts about the Chinese political situation and to report them to the President. The facts, of course, had already been supplied Mr. Truman a year earlier. But Mr. Truman's decision was based upon the prejudice of those who hated Chiang Kai-shek, rather than upon the knowledge of others who neither loved nor hated Chiang but instead thought in terms of what was best for the United States.

ULTIMATUM TO CHIANG KAI-SHEK

The ultimatum delivered to Chiang Kai-shek was documented in the report of January 7, 1947 by, Gen. George C. Marshall—the same policy maker reported by United Press to have caused the American currency plates to be given to the Russians. I now read to you verbatim some choice extracts from General Marshall's report:

"The greatest obstacle to peace has been the complete, almost overwhelming suspicion with which the Chinese Communist Party and the Kuomintang (Nationalist People's Party) regard each other.

"On the one hand, the leaders of the Government are strongly opposed to a communistic form of government. On the other, the Communists frankly state that they are Marxists and intend to work toward establishing a communistic form of government in China."

To depart from the text a moment, I have emphasized some of these words for the reason that they coincide exactly with the conclusions of the secret military intelligence report issued a year and a half earlier.

Continuing General Marshall's text:

"On the side of the Nationalist Government (of China) * * * there is a dominant group of reactionaries who have been opposed, in my opinion, to almost every effort I have made to influence the formation of a genuine coalition government. They were quite frank in stating their belief that cooperation by the Chinese Communist Party in the government was inconceivable.

"On the side of the Chinese Communist Party there are, I believe, liberals as well as radicals * * * it has appeared to me that there is a definite liberal group among the Communists in disgust at the corruption evident in the local governments—men who would put the interests of the Chinese people above ruthless measures to establish a Communist ideology in the immediate future."

To depart again for a moment from this text, I add the personal observation that at no time in the allegedly corrupt local governments of China has there ever been graft and treasonably criminal activities on the scale of that quite recently reported in the American press about some of our own States, and that never during the so-called corrupt regime of Chiang Kai-shek has there ever been betrayal of the people's interests on a scale comparable to the very recent disclosures of the Nation-wide crime syndicate and in exposure of theft of the people's money in investigation of Reconstruction Finance Corporation operations. Also, that for every air-conditioning unit supposed to have been appropriated from UNRRA supplies by Chinese Nationalist officials, there has been a corresponding deep-freeze unit for officials of the United States Government and a mink coat or the equivalent for their employees.

There is the added personal opinion—well documented by news files of the past 5 years—that the so-called one-party rule of Chiang's Kuomintang in China was never more unilateral in making political and military decisions than has been the dominant Truman-Boyle-Acheson direction of our own domestic and foreign affairs without consultation in advance with leaders of the opposition parties.

FINAL BETRAYAL OF WONDERFUL WARTIME ALLY

Comes now the clincher in the January 7, 1947, statement to the American people by General Marshal. I quote:

"The salvation of the situation, as I see it, would be the assumption of leadership by the liberals in the government and in the minority parties.

"If the termination of one-party rule is to be a reality, the Kuomintang should cease to receive financial support from the (United States) Government."

In short, after saying that there were true liberals among the Communists; that the Communists were dedicated to arousing hatred against Americans; that their aim was just as much one-party Communist rule of China as that then being exercised by the reactionaries of Chiang Kai-shek's party, the United States Government declared that Chiang would either have to embrace the Communists and communism or else be deprived of all assistance of Americans.

This ultimatum was delivered, incidentally, after General Marshall had informed the President that the Chinese Communists were counting on an economic collapse of the Chiang Kai-shek government.

It was, of course, powerful diplomacy and highly decirable military tactics and strategy to hasten the economic chaos already threatening the security of the wonderful wartime ally that for three highly critical years had kept the Japanese bogged down in China itself.

For all these and many more reasons, it is not opinion but rather fact of record that the policy of what Generalissimo Truman calls the United States Government between 1945 and 1948, when the Communists began to overrun all of China.

1. To withhold from the legal Nationalist Government, aid, financial and otherwise, even after it had been voted by the American Congress.

2. To assist the Chinese Communists by deliveries to them in Manchuria and Mongolia of UNRRA relief and supplies.

3. To sanction without protest delivery to the Chinese Communists by the Russians of enormous stocks of Japanese guns, equipment and ammunition, as well as transport manufactured in the United States of America and lend-leased to Russia, which had been seized by the Soviets when they poured into Manchuria.

4. To assist the Russians via previously secret, top-level "political decisions" in acquiring control of Manchuria and North China as well as Inner and Outer Mongolia, and in addition to Northern Korea and the strategic islands north of Japan.

5. To undermine the stability of the Chinese Nationalist Government by withholding economic and other aid declared by our military authorities to be essential to the survival of this friendly power, and thus implementing the known aims of the Communists by hastening the collapse of the Nationalists.

PATRIOTIC AMERICANS MUZZLED AND DISCREDITED

General Wedemeyer, whose report was kept from the American people by the President and excluded from the white paper on China by the State Department, and General MacArthur both repeatedly protested the folly of diplomacy certain to have disastrous effects upon the military and economic future of the United States in Asia.

But these patriots—and every other critic of the pro-Communist American policies in the Far East—have been muzzled year by year and discredited by enormous volumes of distorted facts and propaganda issued to the American people throughout the past 5½ years by the liberals in our own Government.

In 1948 the House of Representatives Committee on Foreign Affairs issued a report entitled "The Strategy and Tactics of World Communism." This was an exhaustive study comprised of more than 300 pages of careful documentation and analysis of the aims of the Soviet Union and of the Communist International as they had been expressed by their own most important leaders.

I have this report before me: House Document No. 619, published by the United States Government Printing Office in 1948.

Among other findings of this study are the following, which I read verbatim from the text:

"Lenin proclaimed the dictum: 'Some day we shall compel the United States to spend itself into bankruptcy.'

"Stalin in 1927 said: 'Our war against capitalism is inevitable.'

"Stalin in 1938 said: 'The Communist world and the capitalist world cannot coexist on the same planet.'

"Stalin in February 1946 said: 'War until the death of capitalism is our aim.'

"Stalin in September 1947 said: 'Wars are instigated only by the capitalists and imperialists * * * they must be destroyed before there can be peace.'

"Andrei Vishinsky said to the U. N. September 18, 1947: 'The United States is the leading world enemy.'

"In the same month Zhdanov said: 'The United States and capitalism are the real enemies of the Communists and Russia * * * they can be exterminated only by war.'"

The conclusion of this House Committee on Foreign Affairs, FRANCES P. BOLTON, of Ohio, chairman, may be summarized in this single sentence:

"The Communists do not believe in peace, and that their hopes are only for chaos and dictatorship must be clearly seen by all Americans."

Therein are stated both the political and military policies of the Soviet Union and of the Communist International guided and controlled by Moscow. Beginning as long ago as the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk, in 1918, and unvarying throughout all the years since, the statements of these aims by Soviet leaders and their satellites consistently have made unmistakable the intent of the world Communists to kill everything we regard as decent and right and just on earth—from the spiritual conception of the Almighty to the idea of individual rights and freedom.

These year-by-year statements comprise Soviet directives as clearly stated as were the Nazi directives in Hitler's Mein Kampf and the Tojo directives first enunciated by Baron Giichi Tanaka in his notorious memorial.

After the clarification of these Soviet aims by military intelligence in 1945, and after the compilation of world Communist strategy and tactics by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs in 1948, the counterpolicy of the United States was fondly being announced by Generalissimo Truman in these, which are his own words:

"Joe Stalin * * * you know, I kinda like good, old Joe."

UNITED STATES OPENLY INSULTED AND PILOTS MURDERED

One year ago this month Soviet fliers shot down out of the free skies of the Baltic an unarmed American plane, killing all on board. Stalin himself awarded those Red fliers the highest decoration of the Soviet Union. On April 13 the Soviet Government proclaimed to the world "We have given the brazen, imperialistic, spying Americans a lesson they won't forget." Russia ignored American protests; refused to pay indemnity; openly insulted the United States of America.

One month after this destruction of United States prestige throughout the world, the President of the United States declared: "I think we are now nearer peace than at any time."

It might be well for Americans to remember who has been responsible for ignoring the demands of both his own experts and of the Congress for a minimum of 80 Air Force groups between 1948 and Korea; who caused the disappearance of the American merchant marine from the seas of the world; who has spent more money than all of the preceding Presidents put together in the name of obtaining peace on earth, and at the same time destroyed the capacity of the United States even to defend itself.

Secretary of Defense George Marshall this week has stated that the armed might of the United States simply did not exist last June 25.

Throughout the past 5 years, Russia openly has been building up its military and political power. Throughout those same years, the United States has reduced its power from the predominant force for good on earth to a nadir of ineffectiveness.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE FOR OUR BETRAYAL?

Somebody in the United States Government is responsible for implementing the power of the Soviet Union by destroying the power of the United States.

Four days ago it was pointed out by the leading press services that more than 1,000,000 South Korean men are qualified and eligible for military service. On that same day, April 10, it was also officially confirmed that 120,000 South Korean Reserves had been demobilized.

Gen. Douglas MacArthur stated on that same day of April 10: That this release of South Korean Reserves from call to active duty had been caused by basic political decisions beyond his control.

Since last June, it has been the official United States policy and the official United Nations policy to have 90 percent of all those allegedly fighting for freedom in Korea American fighting men, and the bulk of the expense borne by the American taxpayer. It is now not even good business, according to the policy makers to insist that the vast available manpower of South Korea be trained and equipped to fight its own battles.

Incidentally, also on April 10, the United Sttates announced the granting to Yugoslavia of $600,000,000, "90 percent to be spent for the improvement of Yugoslavia public health and welfare." Yugoslavia has less than half the population of Korea.

ACHESON DEFINES AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

The most recent major pronouncement of American foreign policy also echoing United Nations policy was made by the Secretary of State last November 29. At that time Mr. Acheson defined the will of the American people for peace, as follows:

1. The United Nations is the only means by which the United States can conduct its foreign relations.

2. The United States is prepared at all times to "negotiate just settlements of international disputes," but, whereas the Russian concept of international relations is based upon power, the American concept of foreign relations is "founded in humility plus endless patience."

"The United States," said Mr. Acheson, "shall not use its power to settle international disputes."

It was Acheson also who stated American policy last August: "The United States will not use its veto against seating the Chinese Communists in the United Nations." How could the Communists possibly interpret such a statement of American policy in any other way than as an invitation to keep trying—when they already know that Great Britain, India, and all the Soviet followers have already said "amen" to Mr. Acheson's implied invitation?

It was also Acheson who told the world in the name of the American people last year in January: "Korea is outside the defensive perimeter of the United States." Former Secretary of State Sumner Welles is authority for the statement, and I quote:

"The Communist aggression of last June 25 was the direct consequence of Acheson's statement of January"—which to all intents and purposes was a direct invitation to the Communists to go ahead and attack.

GIVE AID AND COMFORT TO OUR ENEMIES

Even after the Communist attack of last June, it was the official policy of the United States Government to give aid and comfort to the Communists of both China and North Korea. It was Mr. Acheson, Mr. Sawyer, and Mr. Truman who permitted the American Department of Commerce to ship, during the single month of last July, $3,000,000 worth of war goods to Communist China. It was also these same policy makers of the United States Government who strengthened the Chinese Communist Government during that same month by purchasing from Mao Tse-tung $12,200,000 worth of Communist goods, and you'll find the documentation for this implementation of political policies at the expense of our military policies in Korea in the United States Census Bureau's Report on Foreign Trade, issued last September 25.
